Counsel for the plaintiffs put forward one additional circumstance which he argued, with some force, tilted the balance of justice in favour of rectification. That circumstance, he submitted, was that if the register is rectified the defendants can recover compensation based on the 1973 value of the disputed strip, but if the register is not rectified the plaintiffs cannot recover compensation. This argument is founded on s 83 of the 1925 Act which deals with compensation. Section 83 (1) provides that, subject to the provisions of the Act to the contrary, any person suffering loss by reason of any rectification of the register under the Act shall be entitled to be indemnified. That will be the position of the defendants if I rectify. Section 83 (2) provides that where an error or omission has occurred in the register, but the register is not rectified, any person suffering loss by reason of such error or omission shall, subject to the provisions of the Act, be entitled to be indemnified. That is the position of the plaintiffs if I do not rectify.

By s 83 (6) where indemnity is paid in respect of the loss of an estate or interest in or charge on land the amount so paid shall not exceed, where the register is not rectified, the value of the estate, interest or charge at the time when the error or omission which caused the loss was made. In other words, if I do not rectify then the plaintiffs' indemnity is reduced to the value of the disputed strip as at 1959 when the error was made. Section 83 (6), on the other hand, says that where the register is rectified the indemnity is not to exceed the value if there had been no rectification of the estate, interest or charge immediately before the time of rectification. This would apply to the defendants. So that the legislature provides 1959 values for the plaintiffs a and 1973 values for the defendants. The matter does not end there, however, because by s 83 (11) there is a further limitation on indemnity. Section 83 (11) provides that a liability to pay indemnity under the Act shall be deemed a simple contract debt; and for the purposes of the Limitation Act 1963 the cause of action shall be deemed to arise at the time when the claimant knows or, but for his own default, might have known, of the existence of his claim. Whether or not that applies to the plaintiffs, b it clearly does not affect the defendants; first, because they are not claimants; and secondly, because they must have been in complete innocence of anything wrong until the plaintiffs came on the scene and raised the question of where the true boundary lay. Then there is a proviso:

c 'Provided that, when a claim to indemnity arises in consequence of the registration of an estate in land with an absolute or good leasehold title, the claim shall be enforceable only if made within six years from the date of such registration, except in the following cases . . .'

and then it sets out cases involving infants or settled land, which plainly do not apply. Clearly, that proviso operates to deprive the plaintiffs of compensation, because their claim to indemnity is made more than six years from the date of the 1959 registration. d Counsel for the plaintiffs submits that it does not apply to the defendants. First, he says that the proviso only applies to s 83 (2); and, secondly, he says that the claim to indemnity will only arise so far as the defendants are concerned in consequence of the registration which will follow on any order for rectification.

e Counsel for the defendants, on the other hand, submits that the proviso applies to the defendants and that if it does not, the matter is obscure, and any decision I make on it will not be binding, and the defendants should not be left in the uncertainty of knowing whether that decision is right.

f I can only peer through my own spectacles, and, in my judgment, the proviso does not apply to the defendants. It is intended only to apply to a claimant who has the means and opportunity of finding out and asserting his claim, and therefore there is no reason why the six year period should not operate. In the case of the defendants, however, who are in possession and who have got the title I do not consider that the proviso applies; they will not suffer and their claim to indemnity will not arise unless and until an order for rectification is made.

g Accordingly, the foundation for counsel for the plaintiffs' submission is established. This is a case, in my judgment, in which if an order for rectification is made the defendants will be entitled to indemnity on 1973 values, and if the claim for rectification is refused then they will keep the land, but the plaintiffs will not get compensation.

h The question I have to determine is whether that is sufficient to upset the justice of the defendants' claim that there should not be rectification in the present instance. Is it sufficient—and this is the test—to make it unjust not to rectify the register against the defendants? Counsel for the plaintiffs pointed out that as far as the defendants are concerned the disputed strip formed, he calculated, four per cent of the garage premises. He said it could not make a lot of difference to the defendants' garage; on the other hand, it was of importance to 4 Darland Avenue, because it provided a private garage, an asset which is important in commuter territory.

i In my judgment, however, this cannot be solved merely on the question of money. The defendants bought the land; they bought it to exploit for their commercial purposes; they did not buy it in order to sell a strip for a 1973 value, which in real terms will not, in my judgment, adequately indemnify them. Although the strip is at the back of the garage, in the same way as it could be used as a private garage for 4 Darland Avenue, so it could be used by the defendants for commercial purposes, and in fact they say now they intend to use it in connection with a car wash; if they are deprived of it they will be in considerable difficulty, and will not have all the facilities which a modern garage requires. I think that may be putting it a bit high, but the fact of the matter is that this strip is worth more to the defendants than the pounds, shillings and pence which they will receive by indemnity, even on a 1973 basis. a

Accordingly, in my judgment, that argument is not sufficient to overturn all the other arguments in favour of the defendants, and I decline to order rectification of the register.

Summons dismissed.

Contract – Offer and acceptance – Acceptance by post – Mode of acceptance prescribed – Notice in writing to offeror – Option – Option to purchase freehold property – Notice – Option ‘exercisable by notice in writing to’ vendor within prescribed period – Purchaser writing letter to vendor giving notice of exercise of option – Letter sent by ordinary post – Letter never delivered to vendor – Whether option validly exercised – Law of Property Act 1925, s 196. d

By cl 1 of an agreement dated 19th October 1971 made between the defendant of the one part and the plaintiffs of the other, the plaintiffs were granted an option to purchase certain freehold property from the defendant. Clause 2 of the agreement provided: ‘The said option shall be exercisable by notice in writing to the [defendant] at any time within six months from the date hereof.’ On 14th April 1972 the plaintiffs’ solicitors wrote a letter to the defendant giving notice of the exercise of the option. The letter was posted, properly addressed and prepaid, on 14th April, but it was never in fact delivered to the defendant or to his address. In an action against the defendant seeking specific performance of the option agreement, the plaintiffs contended that, since a contractual offer could be accepted by posting a letter of acceptance, the time of acceptance being the moment of posting, the option had been validly exercised when their letter of 14th April was posted. e

Held – Since the agreement prescribed the mode in which it was to be exercised, it followed that it could only be exercised in the prescribed way, i.e. by serving notice on the defendant, either by delivering it to him by hand or in one of the ways authorised by s 196^a of the Law of Property Act 1925. The mere posting of the notice could f

This was an action commenced by writ issued on 4th July 1972 by the plaintiffs, Holwell Securities Ltd, against the defendant, Thomas Hilaire Hughes, seeking specific performance of an agreement for the sale by the defendant to the plaintiffs of property known as 571 High Road, Wembley, and registered at H M Land Registry with absolute freehold title under title no NGL 10503 at the price of £45,000 such agreement being constituted by an option agreement made in writing and for value on 19th October 1971 between the plaintiffs and the defendant and exercise of the option by notice in writing to the defendant dated 14th April 1972. Further or alternatively, the plaintiffs claimed damages for breach of contract. The defendant denied that the option had been validly exercised. The facts are set out in the judgment.

h W A Macpherson QC and Hubert Picarda for the plaintiffs.
Frank Whitworth QC and Roger Ellis for the defendant.

TEMPLEMAN J. This is a purchaser's specific performance action based on a written option agreement. The defence is that in the circumstances which I shall narrate the option was not validly exercised.

i The option agreement was dated 19th October 1971 and made between the defendant, Dr Hughes (called 'the intending vendor'), of the one part, and the plaintiffs, Holwell Securities Ltd (called 'the intending purchaser'), of the other part. Clause 1 granted the option to purchase the property known as 571 High Road, Wembley, which was registered at the Land Registry with absolute title. Those premises, 571 High Road, Wembley, were the residence of the defendant and also the place where he carried on his practice as a general medical practitioner. Clause 2 dealt with the exercise of the option and was in these terms: 'THE said option shall be exercisable by notice in writing to the Intending Vendor at any time within six months from the date hereof . . .'

By a letter dated 14th April 1972, getting near the expiry date for the option, the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote to the defendant's solicitors. The letter read:

'Re Dr. T. H. Hughes and Holwell Securities Limited, 571 High Road, Wembley. We refer to our earlier correspondence regarding our clients' option to purchase the above property. Our clients wish to exercise their option and we shall be obliged if you would accept this letter as notice of the exercise of the option. Kindly acknowledge receipt. We enclose our clients' cheque in your favour for the sum of £4,500, being the 10 per cent. deposit payable on the exercise of the option to be held by you as stakeholders. [Finally:] We are sending a copy of this letter to your client.'

Although cl 2 of the option agreement provided for notice in writing to the intending vendor, a different arrangement was made with regard to the deposit. Clause 3 of the agreement provided that on the exercise of the option the intending purchaser 'shall pay to the Intending Vendor's Solicitors as Stakeholders by way of deposit the sum of . . . £4,500'. So notice exercising the option was to go to the vendor, and the deposit was to go to the vendor's solicitors, and in this letter dated 14th April 1972 the plaintiffs' solicitors purported both to exercise the option and to send the deposit (which they did) by the letter addressed to the defendant's solicitors. That letter was delivered by hand to the defendant's solicitors in the afternoon of 14th April. There is no dispute about that. But equally the plaintiffs do not contend that this solicitors' letter was effective by itself to exercise the option. It is not contended that service on the defendant's solicitors could be sufficient. On the same day, that is to say 14th April, and about the same time, the plaintiffs' solicitors prepared another letter. It was dated 14th April and it was addressed, on the letter, to:

'Dr. T. H. Hughes, 571 High Road, Wembley, Middlesex. Dear Sir, Re [and then on the carbon, which is the only copy we have got, it is left rather vague as to whether they got the number right] High Road, Wembley, Holwell Securities Limited. We enclose for your information a copy of a letter today sent to your solicitors.'

So they did what they told the other solicitors they were going to do, namely, send a copy of the letter to the defendant.

That letter, the one intended for the defendant, and a copy of the letter which had been sent by hand to the solicitors were, between about 1.30 p.m. and 2 p.m. on 14th April, placed in an envelope addressed it is said to the defendant and that envelope and its contents (to which I shall refer as 'the disputed notice') were immediately placed in a post basket on the third floor of the principal offices of the plaintiffs' solicitors. There is no direct evidence that it was ever seen again. What should have happened to the disputed notice, and what I am invited to infer in fact happened, was this: about 15 minutes after the disputed notice had been placed in the post basket, the disputed notice and any other letters were collected by a messenger from the post-room. They were taken to the post-room, a room set aside for that purpose in the plaintiffs' solicitors' principal offices, and in the post-room the disputed notice was franked with first-class mail postage, and the franking incorporated a print of the name of the plaintiffs' solicitors together with a direction to deliver the envelope back to the address thus given in the event of it not being delivered to the addressee. When that franking was completed, the disputed notice and the contents of other baskets with more letters delivered from other offices belonging to the plaintiffs' solicitors, were divided into two categories, one providing for delivery to postal addresses in the London area and the other for delivery outside London. Bundles of about 30 letters a were secured by a rubber band and each bundle was dropped into a Post Office mail bag. There were separate mail bags for the letters intended for the London area and for those intended for other areas. At the end of the afternoon each mail bag was fastened by string at the neck in the usual way and was taken to the street entrance to the offices, and at about 6 p.m. the mail bags were handed over to an employee of the Post Office, who accepted them and put them on to a Post Office van, and off they went.

b I heard evidence from the supervisor of the postal department of the plaintiffs' solicitors, and the chance that the disputed notice was lost on the premises of the plaintiffs' solicitors, or that there was some failure of the system so that the disputed notice was not in fact handed over to the Post Office representative on the evening of 14th April, is negligible and remote.

c The same day the defendant's solicitor, who had received his letter by hand, spoke by telephone to the defendant, and in his evidence the defendant said that he was told that the solicitor had received a letter which purported to exercise the option, but that the solicitor did not think it was a valid exercise of the option, and the defendant was told, or at least led to believe, that he could expect to receive a copy, or a similar letter—I am not giving the exact words but it is quite clear that was the general sense of what he was told. The defendant then gave evidence that he d told his solicitor that he had already planned to go to Ireland because of illness in his family, and asked whether he could go. He was advised that he was under no obligation to stay at home and wait for whatever came through the post or whatever might be delivered otherwise than through the post. So the defendant then left for Ireland that evening and did not return to Wembley until the morning of 20th April, by which time of course the six months limited by the option agreement for the exercise e of the option had expired.

In the meantime, while the defendant was away, the disputed notice having been taken and accepted by the Post Office should have been taken by van to a London sorting office at Rathbone Place, and having then been sorted for Wembley it should have been taken to the Wembley sorting office by van, and then by van and man it f should have gone from the Wembley sorting office to the defendant's address, arriving there on Saturday 15th April providing it was correctly addressed and providing that no mistake or delay intervened.

As I have said, the defendant is a medical practitioner who lives and practises at 571 High Road, Wembley. He is in partnership with another doctor, a Dr Blankert, and whenever Dr Blankert is on duty and the defendant is away Dr Blankert occupies a flat on the top floor of the premises.

g [His Lordship considered the layout of the defendant's house, the arrangements for receipt of mail, the evidence of the defendant and Dr Blankert and continued:] Dr Blankert was quite clear in her evidence, and the chances that the disputed notice was in fact delivered to the defendant's address between 14th and 20th April without her knowledge are negligible. It follows that, unless Dr Blankert is telling a pack of h lies, the disputed notice was not delivered, and in this state of the evidence I infer, and find, first, that the disputed notice was posted on 14th April, that is to say before the option expired, and posted in the sense that it was handed over to the Post Office, to some postman duly authorised to receive it and to transmit it to the defendant, and that it was properly addressed and properly posted. Secondly, I find that the disputed notice was never in fact delivered to the defendant or to his address.

i Counsel who appeared for the defendant submitted that even if the disputed notice had been delivered it would not have been sufficient to exercise the option because it did not, in addressing the defendant, say 'Dear Dr Hughes, We are exercising the option'; it merely enclosed for his information a copy of a letter sent to his solicitors. But when one looks at that copy and finds it says, 'Our clients wish to exercise their option and we shall be obliged if you would accept this letter as notice of the exercise of the option', it seems to me that if the defendant had got that letter he would have got what the option agreement says he was to get, notice in writing exercising the option. a

The argument in this case then revolves round one point. Counsel for the plaintiffs submits that the option was exercised when the letter was posted, while counsel for the defendant submits that the option could only be exercised by delivery. It never was delivered, and thus the option was never exercised at all.

I begin by disembarassing myself as far as possible from authority and looking at the agreement. The agreement says the option shall be exercisable 'by notice in writing to the Intended Vendor at any time within six months from the date hereof'. As a matter of construction I think that meant the notice in writing had to be given to the intending vendor, and given to him in the sense that he had got to receive it. I leave out of account for the moment what would have happened if he tried to evade service or if it was delivered to his house where he lived. Leaving that out of account for a moment, as a matter of construction it seems to me this option agreement is providing that the notice shall be delivered to the vendor, and if it is not then the option is not properly exercised. b

I turn now to see what authority has to say on the matter, and the first hint to which I refer is s 196 of the Law of Property Act 1925. That deals, in sub-s (1), with 'Any notice required or authorised to be served or given by this Act', and by sub-s (5) the provisions of the section— c

'shall extend to notices required to be served by any instrument affecting property executed or coming into operation after the commencement of this Act unless a contrary intention appears.' d

In *Re 88 Berkeley Road, London NW9, Rickwood v Turnsek*¹ Plowman J decided that for the purposes of s 196 (4) there was no difference between serving a notice and giving a notice, and it seems to me that, apart altogether from sub-s (1) which talks about notices being served or given, the same principle must apply to sub-s (5) and to the option agreement. Counsel for the plaintiffs did not argue that there was any difference between an agreement which required notice in writing to the vendor and an agreement which required notice in writing to be given to the vendor. His argument was that notice was given when the disputed notice was posted. Section 196 contains various directions as to how notice may be given. Subsection (3) provides: e

'Any notice required or authorised by this Act to be served shall be sufficiently served if it is left at the last-known place of abode or business in the United Kingdom of the lessee, lessor, mortgagee, mortgagor, or other person to be served, or, in case of a notice required or authorised to be served on a lessee or mortgagor, is affixed or left for him on the land or any house or building comprised in the lease or mortgage [and so on].' f

That gets round the difficulty which might arise, as in the present case, if the defendant were away in Ireland. You could leave the notice at his last known place of abode or business, which in the present case were one and the same thing. Then sub-s (4) provides: g

'Any notice required or authorised by this Act to be served shall also be sufficiently served, if it is sent by post in a registered letter addressed to the lessee, lessor, mortgagee, mortgagor, or other person to be served, by name, at the aforesaid place of abode or business, office, or counting-house, and if that letter is not returned through the post-office undelivered; and that service shall be deemed to be made at the time at which the registered letter would in the ordinary course be delivered.' h

I leave out the complication that we now have 'Recorded delivery' with another statute which provides similar machinery, but the significance of s 196 is this: it i a assumes that when a notice is required to be served or given it must actually reach the person for whom it is intended, and there are statutory exceptions which discharge the sender of the notice from proving that it reached the person in question in certain limited circumstances: first of all, if he can show that the notice was left at his house or office, and, secondly, if sent by post in a registered letter properly addressed. In that case if the registered letter is not returned undelivered then it is to be deemed to be sufficiently served, and the Act specifies that the time at which the service is deemed to be carried out is not the time of posting but the time of normal delivery. That seems to me to be consistent only with the underlying assumption that notices which require to be served have got to reach people, and this is a convenient method of proving or deeming that service has in fact been carried out and that they have been reached. True, as counsel for the plaintiffs says, you are not obliged to use the Act. You can hand the notice to the addressee personally or serve it in another form altogether. But in that case, of course, you may not need and do not get the protection afforded by the Act.

c Counsel for the plaintiffs says that s 196 is irrelevant, it is only an extra precaution which could be used. But if he is right it is an unnecessary section. All you have got to do to serve a notice, he says, is to pop it in a pillar box. According to him if you have got to serve a notice by midnight on Friday on a gentleman living in Blackpool all you have got to do is, one minute before midnight in Brighton, to pop it in a pillar box, presumably even with a 2½p stamp, and, although it may not get there for another week afterwards, or may never get there, that is good service and is effective as at the date when it is popped into the pillar box. In my judgment, s 196 is entirely inconsistent with that argument. It must be remembered that s 196 is only statutory shorthand for precedents which were commonly in use and which also therefore assumed that a notice had to be proved to be delivered at or before the required date. Counsel for the plaintiffs seeks to say there are two sorts of notices: one which he calls an initiation notice and one such as the present which he calls a completion notice. An initiation notice he describes, for example, as a notice of intention to prosecute, or something of that sort, and he also said that notice pursuant to a clause in a lease for breaking the term of the lease was an initiation notice. His submission was that if you found a lease-break clause, then—I am not quite sure whether he said it certainly was or could well be—notice in writing required in that case had to be actually received subject to the provisions of s 196, whereas if, as in the present case, there was an option to purchase, then he says posting is good enough, and he was driven to concede that you might in one and the same lease have three clauses, a lease-break clause, a renewal clause and an option to purchase the freehold. Each clause might require notice in writing, but some of those notices could be well served by, and at the time of, popping in the pillar box; other notices would have to be served by delivery and would be served at the time when the notice was in fact received. That argument seems to me to produce a result which I should, if possible, strive to avoid. It is not entirely without significance that the plaintiffs' solicitors, in carrying out what they obviously regarded as the only requirement of the option agreement, namely, service on the solicitors, were careful to see that the solicitors' letter was delivered by hand well before the date when the option expired.

h I was also referred to *Holt v Heatherfield Trust Ltd*¹. That was a case of an assignment of a debt and under s 136 of the Law of Property Act 1925 the assignment takes effect if express notice in writing has been given to the debtor and the assignment is effectual as from the date of the notice. Atkinson J said²:

j "The date of [such] notice is the date of a notice which has been given to the debtor, and refers back to the express notice in writing mentioned earlier in the section. It is express notice in writing given to the debtor, and, in my judgment, the date of such notice is the date on which it is received by or on behalf of the debtor. If the notice arrives at his place of business, and he happens to be away and does not see it personally for another day or two, I think that would be immaterial; it would be received on his behalf. It cannot be the date of the notice, because a notice might be written and dated a week before it was posted, and it would be absurd to suppose that that would be effective.'

Of course, there was a reference to the effective date being the date of the notice and the learned judge only refers to the possibility of there being a different date on the letter-heading itself and does not refer to the possibility of the date of posting. But that is a decision in line with s 196 and in line with the view that express notice in writing, where express notice in writing has got to be given, has got to be actually delivered, subject to the provisions of s 196.

A large number of cases were cited to me but there was no authority which showed that where the parties had gone out of their way to say that notice in writing had to be given to a named person then it was sufficient merely to put the letter in the post box. Counsel for the plaintiffs referred me to the Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s 49 (15), which provides that 'Where a notice of dishonour is duly addressed and posted, the sender is deemed to have given due notice of dishonour, notwithstanding any miscarriage by the post office'. True, that is dealing with another subject-matter but it is implicit in that section that unless there was something which enabled you to assume that which was in fact untrue, namely that the notice had been given, then of course you would have to prove actual notice, meaning by that service on the person concerned, because a deeming provision is merely saying that black shall be white. So far as bills of exchange are concerned even if the addressee has not received the notice he is deemed to have been given it notwithstanding any miscarriage by the Post Office. That is in line with s 196 and it is significant that it is necessary to put sub-s (15) into s 49.

Counsel for the plaintiffs' main submission turns on this: he says if you look at the contract cases, offer and acceptance, right at the beginning of the law of contract, you will find that it is possible to accept an offer by putting the acceptance in the post, and that the time for the contract is the date when the acceptance is put in the post, not the date when it is received and notwithstanding it may not be received. He says here we have an offer, and the exercise of the option by notice is the acceptance, so that it is pure contract. He cited for that proposition—which I think nobody quarrels with—a passage in Anson¹ which deals with the manner of acceptance and a later passage²:

'To understand the leading authority on this point, it is necessary to know that an offer made to one who is not in immediate communication with the offeror remains open and available for acceptance until the lapse of such a time as is prescribed by the offeror, or is reasonable as regards the nature of the transaction. During this time the offer is a continuing offer and may be turned into a contract by acceptance', and the editor says it was undoubtedly necessary for the court to establish some definite rule as to the time of a postal acceptance, and convenience pointed to the time when the letter was posted rather than to the time when it was received by the offeror. Then he goes on³:

'Various attempts have been made to justify this rule analytically. One line of reasoning attempts to eliminate any difficulties as to consensus by treating the post office as the agent of the offeror not only for delivering the offer, but a for receiving the notification of its acceptance; yet there is a certain artificiality in looking at the transaction in this way. Another supposes that the offeror must be considered as making, during every instant of the time his letter is traveling, the same identical offer to the offeree; and then the contract is completed by the acceptance of it by the latter. But this does not explain why posting uniquely constitutes an acceptance without notification. The better explanation

b would seem to be that, if hardship is caused, as it obviously may be, by the delay or loss of a letter of acceptance, some rule is necessary, and the rule at which the Courts have arrived, whether or not it can logically be supported, is probably as satisfactory as any other would be.'

c It is to be observed that the learned author says that in the case of an offer, when all you have to do is to accept, without being told how to accept or what you have to do, then posting is an 'acceptance without notification'. But, of course, in all cases in contract it depends on the wording of the contract itself and in the present case the contract requires acceptance by notification. It is quite clear from that passage, and from the other authorities which counsel for the plaintiffs read to me, that if you have merely got an offer which says nothing about the method of acceptance then it can be d accepted by post, if that is the usual course of dealing, and the time when the acceptance is posted is the date of the contract.

The cases which counsel for the plaintiffs cited were *Henthorn v Fraser*¹, where the headnote reads²:

e '... where the circumstances under which an offer is made are such that it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that, according to the ordinary usages of mankind, the post might be used as a means of communicating the acceptance of it, the acceptance is complete as soon as it is posted.'

Counsel for the plaintiffs says of course that it was within the contemplation of the parties in the present case that the notice exercising the option should be sent by post, and so it was. But there is a difference between the case where you have a requirement
f of notice in writing to be given to the intending vendor, and a case such as *Henthorn v Fraser*¹ where you have an open offer with nothing said about how it can be accepted, and then the law, for the reasons given by Anson³, does not require notification but requires posting as being sufficient to constitute acceptance. To the same effect was *Stevenson, Jacques & Co v McLean*⁴ and the nearest case I think for counsel for the plaintiffs' purpose was *Bruner v Moore*⁵, which did concern an option. In that g case there was an option to purchase certain patent rights during the period of six months from the date of the agreement. The option said nothing as to how the option was to be exercised. In the event Farwell J held that on the construction of that option and in the events which had then happened the option was in fact exercised in due time, so, as counsel for the defendant pointed out, what Farwell J had to say about acceptance is obiter. Nevertheless, of course, it is obiter to which I should pay h very great attention. Farwell J said⁶:

'It is now argued that this option, having expired on March 29, a telegram and letter sent on the 28th, but not reaching the defendant until the 30th, were too late. In my opinion this contention fails also, for the option was duly exercised when the telegram was sent and the letter posted. [He then cites

Lord Herschell in *Henthorn v Fraser*¹:] "Where the circumstances are such that it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that, according to the ordinary usages of mankind, the post might be used as a means of communicating the acceptance of an offer, the acceptance is complete as soon as it is posted." In the present case the parties are American citizens staying temporarily at London hotels when they signed the contract. That contract obviously contemplates the events that in fact happened—that the two parties would separate and would visit various parts of Europe, and would communicate with one another constantly by letter and telegram. If there ever was a case in which the parties contemplated that "the post might be used as a means of communicating" on all subjects connected with the contract, this is that case. I hold, therefore, that the option was duly exercised.'

The authorities, particularly *Bruner v Moore*² and two later cases of *Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Co Ltd v Grant*³ and *Re Imperial Land Co of Marseilles, Harris' Case*⁴, which counsel for the plaintiffs cited, do show that where you have an offer and no mode of acceptance is prescribed but it is to be assumed from the circumstances that post is one of the mediums of acceptance, then you can accept through the post, and the time of acceptance is the time of posting. But that has no relevance where the mode of acceptance is prescribed and in the present case this option prescribes that it shall be exercisable by notice in writing to the intending vendor. If, as I think, this means that notice must be given to the intending vendor, then we are dealing not with the cases which counsel for the plaintiffs cites, which relate to offer and acceptance without more; we are dealing with the question of how you are entitled to give notice to an intending vendor, and what you have to do in order to satisfy the requirements. It seems to me from s 196, and also as a matter of construction, that the intending vendor must get the notice, and subject only to the exemptions provided by s 196, namely that you take every possible reasonable precaution by giving it by registered post, and the notice is not returned undelivered. But it will be noticed that, when you use the registered post procedure, it is not the time when you hand it over to the Post Office which counts but the time when, in the normal course of events, it ought to reach, and nearly always does reach, the addressee. Accordingly, I do not think the cases which counsel for the plaintiffs cited are relevant here and in my judgment the notice had to be received by the defendant, and it clearly was not received.

Counsel for the plaintiffs had an alternative point. He tried to add together the letter which had been sent to the vendor's solicitor and the oral communication made by the vendor's solicitor to the vendor, and he said: 'Well, there you are'. This, I think, is a plea ad misericordiam. Counsel for the plaintiffs is saying: 'Well, suppose the notice did not reach the defendant, he knew that there was something like it with his solicitor'. But it is conceded that service on the solicitor is not good enough, and in my judgment what happened was this, that the defendant, before the expiry of the period knew that the plaintiffs wanted to exercise the option and he knew that the plaintiffs were trying to exercise the option, but that is all. He was hoping that they would not exercise the option, and the onus was clearly on them to exercise it, and they did not.

I was referred to *Hare v Nicoll*⁵, which for present purposes merely repeats the rule that, an option being a species of privilege for the benefit of the party on whom it is conferred, it is for that party to comply strictly with the conditions stipulated for the exercise of the option.

a Finally counsel for the plaintiffs gave an appeal to the merits. Of course I do not really know where the merits lie, but assume that they do lie with the plaintiffs, and assume that it was rough luck on them that they did not get their option exercised in due time, nevertheless counsel for the plaintiffs is only trying to persuade me to make bad law out of a hard case. There is no real difficulty. The option agreement says what is to be done, namely, that notice in writing has to be served on the intending vendor. Section 196 gives perfectly plain and alternative methods of doing this. b If that is not thought to be sufficient the notice can, of course, be delivered by hand and there was plenty of time. But if the person serving the notice goes outside s 196 he does so at his own peril. I must have regard simply to this, that in my judgment the notice had to be served on the defendant either by hand or in one of the manners authorised by s 196 or in some other manner. It was not in fact served on him and accordingly the option was not exercised.

c The result must be that I dismiss this action, with costs.

LORD DENNING MR, STAMP AND JAMES LJ

f Employment – Redundancy – Payment – Amount – Normal working hours – Overtime – Employee entitled to overtime pay – Contract fixing minimum number of working hours – Minimum number of working hours exceeding number of working hours without overtime – Contract guaranteeing employment for 40 hours a week at basic hourly rate – Contract obliging employee to work overtime when required by employer – Employer not obliged to provide overtime work – Employee regularly working 57 hour week – Whether contract ‘fixing’ minimum number of working hours in excess of number of hours without overtime – Whether normal working hours 57 hours a week – Contracts of Employment Act 1963, Sch 2, para 1 (1), (2).

Under the provisions of his contract of employment the employee was guaranteed employment for 40 hours each week for which he was paid a basic hourly rate. He could, however, be required by his employers to work overtime, for which he was paid at overtime rates. In practice the employee regularly worked 57 hours a week and sometimes more. Eventually the employee was dismissed by reason of redundancy and claimed that the redundancy payment to which he was entitled under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 was to be calculated on the basis that his ‘normal working hours’ were, by virtue of para 1^a of Sch 2 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963, to be taken as 57 hours a week since he was contractually obliged to work for 17 hours in excess of the basic 40 hour week.

Held – The employee’s redundancy payment was to be calculated on the basis that his normal working hours were ‘the number of hours without overtime’ within para 1 (1) of Sch 2 to the 1963 Act, i.e. 40 hours a week, since the hours of overtime which he had worked were to be disregarded by virtue of para 1 (1). As the employers were not required by the contract of employment to employ the employee for a period in excess of 40 hours each week, it could not be said that the contract 'fixed' the minimum number of hours of employment at a figure in excess of the number of hours without overtime so as to increase the number of 'normal working hours' to that figure in accordance with para 1 (2) of Sch 2 to the 1963 Act (see p 489 a to c and h to p 490 a and d to j, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Tarmac Roadstone Holdings Ltd against the order of the National Industrial Relations Court (Sir John Donaldson P, Mr R Boyfield and Professor T L Johnston) dated 24th March 1972 dismissing the appellants' appeal against a decision of an industrial tribunal sitting at Middlesbrough (chairman H M Windsor Aubrey Esq) dated 15th December 1971 whereby it was held that the respondents, Max Peacock, Brian Frederick Lockwood and James Young, and each of them, were entitled to receive redundancy payments under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 calculated on the basis that during the period of their employment with the appellants their normal working hours were 57 hours in each week and not 40 hours in each week as provided for in the conditions of the National Joint Industrial Council for the Slag Industry. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

Frank Whitworth QC and Roger Ellis for the appellants.

The respondents did not appear and were not represented.

LORD DENNING MR. Mr Brian Lockwood is a maintenance fitter at the Cargo Fleet Works of the appellants, Tarmac Roadstone Holdings Ltd ('the employers'). He is a man of 26 years of age. He was ten years with the employers from 4th September 1961 until his employment came to an end on 28th October 1971. It is admitted that he was dismissed for redundancy and that he is entitled to a redundancy payment under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. But the question is, how is that redundancy payment to be calculated? This depends on what were his 'normal working hours'? He says 57 hours. His employers say 40 hours. The industrial tribunal found that they were 57 hours. The National Industrial Relations Court affirmed that decision. The employers appeal to this court.

a We have only heard arguments on behalf of the employers. I wish that we could have heard arguments on behalf of Mr Lockwood himself. But that has not been possible. He has written to the court explaining the position:

b 'Dear Sir, I hereby apologise for not being present or represented at the Appeal Court on Monday, 26 February 1973 at 12 o'clock. I have not been represented by my union because of the Industrial Relations Act. My union is the A.E.U. I therefore hope that British justice will prevail in my absence, and, if need be, hope that this letter will be read out at the hearing. Yours hopefully, Brian Frederick Lockwood.'

c When Mr Lockwood was employed in 1961, he was given the particulars which the employers are bound to give under the Contracts of Employment Act 1963. These stated the terms of his employment. They gave his normal hours of work 'As per Slag Industry'. The authorised overtime was 'As per Slag Industry'. The holidays were as for 'Slag Industry'.

d By referring to the 'Slag Industry', those particulars incorporated the conditions of employment which had been agreed by the National Joint Industrial Council for the Slag Industry. These conditions are set out in a little booklet which has been put before us. The relevant conditions are these:

'3 Each worker shall be guaranteed employment in accordance with the minimum basic weekly hours . . .

'8 The payment for the three weeks' holiday shall be for 49 complete weeks, each of 40 hours, excluding all overtime . . .

e '21 Hours of the working week

'(a) The normal single day shift week for all workers paid by the hour shall under these conditions consist of 40 hours actual work for which 40 hours shall be paid where these hours are not already in operation . . .

'23 Hours of work

'(a) The normal day week shall consist of 40 hours actual work for which 40 hours shall be paid . . .

f '26 Overtime All workers covered by these conditions shall work overtime in accordance with the demands of the industry during the normal week and/or at weekends.'

g Those conditions were incorporated into his contract of employment. They show that his normal working week for which he was paid his basic hourly rate was 40 hours a week. But that under condition 26 he would be required to work overtime if the employers asked him, in which case he would be paid overtime at overtime rates. These stepped up from 'time and one quarter' to 'double time' according to the quantity done and the day on which it was done.

h The evidence showed that Mr Lockwood as a regular practice worked 57 hours a week and sometimes more. He was paid his basic hourly rate for the 40 hours and overtime rate for the remaining 17 hours. He claims that he should have his redundancy pay on the basis of 57 hours. The employers rejected the claim. They said in their written answer:

i 'The normal hours of work on [Mr Lockwood's] contract of employment refers to the National Joint Industrial Council for the Slag Industry which provides that the hours of the working week shall consist of 40 hours actual work for which 40 hours shall be paid. It is considered that this case is similar in nature with the following Tribunal and High Court decisions.'

Then certain decisions are referred to. I will mention them later.

The industrial tribunal decided in the man's favour. They did so because they found that the overtime was compulsory on the man. They said:

'... we cannot exclude from our mind that the [respondents] were employed in an industry (unlike for example a factory manufacturing goods) where the necessities of the business made it very difficult to operate over a long period of time any regular fixed hours of employment for maintenance workers, ... we are of the opinion that the national agreement applying a 40 hour week was consensually varied on the engagement of the three [respondents] to whom it was made clear that the national agreement was being varied as regards themselves on the basis that they were bound as a matter of contract to work a seven day week comprising 57 hours.' a

The National Industrial Relations Court affirmed that decision. They said:

'In those circumstances it was open to the tribunal to conclude (although it did not have to reach that conclusion) that there was a contractual obligation on each of these men to work a longer number of hours. It has so found. It has found that these men had agreed to work 17 hours in excess of the 40-hour week, as compulsory overtime.' b

The court held that that was decisive.

The employers challenge that decision. They accept the finding that the overtime was compulsory on the man. But they say that it was not compulsory on the employer. Although the man was contractually bound to work 57 hours if required, the employers were not contractually bound to employ him for 57 hours. They were only bound to employ him for 40 hours. The employers say that under the statutory provisions this meant that the normal working hours were 40. c

The question depends on the true interpretation of Sch 2 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963. This contains a definition of 'normal working hours' on which the redundancy payments are to be calculated. This appears from Sch 1 to the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. d

So I turn to para 1 of Sch 2 to the 1963 Act. It says this:

'(1) For the purposes of this Schedule the cases where there are normal working hours include cases where the employee is entitled to overtime pay when employed for more than a fixed number of hours in a week or other period, and, subject to the following subparagraph, in those cases that fixed number of hours (in this paragraph referred to as "the number of hours without overtime") shall be the normal working hours.' e

'(2) If in such a case—(a) the contract of employment fixes the number, or the minimum number, of hours of employment in the said week or other period (whether or not it also provides for the reduction of that number or minimum number of hours in certain circumstances), and (b) that number or minimum number of hours exceeds the number of hours without overtime, that number or minimum number of hours (and not the number of hours without overtime) shall be the normal working hours ...' f

Those provisions are very complicated, but on analysis they can be applied in practice to these situations: g

First, where there is a fixed number of compulsory working hours, and thereafter overtime is voluntary on both sides—so that the employer is not bound to employ the man for any overtime and the employee is not bound to serve it—then, although the overtime is worked regularly each week, nevertheless being voluntary, it does not count as part of the normal working hours. Such a situation is covered by para 1 (1). h

Second, when there is a fixed number of compulsory working hours and in addition a fixed period of overtime which is obligatory on both sides—so that the employer is bound to provide that overtime and the employee bound to serve it—then that fixed period of overtime is added to the fixed period of compulsory working hours so that the total number counts as the normal working hours. Such a i situation is covered by para 1 (2). In short, 'guaranteed overtime' counts as part of normal working hours.

Third, where there is a fixed number of compulsory working hours, and overtime is obligatory on the man if asked but not on the employer—so that the employer is entitled to call on the man to work overtime but is not bound to call on him to do so—then the overtime does not come within the normal working hours. Such a case seems to me to come within para 1 (1). It comes within the words 'the employee is entitled to overtime pay when employed for more than a fixed number of hours in a week'. It does not come within the words of para 1 (2), because the contract of employment does not 'fix' the number of hours of employment. The overtime is not fixed but is at the option of the employer. This interpretation is borne out by a long series of cases in the Divisional Court: *Pearson v William Jones Ltd*¹, *Loman v Merseyside Transport Services Ltd*², *The Darlington Forge Ltd v Sutton*³, *Minister of Labour v Country Bake Ltd*⁴ and *Lynch v Dartmouth Auto Castings Ltd*⁵.

In those cases there was a fixed period of hours during which the employers were bound to employ the man and he was bound to work. It was 40 or 41 hours a week. In addition in every one of those cases he did in fact regularly work overtime, so as to get the job done, making his regular hours 50 or more hours a week. He was paid overtime rates for that overtime. But the employers were not bound to employ him for that overtime. The overtime was not fixed or guaranteed by the contract of employment. It did not count, therefore, towards the normal working hours. Each of the cases came within para 1 (1) and not para 1 (2).

After that long line of cases there came *Armstrong Whitworth Rolls Ltd v Mustard*⁶. Mr Mustard originally had normal working hours of 40 per week, but in fact worked more, for which he was paid overtime. Later on one employee left and there was a variation by agreement by which Mr Mustard was bound to work 60 hours a week and the employers were bound to employ him for those 60 hours. In short, the fixed number of compulsory working hours was 60. So construed, that case is consistent with the earlier cases.

Quite recently the whole matter was considered by the National Industrial Relations Court when Sir John Brightman was presiding. It is *Redpath Dorman Long (Contracting) Ltd v Sutton*⁷. The case was decided on the ground that the man was not bound to do overtime. It was expected on both sides, but not compulsory. So it did not form part of his normal working hours. But Sir John Brightman did make some observations on the position when the man is obliged to do overtime, if asked, but the employer is not bound to give it to him. He said⁸: 'The point is one which would seem to have been relevant in Tarmac Roadstone Holdings Ltd. v. Peacock . . . decided by another division of this court on March 24, 1972, but it appears to have escaped argument.' Reading between the lines, it is plain to me that Sir John Brightman was of opinion that in a case such as the present, where the obligation to do overtime is not obligatory on both sides, but only obligatory on the workman—so that the employer has an option whether to demand it or not—then that overtime does not come within the 'normal working hours' as defined in the statute. That seems to me to be correct. Applying it in this case, Mr Lockwood had fixed working hours of 40 hours a week. He regularly worked 57 hours a week. Seventeen hours were overtime which he was bound to work, if asked; but the employers were not bound to

I would allow the appeal accordingly.

STAMP LJ. I entirely agree; but as we are differing from the judgment of Sir John Donaldson P in the Industrial Court as well as from the industrial tribunal, I will express my judgment quite shortly in my own words. The respondents' contracts of employment were subject to the relevant national agreement, which provided that the normal week should be 40 hours actual work, for which 40 hours should be paid. Under it all workers were bound to work overtime in accordance with the demands of the industry during the normal week and/or at weekends. At the outset the respondents were told or given to understand in effect that they were expected to do more than that, and unless prepared to do so, could not have the job. Throughout their employment they were called on to do and did do many more than 40 hours a week. In fact, they regularly did at least 57 hours a week and on occasion more. It may be that their services would have been dispensed with had they not done so. There are, however, in my judgment, no findings of fact in the tribunal's findings which could lead to the conclusion that the appellants ever bound themselves to provide the men with 57 hours per week. The 57 hours they worked were regular but were not fixed in the sense that it ever became a term of the employment that the employers should employ them for that time. Does the case then fall within para 1 (1) of Sch 2 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963, to which one is referred by the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, in which case the redundancy payments should be calculated by reference to a 40 hour week, or does it fall within para 1 (2)? Unless the case is taken out of sub-para (1) by the effect of sub-para (2), the former subparagraph will, so far as regards this case, apply. Subparagraph (2) provides, in effect, that if a minimum number of hours for which the employee is bound to work is fixed by the contract of employment, and the minimum number of hours includes overtime, that minimum becomes the yardstick. That, as I understand it, is the effect of all the cases cited to this court and to which Lord Denning MR has referred. The present case does not in my judgment fall within sub-para (2). As I have said, it was never a term of the contract that the respondents should work and be paid for 57 hours, for the employers were not bound to provide them with that number of hours work. I cannot accept the view indicated by Sir John Donaldson P that, in order to come within sub-para (2), the obligation to work overtime does not have to be mutual or that the employer does not have to be under an obligation to provide overtime. For, if he is under no such obligation, it cannot, in my judgment, be truly said, within the meaning of subparagraph (2), that—I emphasise these words—the contract of employment fixes the number or the minimum number of hours of employment. I emphasise those words 'the contract of employment fixes', because it is on those words, with particular emphasis on the word 'fixes', that, in my judgment, the case turns. b

JAMES LJ. For the reasons given in both the judgments expressed, I also would allow the appeal. It goes without saying that that applies not only to the case to which reference has been made, but to the other respondents, Peacock and Young, whose cases fall to be decided on exactly the same principles. g

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

RUSSELL, BUCKLEY AND LAWTON LJJ

2nd, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 28th FEBRUARY 1973

Local authority – Land – Power to appropriate land – Land no longer required for purposes for which acquired – Decision of local authority that land no longer required for those purposes – Jurisdiction of courts to review decision – Local authority acquiring land for purposes of aerodrome – Local authority conveying site adjoining land to plaintiffs to build factory – Plaintiffs aircraft manufacturers – Conveyance containing covenant by local authority to allow plaintiffs to use airfield for defined period for purposes of test, delivery and other flights in connection with their business – Local authority deciding that land no longer required for purposes of aerodrome – Resolution to appropriate land for purposes of housing scheme – Validity of resolution – Whether test flights etc of plaintiffs' aircraft a purpose for which land acquired – Whether court having jurisdiction to review local authority's decision that land no longer required for original purposes – Local Government Act 1933, s 163 (1).

The plaintiffs were aircraft manufacturers and the defendants a local authority. The defendants wished to establish a municipal aerodrome and wished to encourage the plaintiffs to establish an aircraft factory which would be a substantial employer of labour in the area. Accordingly arrangements were made between the plaintiffs and the defendants whereby the defendants in part acquired and in part appropriated a site for the purposes of an aerodrome. In November 1936 they conveyed to the plaintiffs a site adjoining the airfield. The conveyance imposed on the plaintiffs an obligation to build a factory on the site and gave them a right of way from the site to the airfield. The conveyance contained a covenant to allow the plaintiffs to use the airport for the purpose of test, delivery and other flights in connection with their business for 99 years or such longer period as the site should be used as a municipal aerodrome. The plaintiffs built their factory and manufactured aircraft there; the defendants licensed, managed and controlled the airfield, which the plaintiffs used for the purpose of their business for testing etc. From 1938 until the end of 1970 (subject to a period of requisitioning during and after the war) the airfield was used as an aerodrome by the plaintiffs as well as by members of the public. By 1957 the plaintiffs had ceased to manufacture aircraft. Thereafter they used the factory for making airframes or parts thereof and hydraulic equipment for aircraft and other uses. The plaintiffs' need to use the airfield for test flying therefore no longer presently existed; their use of it was virtually confined to executive flights in private aircraft owned by the plaintiffs. Those flights were not numerous; in 1970 there were none. The defendants no longer required the airfield as a municipal aerodrome. In December 1970 they closed the airport, since when there had been no traffic there. On 4th January 1971, in exercise of their powers under s 163 (1)^a of the Local Government Act 1933, they passed a resolution to re-appropriate the airfield 'for planning purposes'. The planning purposes that they had in mind were a comprehensive development of the area for housing. They also submitted

^a Section 163 (1), so far as material, provides: 'Any land belonging to a local authority and not required for the purposes for which it was acquired or has since been appropriated may be appropriated for any other purpose . . . for which the local authority are authorised to acquire land: Provided that . . . (ii) the appropriation of land by a local authority shall be subject to any covenant or restriction affecting the use of the land in their hands.'

a a formal application for planning permission to the Secretary of State. If that permission were granted the defendants would, by virtue of s 127 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, be able to carry out the necessary works and effectively destroy such airfield rights as the plaintiffs had on payment of compensation under that section. The plaintiffs brought proceedings to ensure the continuation of their rights, contending that the defendants had no authority under s 163 (1) of the 1933 Act to appropriate the land for planning purposes since it was still required for the purposes for which it had been acquired, having regard to the existence of the plaintiffs' rights under the 1936 conveyance which existed and were expressed to endure for the rest of the 99 year period. b

Held – The words 'not required' in s 163 (1) of the 1933 Act were to be construed as meaning 'not needed in the public interest of the locality'. Although the plaintiffs' rights under the 1936 agreement operated in equity to create an easement in their favour, it did not follow that because those rights remained in force and were capable of being used by the plaintiffs that the defendants could not come to the conclusion that the land was not required for the purposes of an aerodrome. Under s 163 (1) the defendants were the sole judges of the question whether the land was or was not required for the purpose for which it had been acquired or had been appropriated. In the absence of any allegation of perversity or bad faith on the part of the defendants, the court could not interfere with their decision. It followed therefore that the airfield had been validly appropriated for planning purposes (see p 497 j to p 498 c, p 499 c, p 501 f and p 502 c and g, post). c

The plaintiffs, Dowty Boulton Paul Ltd, appealed against a decision of Plowman J¹ dated 19th May 1972 whereby it was held that the defendants, Wolverhampton Corporation ('the corporation'), were entitled to appropriate land acquired by them for the purposes of an aerodrome, for planning purposes, notwithstanding that the corporation had contracted to make the aerodrome available for a period of 99 years from 1936 to the plaintiffs, then known as Boulton Paul Aircraft Ltd, for the purposes of the plaintiffs' business. The facts are set out in the judgment of Russell LJ.

K R Bagnall and Robert Pryor for the plaintiffs.

Jeremiah Harman QC and Elizabeth Appleby for the corporation.

Cur adv vult

28th February. The following judgments were read.

RUSSELL LJ (read by Buckley LJ). This case came before Pennycuik V-C² in November 1970 on a motion for interlocutory relief which was refused. The action was tried before Plowman J in May 1972 and was dismissed¹. That dismissal is the subject of the plaintiffs' present appeal.

g As will be seen from the reports of those hearings, the position is briefly as follows. The plaintiffs in 1935 were aeroplane manufacturers at Norwich. At government request, they sought a suitable place in the Midlands to carry on their business; they would need a suitable existing factory, or a suitable site on which to build one, an adjacent airfield mainly for testing the aircraft they manufactured, and an available pool of skilled labour. Wolverhampton Corporation was minded to establish a municipal aerodrome and welcomed the establishment of a factory which would be a substantial employer of labour in the area.

h In the outcome, arrangements were made to suit both the corporation and the plaintiffs. The corporation acquired or appropriated at Barnhurst what became the site of the Wolverhampton Aerodrome for the purpose of its use as an airfield, and the conveyance of 1936, of which details are to be found in the reports below, was executed, containing, inter alia, an obligation on the plaintiffs to build a factory for their business on the site thereby conveyed to them, a right of way over land of the corporation from that site to the airfield, and a right for the plaintiffs to use the airfield for flights for the purposes of their business at the factory. The factory was built and the plaintiffs' business was started up there, manufacturing aeroplanes; the corporation licensed, managed and controlled the airfield, and the plaintiffs used it for the purpose of their business for testing and so forth. At the outbreak of war the airfield was requisitioned by the Air Ministry and used by it for training purposes. In 1953 it was de-requisitioned and reverted to the control and management of the corporation as the municipal airport, the plaintiffs continuing their business at the factory. By 1957 the plaintiffs were no longer manufacturing aircraft, and thereafter used the factory for making airframes or parts thereof and hydraulic equipment for aircraft and other uses: the plaintiffs' need to use the aerodrome for test flying therefore no longer presently existed. The plaintiffs' use of the airfield was mainly for flying executives and staff in a group-owned plane to and from Cheltenham, where there was another centre of the group, or to and from the Continent, in particular Toulouse, in connection with hydraulic equipment for Concorde: such continental flights involved landing each way at some other airfield in England for customs clearance. Prior to 1970 the corporation was arriving at the conclusion that the Barnhurst site was not worth its upkeep as a municipal airport, and it has not formed any part of the plaintiffs' case that when it was closed as such it was, on any construction of s 163 of the Local Government Act 1933, still required for the purpose of a municipal airport. The evidence as to recent user of the airfield by the plaintiffs for the purpose of their business at the factory was that there were the following flight movements, i.e. take-off or landing in recent years: 1967—26; 1968—56; 1969—16; 1970—nil. These figures may not be absolutely complete, but to judge from the evidence as a whole they appear to me sufficiently to indicate the small degree of flight user by the plaintiffs. I should say that the plaintiffs never operated a flying school and so did not pay the £50 per annum for that user.

For some years the corporation had delegated or sub-contracted the management and control of the airfield to Don Everall (Aviation) Ltd. The corporation decided, with effect from the end of December 1970, not to renew this management arrangement, not to continue the airfield as a municipal aerodrome, and no longer to license the airfield, nor to maintain it as such. At the same time the corporation resolved to exercise its powers under s 163 to re-appropriate the airfield 'for planning purposes'. That section permits the site to be so re-appropriated by the corporation if it is 'not required for the purposes for which it was acquired or . . . appropriated'; but the section also contains a proviso that such re-appropriation was subject to rights such as were conferred on the plaintiffs by the 1936 conveyance in respect of the airfield site. Accordingly, thus far the re-appropriation, if valid, does not impinge on the plaintiffs' rights in respect of the airfield and is no breach of contract or obligation by the corporation. But the plaintiffs are anxious to establish that the re-appropriation was invalid for the following reason. The 'planning purpose' that the corporation has in mind is a comprehensive development of the area for housing, including streets, shops, schools and so forth. In order to achieve this in spite of the plaintiffs' rights they must (a) have validly re-appropriated, (b) obtain planning permission: the latter must come from the Secretary of State, since the re-appropriation involves departure from the relevant development plan. Application for such permission has been made; an inquiry has been held and the inspector has reported; the Secretary of State is deferring decision pending this litigation.

Now the crucial point is that if and when that permission is granted, the corporation will, by virtue of s 127 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, be able to carry out the necessary works and effectively to destroy such airfield rights as the plaintiffs have, on payment of compensation as provided by that section. It is in order to avoid that possible—it may be probable—outcome that the plaintiffs contend that there has not been a valid appropriation for planning purposes on the ground that it could a not be said that the airfield site is not required for use as an airfield, having regard to the existence of the rights of the plaintiffs under the 1936 conveyance which exist and are expressed to endure for the rest of the 99 year period. It was contended that it is for the court to decide whether the factual precondition of non-requirement existed; that it was not necessary to show that the corporation had acted mala fide, nor that no local authority on the facts could reasonably form the view that land was not required for airfield purposes; that the airfield purpose of the original appropriation or acquisition included flight use by the plaintiffs who still require so to use it, and accordingly the airfield purpose was not spent; that if the question was whether the corporation required the land for the airfield purpose, they did so require it in order that they could continue to give effect to their obligations to the plaintiffs; that on the evidence the land was required for use as such by the plaintiffs both now and potentially to a greater extent in the future should they revert to manufacture of aircraft requiring flight testing.

c The corporation contended, on the basis of the decision of Maugham J in *Attorney-General v Manchester Corpn*¹, that the question whether the land was not relevantly required was for the decision of the local authority acting bona fide and not for the court; and further, that in any event the evidence as to airfield user by the plaintiffs in the present and future was so exiguous, tenuous and speculative that on any sensible construction of s 163, if it was for the court, the land was not relevantly required.

d Some matters somewhat peripheral to the essential question were debated as to the rights conferred by the 1936 conveyance on the plaintiffs. Since December 1970 there has been no use at all of the airfield for flights by the plaintiffs. I understand that even if the field were now sought to be used for flying in and out of the plaintiffs' personnel in the plaintiffs' own aircraft—in which case I gather no licence as an airfield is required—it could not be so used unless the grass is mown at least for appropriate runways. If the corporation refuse (as they do) to do that—I suppose probably in breach of their covenant to do all in their power to maintain the surface in a satisfactory state for flight use by the plaintiffs—and if there is no right of self help in that regard in the plaintiffs, I apprehend that it would be on any footing difficult to deny that the land was not relevantly required. On this point three questions were debated: whether a right such as the present one if granted is capable in law of being an easement; if so, whether it was purported to be granted, or was left as a matter purely of covenant; and whether, even if there was a valid grant of an easement, on the true construction of the instrument a right of self help on the particular point was embodied or implicit in the grant. For these purposes, of course, one must consider what the plaintiffs could have done since 1970, the appropriation or purported appropriation being irrelevant. As at present advised, I am minded to answer each of these three questions in favour of the plaintiffs. As to the first, if this had been expressed in terms of a grant (as was the right of way over the green strip leading to the airfield from the plaintiffs' factory site) I do not see in principle why such a right cannot exist as an easement. A tendency in the past to freeze the categories of easements has been overtaken by the defrosting operation in *Re Ellenborough Park, Re Davis (decd), Powell v Maddison*²; and see *Gale on Easements*³, on positive easements. As to the second point, it was stressed for the corporation that these flight rights were framed in covenant, in sharp contrast with the grant of the green right of way; but it is clear that an easement may be created as a result of covenant (see *Gale*³); it may well be that the draftsman in 1936 was apprehensive that it might be held that a right of this character if framed only in grant might be held not capable of being regarded as an easement and so be wholly inoperative; but that does not mean that, if it could operate in grant, covenant cannot embrace the equivalent. It is also to be observed that the benefit is in terms to be attached to the factory site in the hands of successors. As to the third point, the plaintiffs are to be allowed to use the airport for relevant flights for a minimum of 99 years; the corporation covenants, so far as lies in its power, to maintain the surface in a condition enabling the user by the plaintiffs; it seems to me that if business efficacy is to be given to this agreement, detailed and fully drawn though it be, it should be taken to be part and parcel of the easement that if the corporation cannot, or in breach does not, mow the grass sufficiently for landing and take-off, the plaintiffs may enter and do what is needed. In any event, for the purpose of deciding the point in this appeal, I am prepared to assume those three points in the plaintiffs' favour. Accordingly, I approach the question of non-requirement on the footing that when the resolution for appropriation for planning purposes was passed by the corporation in January 1971, the land in question was neither in fact nor in law incapable of relevant airfield user by the plaintiffs.

The question whether land is not required for the purpose for which it was acquired has long been posed in statutory enactments relating to corporations and authorities with the ability compulsorily to acquire land. In general the situation was that land not so required had to be disposed of; it was regarded as basically wrong that it should be retained for some other purpose when the authority no longer needed it for the purpose for which it was compulsorily acquired. Subsequently, the statutory system has been to allow a local authority in such a case to appropriate the land to some other purpose for which it has powers of compulsory acquisition, I suppose to avoid the double step of (a) sale and (b) further compulsory acquisition. Section 163 of the Local Government Act 1933 is one example: as originally enacted, the exercise of the power of appropriation required the approval of the Minister, but that requirement was later dropped by amendment. It is a curious fact that no decision directly on this point is to be found, save in that of Maugham J in *Attorney-General v Manchester Corpn*¹. The question there arose under s 175 of the Public Health Act 1875, as amended by s 95 of the Public Health Acts (Amendment) Act 1907: thereunder land not required for the purpose for which it had been acquired might be appropriated for any other purpose, etc, etc. The terms of the statutory provision were not relevantly different from that now under consideration. The land in question had been acquired for street improvements, and the corporation purported to appropriate it for the purpose of a tuberculosis dispensary with the approval (then required) of the Minister of Health. One argument was whether inconsistent public rights had been acquired over the site; but the question was also raised whether the site could be said to be not required for the purpose for which it had been acquired. Maugham J said this²:

'I have already said that in my view prima facie the defendant Corporation, having acquired lands for a particular purpose, and having applied the lands with an intention that that application should be permanent, are not entitled to alter the purpose in question and to apply the land for a different one except under proper statutory authority or except under, it may be, the provisions of a general Act enabling them to do so. This leads me to what I consider to be the real point of this case—namely, the true construction of s. 95 of the Public Health Acts (Amendment) Act, 1907, which I have already mentioned. That section was no doubt passed, or partly passed, to prevent the evil which it was thought arose from the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of *Attorney-General v. Hanwell Urban District Council*³. The headnote says (inter alia): "A local authority have no power to apply permanently land which they have acquired for one purpose to another purpose inconsistent with the original purpose, even though the land cannot possibly be required for that original purpose, and a they will be restrained from so doing at the suit of the Attorney-General.” Sect. 95 provides that [his Lordship read the section, and continued:] Two questions arise under that section which are, I think, of considerable importance and of some difficulty. In the first place the question arises, What is the meaning of the phrase “not required for the purposes for which those lands have been acquired”? Who is to be the judge of that? Is it a question of fact on which

b the Court may express an opinion, or is it a question on which the determination of the local authority is to prevail? In answering that question, I think that I have to compare s. 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875. That section, after providing power to purchase, goes on to say: [His Lordship read the section, and continued:] I think that in such a case, either under s. 175 of the earlier Act, or under s. 95 of the amending Act, the local authority, acting in good faith, must be the sole c judges of whether the land is no longer required, or is not required for the purpose for which the land was acquired. Of course they must act honestly. I need hardly say that the contrary is not suggested here. But I do not see any ground for thinking that the Court can substitute its judgment upon such a question for the local authority who are given by these Acts wide powers of local government. Accordingly, I must take it that, in the circumstances of this case, it has been
d determined in good faith by the Corporation that the land in question is not required for the purpose for which it was acquired in 1875.’

Later, in discussing whether public rights over the site had been acquired, he said this¹:

e ‘I should add that consideration of the sort of case to which s. 95 may apply must lead to the conclusion that, in the normal case, public rights will almost necessarily be affected by the alteration of the purposes for which land of the character in question has been appropriated. For example, it may be an open space, a swimming bath, or a market; in each of these cases people living in the neighbourhood have acquired some kind of right in relation to the land, while it is being used for that purpose. In the case of a market acquired by a local f authority under a special Act, or under a general Act, it may very well be that people have built their shops or have constructed offices in the neighbourhood in reliance on the proximity of the market. It may be that such circumstances have arisen that it is unnecessary in the public interest any longer to retain that market.’

g It is to be observed that in that last sentence the judge treats ‘required’ as meaning needed or necessary in the public interest. It is true that at that time the appropriation could not be a first step on the road to extinction (with compensation) of private rights saved by, for example, the proviso to s 163, because there was then no equivalent of s 127 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971; but the subsequent introduction of that equivalent cannot alter the construction of and approach to s 163. Now that decision, on an indistinguishable section, has, we are told, been ever since
h noticed in relevant textbooks without adverse comment. Counsel were unable to find any criticism in any learned articles, over a period in which there has been intensive study and analysis of the powers of the court to disagree with and substitute its own view of the validity of administrative acts for that of, for example, a local authority. Moreover, it is by no means without significance, and is indeed persuasive—
i though not, of course, conclusive—that the legislature has enacted the same formula in statutes subsequent to that clear decision. Further, for my part, I consider the decision to be correct. It is a function of a local authority to study and keep under review the needs of the inhabitants of the locality and to exercise to the best of its ability its powers with those needs in mind. This must involve the authority in consideration of the relative importance of different needs, not least in connection with the use to which lands of the authority are to be put for the public benefit. I would construe 'not required' in the section as meaning 'not needed in the public interest of the locality' for the original purpose: and it appears that Maugham J¹ so construed them. Now that question, it is plain to me, involves matters both of degree and of comparative needs, as to which there can be no question but that the local authority is better qualified than the court to judge, assuming it to be acting bona fide and not on a view that no reasonable local authority could possibly take. In the present case lack of bona fides is no longer pursued, the abandonment of the site as a municipal airport is in no way criticised, and I can see no ground for holding that the decision of Maugham J¹, with which I agree, is not directly applicable. Moreover, insofar as the degree of private need for use of the airfield as such is said to be relevant, the evidence of likely need to use it for purposes of the plaintiffs' business (other than flight testing of aircraft manufactured at the plaintiffs' factory) is extremely small in extent and related to convenience rather than need; and the evidence directed to the possibility of future manufacture of aircraft, for which it might fairly be said that there would be a need for the airfield, is purely speculative and on balance of probability unlikely. In this context the manufacture of VTOL² and STOL³ aircraft (mentioned as conceivable possibilities) would require some concreting of the surface which in my view the corporation could not be required to do, nor the plaintiffs entitled to do; but even were my view wrong on that last point, it would not alter my view on the question of degree of private need for use of the airfield as such. It was argued for the plaintiffs that authority showed that the court will always enquire into and decide on the existence of a factual pre-condition of an administrative step; that non-requirement here was such; and that the views of Maugham J¹ were erroneous. It seems to me that this depends on what is meant by a factual pre-condition, or rather what sort of factual pre-condition is in question. We were referred to *Eshugbayi Eleko v Officer administering the Government of Nigeria (Administering Officer)*⁴, where the administrative or executive step that was challenged could only be taken if the appellant was a native chief in the particular area. That, of course, was a simple factual precondition which the court was as competent to decide as anyone else. In *Re Ripon (Highfield) Housing Order 1938, Applications of White and Collins*⁵ a compulsory order was quashed on the ground that the land formed part of a park, and such land was excluded from the power of compulsory purchase: a similar type of case. *Attorney-General v Pontypridd Urban District Council*⁶ does not in my view assist the plaintiffs on this point. There the authority proposed to erect on part of land acquired for electricity generation purposes, a substantial refuse destruction plant: the court held that in fact and law the plant was not an ancillary part of the electricity generating station, although it was proposed to use some of the heat engendered by the plant in aid of the generating station. Reliance was perhaps primarily placed on *Attorney-General v Teddington Urban District Council*⁷. In that case the authority had acquired land for sewage disposal purposes; some of it was not immediately required to be used or laid out for that purpose, and the authority proposed in the meantime to lay it out as pleasure grounds. Under the Public Health Act 1875, s 175, land if not required for the purposes for which it had been acquired was to be sold: there was not then the power of appropriation to other purposes introduced by the 1907 Act. It is correct to say that Romer J considered evidence on whether the land was required for its original purpose and concluded that the probable growth of population made it necessary to retain the land as reserve land available for sewage disposal. He also dealt at length with a the main matter argued, concluding that the authority was entitled to make temporary other use of the land provided that its treatment for that use was not inconsistent with its availability for sewage disposal purposes. That case is not I think inconsistent with the Manchester case¹: it does not seem to have been argued that it was for the authority only to determine the question of requirement: it may be that it was thought that special considerations might arise when the land was not reasonably immediately required for use for the particular purpose. Further, it may have been thought that where the alternative was only sale and not appropriation to some other public purpose, there was not quite the same element of judgment of differing public needs in the problem. In any event, I would follow the decision in the Manchester case¹ if there be a conflict not hitherto observed.

b Accordingly, in my judgment, the contention that the appropriate resolution was invalid on the ground that the land was still required for the purpose for which it was originally acquired or appropriated is unsound and the appeal should be dismissed.

c There may be other matters to be considered in other proceedings which I do not propose should be now decided. As I have observed, the appropriation resolution, if valid, does not constitute a breach of the corporation's obligations under the 1936 conveyance. There may, however, have been other breaches of the plaintiffs' rights since December 1970 which may or may not have been the cause of damage; for example, failure to do what lay within the power of the corporation to keep the surface in a satisfactory condition: against any actionable inconvenience caused by that would however, I suppose, be offset the unpaid £50 per annum. I gather that at some stage the corporation asserted that any use by the plaintiffs of the airfield after the resolution would be a trespass; but this was not treated by the plaintiffs as a repudiation and is not now asserted. Again, if by chance the planning permission for comprehensive development is not forthcoming, the questions of the ability of the plaintiffs to take any and what steps by way of self help may become of more importance for decision than as merely marginal to the present decision and therefore at present suitable for a merely tentative view and assumption. My understanding of what was said in the course of debate was that these matters, the rights of the plaintiffs and the nature of those rights, under the 1936 conveyance and the two subsequent agreements, were to be open and not concluded by the present proceedings, whether for assessment of compensation under s 127 or otherwise.

d BUCKLEY LJ. In 1935 the defendant corporation in part acquired and in part appropriated the land which thereafter became the site of the Pendeford Airport for the purposes of an aerodrome. In November 1936 the corporation conveyed to the plaintiff company, whom I will call 'Boulton Paul', the site adjoining the airfield which Boulton Paul has since used as a factory. The conveyance contained in cl 3 (ii) a covenant to allow Boulton Paul the use of the airport for the purpose of test, delivery and other flights in connection with their business of designing, manufacturing, assembling and repairing aircraft and parts thereof and accessories thereto for 99 years or such longer period as the site should be used as a municipal aerodrome. From 1938 until the end of 1970 (subject to a period of requisitioning during and after the war) the airfield was used as an aerodrome by Boulton Paul as well as by members of the public. In consequence, however, of a change in the nature of their business carried on at the factory, Boulton Paul's use of the airfield became very much reduced in the year 1957, when they ceased to manufacture aircraft at the factory, and therefore was virtually confined to executive flights in private aircraft owned by Boulton Paul. These were not numerous, amounting to only 26 movements in 1967, 56 in 1968 and 16 in 1969. There were none in 1970. In December 1970 the corporation closed the airport, since when there has been no traffic there. On 4th January 1971

the council of the corporation approved an earlier resolution of its town planning committee that approximately 213 acres of land held by the corporation for aerodrome purposes under the Civil Aviation Act 1949 be appropriated for planning purposes under the Town and Country Planning Acts 1962-1968. This refers to the Pendeford Airport.

The use in this resolution of the expression 'planning purposes' is no doubt to be attributed to the presence of those words in the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, s 127. The meaning of this term is not statutorily defined, and it might perhaps be thought that the resolution was not in terms which amounted to an appropriation to any particular purpose. It has not, however, been suggested that the resolution was ineffective on any such ground.

The question which we have to decide in this case turns on the construction of the Local Government Act 1933, s 163, as now amended. Under sub-s (1) of that section, land which has been acquired or appropriated by a local authority for or to a particular purpose may be appropriated for another purpose if, but only if, it answers to the description of 'any land belonging to a local authority and not required for the purposes for which it was acquired or has since been appropriated'. Part VII of that Act, within which s 163 is to be found, deals with the acquisition of, and dealings in, land by local authorities. Sections 157-162 are concerned with the acquisition of land by agreement or compulsorily. They empower a local authority to acquire land for the purposes of any of its functions under that or any other public general Act. It is common ground that a local authority which has in the exercise of its statutory powers acquired land for one purpose cannot thereafter appropriate it for use (not being a temporary use) for another purpose without statutory authority. The statutory power of re-appropriation here relied on is found in s 163. Accordingly, the question for decision is whether, at the date in January 1971 of the corporation's resolution re-appropriating the land for planning purposes, the area so re-appropriated was land which was no longer required for the purpose of an airport.

Counsel for the plaintiffs says that the corporation have never expressly declared that this site is no longer required as an airport, but have on the contrary from time to time recognised that it is still required by reason of the corporation's contractual obligation to Boulton Paul. He further contends that in establishing the airport the corporation had not this single object in view, but a dual purpose of which the primary and more important element was to make an airfield available to Boulton Paul and the secondary and less important element was the establishment of a municipal public airport. I feel unable to accept this latter submission, for on the facts it seems to me to be clear that the corporation acquired and appropriated this site for the single purpose of establishing an airport there, among the users of which would be Boulton Paul, but which would also be available for use by members of the public.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, in the course of his helpful argument, has strenuously contended that so long as the corporation's contractual obligations to Boulton Paul under the conveyance of 30th November 1936 remain in force, as they still do, the corporation cannot in law properly contend that it does not require the site as an aerodrome. I was at one stage attracted by this proposition. I have, however, reached the conclusion that having regard to the language and context of s 163 it is unsound. The Local Government Act 1933 is an Act dealing with the constitution, powers and duties of local authorities, and with their powers and duties, inter alia, in relation to the provision of services and facilities for the public in their areas. In this context, in my judgment, the question whether land belonging to a local authority is or is not required for the purpose for which it was originally acquired or has been appropriated must be answered on a broad view of local needs. In the present case I think we have to consider whether at the relevant date as a practical matter there was a need for an airport on this site. In answering this question I think that all relevant circumstances must be taken into account. For instance, it would not be right, I think, to shut one's eyes to such matters as the cost of maintenance and operation. Was the need of such a a kind and extent that this expenditure would have been justified? It would, in my opinion, be ridiculous to suppose that the corporation could be bound to continue to operate the airfield merely because the owners of one or two privately-owned aircraft might find it convenient. I do not suggest that profitability necessarily or alone would be a satisfactory test. There might be local and special reasons which would make it desirable for a local authority to operate an airfield at a loss. The test can, I think, be formulated in some such way as this: taking all relevant considerations into account, can it sensibly be said that there is as a practical matter a need for an airfield on the site?

b For the corporation, much reliance has been placed on the decision of Maugham J in *Attorney-General v Manchester Corpn*¹, where the learned judge held that under the Public Health Acts (Amendment) Act 1907, s 95 (the language of which was in essentials the same as the language which we have to consider), the local authority, acting in good faith, must be the sole judge whether the land is or is not any longer required for the purpose for which it was acquired. Boulton Paul, on the other hand, have drawn the attention of this court to *Attorney-General v Teddington Urban District Council*², where Romer J, confronted with the question whether land acquired by a local authority for sewage purposes was still required for those purposes, found no difficulty in determining that question himself on the evidence adduced before him. They also relied on the observations of Luxmoore LJ in *Re Ripon (Highfield) Housing Order 1938, Applications of White and Collins*³, to the effect that, where jurisdiction to make or confirm an order is dependent on the existence of a particular state of facts, it seems almost self-evident that the court which has to consider whether there is such jurisdiction must be entitled to review the vital finding on which the existence of the jurisdiction relied on depends. Precisely similar reasoning, they say, applies in the present case where the power to re-appropriate is dependent on the fact that the land is no longer required for the purposes for which it was acquired or has been appropriated.

c Had the matter been res integra, I think that I should have been at least tempted to take a different view from that taken by Maugham J in *Attorney-General v Manchester Corpn*¹, but I agree that, since his decision in that case seems to have survived more than 40 years without attracting any adverse comment, during which period Parliament in the 1933 Act has employed the same form of words, which Maugham J held to make the local authority the sole judge of fact, we ought to follow his decision. But whether this be right or not can make no difference, in my opinion, to the result of this appeal: for if the court should be the judge of fact, I think that the finding should coincide with the view of the corporation. The corporation clearly acted on the view that the aerodrome was no longer required. The evidence has fully satisfied me that at the date of the resolution and at the present time this site was not and is not required as an aerodrome. It is true that the corporation's contractual obligations to Boulton Paul remain in force and that the corporation may have acted in breach of them and be liable to Boulton Paul accordingly; but those obligations are not such, in my opinion, that the court should compel their specific performance. Boulton Paul's present need to use the airfield is on the evidence very small. It is limited to the use of the airfield for executive flights, which really does not amount to more than a convenience. There is evidence which suggests that in certain eventualities Boulton Paul might wish to make use of the airport in connection with its business to a much greater extent, but this cannot be said to be at all predictable.

d In my judgment, the evidence shows that the condition of the power to re-appropriate contained in s 163 is satisfied in the present case. Accordingly, in my judgment, the re-appropriation was valid. I would dismiss this appeal.

I add that I agree with the views expressed by Russell LJ on the question whether the covenant operated in equity to create an easement in favour of Boulton Paul, and the consequent right of Boulton Paul to carry out such work on the airfield as may be necessary to enable them to enjoy that easement. Indeed, I think that entering on the airfield and mowing the grass may properly be regarded as an exercise of the easement rather than of an ancillary right.

LAWTON LJ. I agree with both the judgments already delivered so far as they deal with the facts and the effect of the covenant whereby Dowty Boulton Paul Ltd acquired rights to use the airfield. I am mindful, however, of the submission made by counsel for the corporation that it was not competent for this court (there being no allegation of perversity or bad faith) to decide on the evidence whether the airfield was still required for the purposes for which it was acquired or appropriated in 1935. In my judgment, counsel's submission was well-founded. It is supported by Maugham J's judgment in *Attorney-General v Manchester Corpn*¹. I would follow that case.

As Russell LJ has dealt with the history of s 163 of the Local Government Act 1933, I can turn at once to its construction. In its context it is one of ten sections which authorise local authorities to acquire and dispose of land; and having been acquired, land may be sold, if it is not required for the purpose for which it was acquired, or exchanged for other land (see s 165).

When exchanging land a local authority, which is not a parish council, has no restriction of any kind on its powers save the need to obtain the consent of the Minister if s 26 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1959 applies. Since it is clearly the right of a local authority to decide for itself when to acquire and exchange land for the purposes of local government it would, so it seems to me, be an odd result if it could neither change its mind as to the purpose for which it wanted to use land already acquired nor decide when to sell without the possibility of the court intervening. Negotiating to buy land from a local authority would be a frustrating and long-drawn out undertaking if an aggrieved person, or the Attorney-General in a relator action, could intervene by asking the court to adjudge that the local authority had no right to sell because there was evidence that the land available for sale was still required for the purpose for which it had been acquired. Drafting requisitions on title to find out whether land was still required for the purpose for which it had been acquired might necessitate a long probe into local affairs. I agree with Maugham J that there is no ground for thinking that the court can substitute its judgment on such a question for that of a local authority which has been given by the 1933 Act wide powers of local government.

I appreciate that *Attorney-General v Manchester Corpn*¹ appears to be in conflict on this point with *Attorney-General v Teddington Urban District Council*². I am unable to reconcile the two cases; but, like Russell LJ, I would follow the Manchester case¹.

A factor which has weighed heavily with me in preferring the Manchester case¹ to the Teddington case² is the fact that it has been in the Law Reports now for 42 years and, as far as the researches of counsel have been able to discover, it has never been doubted either in any judgment or in any textbook. These years have seen a greater use of statutory powers than at any time in our history, and the exercise of these powers has been under constant scrutiny by the courts which have not hesitated to exercise their supervisory powers if the law and the facts called for intervention. In a recent book entitled 'Final Appeal', which is a study of the House of Lords in its judicial capacity, the authors³ list 25 appeals during the period 1952 to 1971 in which important points of public law have been considered and in many of them the supervisory

- f Two plain clothes police officers in a police car saw the respondent motorist driving a car fast and erratically. The officers followed him for three miles to a holiday camp where he lived; as they followed him they sent out a radio call requesting the attendance of a traffic patrol car. They did not attempt to overtake the respondent as they thought it would be dangerous to do so. When the respondent had finally stopped in the holiday camp they drew up beside him, identified themselves and asked him to await the arrival of the traffic patrol car. He did so remaining in the driving seat of his car. Five minutes later the traffic patrol car arrived with uniformed officers. One of the plain clothes officers then brought the respondent over to the traffic control car and in the presence of the respondent told a uniformed officer how the respondent had driven. The uniformed officer noticed that the respondent's breath smelt of drink and then asked the respondent for a specimen of breath, which proved positive. A subsequent laboratory test revealed a blood-alcohol proportion above the prescribed limit. The respondent was charged with an offence under s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. The justices dismissed the charge, on a submission of no case to answer, on the ground that the uniformed officer had no power under s 2 (1)^a of the 1967 Act to require the respondent to take a breath test. On appeal,

Provided that no requirement may be made by virtue of paragraph (b) of this subsection unless it is made as soon as reasonably practicable after the commission of the traffic offence.'

Held – The justices had been right to dismiss the information. The uniformed officer had no power under s 2 (1) to require a breath test since his suspicion that the respondent had alcohol in his body or had committed a moving traffic offence had not been formed at a time when the respondent was driving, but only some five minutes after the respondent had reached the end of his journey and when he was effectively prevented from driving by the plain clothes officers (see p 508 g and h, post).

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the borough of Weymouth and Melcombe Regis acting in and for the borough in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Weymouth on 28th July 1972.

1. On 27th June 1972 an information was preferred by the appellant, Christopher Edkins, against the respondent, Kenneth James Knowles, that he on 25th April 1972 drove a certain motor vehicle, namely a motor transit van on a certain road called a Littlemoor Road, he having consumed alcohol in such a quantity that the proportion thereof in his blood as ascertained from a laboratory test for which he subsequently provided a specimen under s 3 of the Road Safety Act 1967 exceeded the prescribed limit at the time he provided the specimen, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967.

2. The justices, after hearing the evidence for the prosecution, found the following facts. (a) On 25th April 1972 at about 11 p m the respondent drove a vehicle in Littlemoor Road at a fast speed and swung across the centre of the road three or four times. His driving was observed by two plain clothes officers travelling in a CID car after they had been overtaken by the respondent. The two officers followed the respondent, during which time two further instances of bad driving occurred. The second of those involved the respondent's vehicle overtaking two vehicles where the road started to dip down and swept into a right-hand bend. The two officers kept the respondent's vehicle in sight and followed him for something over three miles into a holiday camp, which at that particular time of year was not open to visitors but in which the respondent was living. During the pursuit a wireless call was transmitted by the officers through a force controller, requesting the attendance of a traffic patrol car. No attempt had been made to overtake and stop the respondent, although the road was comparatively clear. The two officers did not stop the respondent's vehicle on the main road as they were of the opinion it was too dangerous to do so. (b) On arrival at the holiday camp the CID car was driven up close to the driver's door of the respondent's vehicle (then halted). The respondent was told about the manner of his driving by Det Con Robbins, an observer in the CID car, who identified himself to the respondent. The respondent was requested to await the arrival of the traffic patrol car and that he did remaining in the vehicle. Subsequently there was a conversation as to the ownership of the vehicle and about stolen goods, vans and antiques. (c) At some time up to five minutes later a Pc Knight arrived on the scene. On his arrival Pc Knight saw the respondent seated in the driving seat of the transit van and observed one of the CID officers bring him over to the police vehicle. Det Con Robbins then informed Pc Knight, in the presence and hearing of the respondent, of the circumstances of the alleged driving. Police constable Knight then asked the respondent whether he was the driver at the time of the described incident to which the respondent replied 'Yes'. While talking to the respondent Pc Knight noticed that his breath smelt strongly of alcohol. (d) Police constable Knight then had reasonable cause to suspect that the respondent had been the driver of the vehicle and that he had committed a moving traffic offence while the vehicle had been in motion and further that he had alcohol in his body. The constable then asked for a breath test and that proved positive. (e) The respondent was arrested; a further specimen was taken some 20 minutes later, and that test also proved positive. The testing procedure was then carried out, a sample of the respondent's urine was analysed and it contained not less than 174 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of urine.

3. It was contended by the respondent that there was no case for him to answer on the following grounds: (a) first, the breath specimen had been requested by the uniformed officer in a private place not being 'at or nearby' the public road on which it was alleged that the moving traffic offence had been committed; (b) secondly, the pursuit had not been made by a constable in uniform. Nor had the pursuit, the alleged bad driving, or the requirement to provide a specimen of breath, been part of the same sequence of events. The justices were referred to passages from *Sakhujia v Allen*¹ and in particular to passages in the judgments of Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC² and Lord Pearson³.

j 4. No argument was addressed to the justices by the appellant.

5. The justices retired with their clerk and came to the following conclusions: (a) That there was evidence that the respondent had been driving a vehicle on a public road and that he had been required to take a breath test 'there or nearby'. (b) That the respondent was not quoad Pc Knight 'a person driving or attempting to drive a vehicle'. At the time that officer formed his suspicion the respondent was no longer in the vehicle and his journey was complete. (c) The justices considered the reference to the Scottish case of *Copeland v McPherson*¹ in Boney, 'The Road Safety Act, 1967'², and so commenced with an argument diametrically opposed to the conclusion which the justices finally came to. It seemed to them that such a conclusion rendered s 2 (2) of the Act unnecessary. If suspicion might thus be related to an unobserved driving then the time element became largely irrelevant and any uniformed officer was thus empowered to test any motorist of whom complaint had been made by an informer and indeed the necessity of producing a uniformed officer would merely permit delay. (d) Looking carefully at the ratio decidendi of *Pinner v Everett*³, 'although a man may still be driving (a car) within the meaning of the section after his (car) has stopped and he is no longer in the driving seat this will only be the case if the reason for the stopping (of the car) and his absence from the driving seat is connected with the driving'. The justices concluded that the driving could not be extended for some two to five minutes to await the arrival of the witness, Pc Knight. They considered the passages to which they had been referred in *Sakhuja v Allen*⁴ and other parts of that judgment. There the meaning of 'driving or attempting to drive' was not interpreted conclusively and *Pinner v Everett*³ remained therefore an authority to which they had to give weight. *Sakhuja v Allen*⁴ did, however, suggest a further criteria—that there should be a sequence, thus avoiding the use of artificial limits of time and description. Thus in the present case if one extended the 'driving' to the time at which the uniformed officer arrived one lost the sequence. That avoided the artificial interpretation whereby a strange officer might be brought to any person who had completed a journey and then formed a suspicion and the difficulty which would arise if some doctrine on the lines of 'instant pursuit' was not accepted. (e) It appeared to the justices that the section required a relationship between constable and driver and that to dismiss the case would be to reason within the limits of the two latter cases.

Accordingly the justices dismissed the information. The appeal first came before the court (Lord Widgery CJ, Ashworth and Bridge JJ) on 5th March 1973 when it was adjourned for hearing before a full court of five judges.

N R Blaker QC and D C Jenkins for the appellant.

J B R Hazan QC and D A Paiba for the respondent.

Cur adv vult

4th May. GRIFFITHS J read the following judgment of the court at the request of Lord Widgery CJ. This is an appeal by way of case stated by the justices of the borough of Weymouth and Melcombe Regis from their decision dismissing an information which charged the respondent with driving a motor vehicle on a road at a time when the level of alcohol in his blood exceeded the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967.

The justices found the following facts. At about 11 p m two plain clothes police officers in a police car saw the respondent driving fast and erratically. They followed a him for about three miles to a disused holiday camp where he was living; as they followed they sent out a wireless call requesting the attendance of a traffic patrol car. They did not attempt to overtake and stop the respondent as they thought it would be too dangerous to do so. But when the respondent finally stopped in the holiday camp they drew up beside him, identified themselves, and asked him to await the arrival of the traffic patrol car. The respondent did so remaining seated in his car. About five minutes later the traffic patrol car arrived with uniformed officers. b A plain clothes officer then brought the respondent over to the traffic patrol car and in the presence of the respondent told a uniformed officer, Pc Knight, how the respondent had driven. Police constable Knight noticed that the respondent's breath smelt strongly of alcohol. As a result of what he had been told and smelt, Pc Knight then had reasonable grounds to suspect the respondent of having committed a traffic offence whilst the vehicle was in motion and of driving whilst he had alcohol in his body. c The constable asked for a breath test which proved positive. The respondent was arrested and the prescribed testing procedure followed, which revealed that his urine contained 174 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of urine, well above the permitted limit.

d The respondent did not give evidence, but it was submitted on his behalf that he had no case to answer on the grounds that Pc Knight had no right to require him to take a breath test. The first submission was that the breath specimen had not been requested 'nearby' a road or other public place. The justices rightly rejected that submission.

e The second submission was that the respondent could not lawfully have been required to take a breath test, as he had ceased driving before a constable in uniform had reasonable grounds to suspect him of having alcohol in his body or of having committed a moving traffic offence. This submission was based on the recent decision of the House of Lords in *Sakhuja v Allen*¹. In that case all the members of the appellate committee held that the requirement to take a breath test under s 2 (1) of the Act did not have to be made whilst the motorist was driving or attempting to drive so long as it formed part of a relevant single transaction or chain of events flowing from the driving. f But there was a difference of opinion as to the time at which the constable in uniform must suspect the motorist of having alcohol in his body, or of having committed a moving traffic offence. Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC and Viscount Dilhorne, on their construction of s 2 (1), held that the suspicion did not have to arise whilst the motorist was driving or attempting to drive; it sufficed if the uniformed constable had reasonable grounds for suspicion at the time he required a breath test, provided the driving, the suspicion and the requirement formed part of a continuous chain of events forming a single transaction. g The majority however held that in the previous decision of *Pinner v Everett*² the House of Lords had decided that the requirement for a breath test was not valid unless the constable in uniform formed a suspicion while the motorist was still driving that he had alcohol in his body, or had committed a moving traffic offence. Undoubtedly many of the difficult problems of fact that arise in attempting to determine whether at a given moment in time a motorist is driving would be avoided, and the Act would be much easier to administer, if this court was free to follow Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC and Viscount Dilhorne. It would result in the conviction of the respondent, and many might see little injustice in that considering he was driving with approaching double the prescribed limit of alcohol in his blood. But we are bound by the majority, h and short of reconsideration of *Pinner v Everett*² by the House of Lords, it must now be taken as settled that the suspicion of a constable in uniform must arise while the j motorist is driving or attempting to drive, before he can be required to take a breath test. a

Whether the motorist is driving at the relevant time is a question of fact to be determined by the justices, directing themselves to the same considerations as a judge would direct a jury in his summing-up. *Pinner v Everett*¹ and other decisions provide guidance as to the considerations that are relevant in determining this question. The court has considered all these decisions and it is not necessary to lengthen this judgment by an elaborate citation of authority. Whilst it is not possible to reconcile all the decisions one with another, the court is satisfied that their collective effect may be summarised as follows: b

(1) The vehicle does not have to be in motion; there will always be a brief interval of time after the vehicle has been brought to rest and before the motorist has completed those operations necessarily connected with driving, such as applying the hand-brake, switching off the ignition and securing the vehicle, during which he must still be considered to be driving. c

(3) If a motorist is stopped by a constable in uniform who immediately forms the suspicion that the motorist has alcohol in his body, the motorist should be regarded as still driving at the moment when the suspicion is formed; but if an appreciable time elapses before the constable's suspicion is aroused it will be a question of fact and degree whether the motorist is still to be considered as driving at that time. e

(4) When a motorist has arrived at the end of his journey then subject to the brief interval referred to in (1) above he can no longer be regarded as driving. f

(5) When a motorist has been effectively prevented or persuaded from driving he can no longer be considered to be driving.

Returning now to the present case, the justices held that Pc Knight was not entitled to require a breath test, and dismissed the information. They were right to do so. The constable was only entitled to require a test if he had reasonable grounds of suspicion under s 2 (1) (a) or (b) at a time when the respondent was driving. In fact he did not form his suspicion until about five minutes after the respondent had reached the end of his journey and at a time when he was effectively prevented from driving by the plain clothes officers. On these facts the justices rightly concluded that the respondent was not driving when first suspected by Pc Knight. This appeal will therefore be dismissed. g

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused. h

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, LAWTON LJ AND ASHWORTH J

2nd APRIL, 4th MAY 1973

Road traffic – Driving with blood-alcohol proportion above prescribed limit – Evidence – Provision of specimen – Breath test – Requirement to take test – Person driving or attempting to drive – Issue whether accused driving or attempting to drive at relevant time – Issue of fact for jury – Proper direction to jury in clear cases – Road Safety Act 1967, s 2 (1).

S was driving his car when he was overtaken by another car driven by the appellant. Both vehicles stopped at a road junction. Thereupon S got out of his car and, telling the appellant that he was drunk, physically prevented him from continuing his journey by standing in front of the appellant's car. The appellant eventually pulled into the kerb and got out of his car. Some 15 minutes later S signalled a passing police patrol car, and explained to the uniformed police officers what had happened. They administered a breath test to the appellant which proved positive. A subsequent urine test revealed a blood-alcohol proportion above the prescribed limit. The appellant was charged with an offence under s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. The jury were directed that if they found the facts proved as testified by the prosecution witnesses they should convict the appellant on the basis that, as he was driving or attempting to drive at the time when the police officers formed their suspicion that he had alcohol in his body, they were entitled to require him to take a test under s 2 (1)^a of the 1967 Act. The appellant was convicted and appealed.

Held – The issue whether or not a motorist was driving or attempting to drive at the relevant time was one of fact for the jury, although in certain cases a judge, with his knowledge of the authorities, might have to indicate that the evidence was really all one way. In any event, since the appellant had been effectively prevented or dissuaded from driving before the police officers arrived, he could no longer be considered to be driving or attempting to drive for the purposes of s 2 (1) of the 1967 Act. Accordingly the appeal would be allowed and the conviction quashed (see p 511 e, p 512 a to c, post).

^a Section 2 (1) provides: 'A constable in uniform may require any person driving or attempting to drive a motor vehicle on a road or other public place to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test there or nearby, if the constable has reasonable cause—(a) to suspect him of having alcohol in his body; or (b) to suspect him of having committed a traffic offence while the vehicle was in motion. Appeal

On 22nd June 1972 in the Crown Court at Birmingham before Judge Ross and a jury the appellant, Edward John Bates, was convicted of driving a motor vehicle with a blood-alcohol concentration above the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. He was fined £150, payable on 22nd August 1972, or three months' imprisonment in default. He was also disqualified for 12 months. He appealed against his conviction on the ground that he was not driving or attempting to drive at the time when the constable in uniform had reasonable cause to suspect him of having alcohol in his body and the trial judge had been wrong in directing the jury to the contrary. At the conclusion of argument on 2nd April 1973 the Court of Appeal announced that the appeal would be allowed and the conviction quashed, and that reasons would be given at a later date. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. d

4th May. LORD WIDGERY CJ read the following judgment of the court. On 22nd June 1972 at the Birmingham Crown Court the appellant was convicted of driving a motor vehicle with a blood-alcohol concentration above the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 of the Road Safety Act 1967, and was fined the sum of £150 and disqualified for 12 months. He now appeals against his conviction. f

The facts are somewhat unusual. A Mr Smart was driving his car along Stechford Road, Birmingham, at about 2.45 p m on 11th December 1971. He was overtaken by another vehicle driven by the appellant in such a manner that when the two cars stopped at a road junction, Mr Smart got out, went ahead of the appellant's car and addressed the appellant saying 'What's your trouble?' The appellant made no reply, and Mr Smart smelling alcohol, and noticing that the appellant was drowsy, said: 'You're drunk.' He told the appellant to get out of his car; the appellant demurred and said he was going on. Mr Smart said: 'You're not going on', and Mr Smart then physically prevented the car from moving by standing in front of it. At Mr Smart's insistence the appellant pulled his car into the kerb and got out, and a conversation then followed which lasted a quarter of an hour. Throughout this conversation the appellant was asking whether he could not be allowed to go on, because he wanted to attend a football match, and Mr Smart was consistently responding that the appellant was not to go anywhere. Eventually, after this period of about a quarter of an hour, Mr Smart managed to attract the attention of a policeman in a patrol car, and when that car stopped he explained the situation to two police officers in uniform in the patrol car. The police officers then took over and administered a breath test which proved positive, whereupon they arrested the appellant. No issue arose at the trial as to the necessary statutory requirements relative to the obtaining of a laboratory g

b At the trial the facts to which I have briefly referred were spoken to by Mr Smart, and by the police officers in question. Counsel for the appellant indicated that he would not call evidence, and submitted that the appellant was not a person driving or attempting to drive at the time when the breath test was administered. Both the trial judge and counsel, relying on the decision of this court in *R v Kelly*¹, took the view that if the jury were satisfied on the facts as previously stated, the question of whether the appellant was driving or attempting to drive when the police officers approached, was a matter of law. The trial judge gave a reasoned ruling on this issue, concluding that as a matter of law the appellant was driving or attempting to drive at the relevant time. He accordingly directed the jury that if they found the facts as spoken to by the witnesses for the prosecution, they should, as a matter of law, convict of the offence charged, and this the jury did.

c The appeal as presented in this court has raised two main issues. First, whether it was possible to hold that the appellant was driving at the material time, when he had been physically prevented from driving in the manner above described. Secondly, whether it was right for the judge to rule, as a matter of law, that on the facts spoken to by Mr Smart, the appellant was driving. The first question also arose in the case in the Divisional Court of *Edkins v Knowles*², judgment in which has just been delivered. In that case also the accused had been physically prevented from driving by two plain clothes police officers who had indicated to him in the clearest terms that he was to wait by his vehicle until uniformed officers arrived. In the judgment of the full court in this latter case it was decided that a motorist who had been effectively prevented or dissuaded from driving could no longer be considered to be driving for present purposes. That in itself would justify this court in allowing the present appeal but we think it desirable to say a word or two about the second point which has undoubtedly been the subject of conflicting decisions, and is giving some difficulty in practice.

d *R v Kelly*¹ was similar to the present case in that, there again, there was no real dispute as to the facts. The motorist had stopped his car and left it, heading in the direction of a telephone box, when he was stopped by a police officer who suspected that the appellant had alcohol in his body. The trial judge heard argument from both counsel whether in those circumstances the officer's suspicion had been aroused at a time when the motorist was still driving, and informed counsel that he would direct the jury that that condition was satisfied. In this court the attitude of the judge in treating the matter as one of law on which he should give a direction to the jury was upheld, although e this court reached a different conclusion whether, as a matter of law, the necessary conditions of s 2 (1) were satisfied. In dealing with the propriety of giving the jury a ruling on this question, I said when giving the judgment of the court³:

f 'In cases where the primary facts are not in dispute and where, therefore, the only issue left is whether on those primary facts, and the authorities, the accused person is or is not driving, we think that the presiding judge must face the responsibility that the only matter outstanding is a matter of law and give his ruling on it.'

g Unfortunately this court, in *R v Kelly*¹, was not referred to the earlier judgment in *R v Jones (E.J.M)*⁴, where precisely the opposite view had been taken, and where Sachs LJ, in giving the judgment of the court, said⁵: 'The issue of whether an accused is driving at a relevant time is, of course, one of fact that has to be left to the jury'

(unless an admission is made) . . . Since the decision in *R v Kelly*¹ trial judges have been faced with these two conflicting authorities, and, as we have already said, some confusion has resulted. In future the authority of *R v Jones (EJM)*² should be followed, and the principle stated in *R v Kelly*¹ should be regarded as erroneous. Although we recognise the difficulty which trial judges will often have in summing-up such issues to a jury, we are impressed by the fact that the constitutional requirement that issues of fact should always be decided by the jury, and not be the subject of a direction, is a paramount consideration.

We think therefore that when a trial involves the question whether the motorist was or was not driving at the appropriate time, the issue should, in the end, be left to the jury. There will, of course, be cases in which the judge, with his knowledge of the authorities, may have to indicate to the jury that the argument is really all one way. In *Edkins v Knowles*³ this court summarised the main principles on which this issue depends, and if the judge finds that by applying those principles a conclusion one way or the other seems to him virtually inevitable, he is entitled in his discretion to make his views clear. We think, however, that in the end the matter should be left to the jury, and that for the future at any rate the principle of *R v Jones (EJM)*² should be preferred. The decision of the court having already been announced, those are the reasons on which that decision was based.

Appeal allowed. Conviction quashed.

- d The taxpayer company, a close company for the purposes of corporation tax, was also a trading company. During the accounting period from 6th April 1966 to 31st December 1966 it paid, under the provisions of a deed of covenant, a total sum of £53,354 as a donation to a charitable trust established in 1959. In November 1967 the inspector of taxes confirmed that under the Finance Act 1965, s 77, no action relating to shortfall in distributions was proposed to be taken in relation to the taxpayer company. In December 1968, however, the Revenue issued a notice to the taxpayer company, apportioning the sum of £53,354 for the purposes of surtax under the provisions of s 78 (2)^a of the Finance Act 1965. The Special Commissioners held that the apportionment had been validly made. On appeal by the taxpayer company, the Crown contended that s 78 (2) empowered them to make an apportionment of the income of a close company which was a trading company, and on which no shortfall assessment had been made under s 77, in respect of sums (such as covenanted donations to charity) which fell within s 78 (2), since s 78 (4), which prohibited an apportionment of the income of a trading company on which no shortfall assessment had been made, was expressed to be 'Subject to' sub-s (2).

- g Held – The taxpayer company's appeal would be allowed and the notice of apportionment discharged. Subsection (2) of s 78 did not contain an independent power to apportion income of a close company; its only function was to make an addition to the income to be apportioned if an apportionment was made under the powers conferred by sub-s (1) or sub-s (3) of s 78. The words 'Subject to' in s 78 (4) merely had the effect of demonstrating which provision was to prevail in the event of a conflict between sub-s (4) and the provisions to which it was expressed to be subject; h they did not imply that there must necessarily be a conflict between those provisions and so could not be taken to demonstrate that s 78 (2) allowed an apportionment to be made even if there had been no shortfall assessment. It followed that, since there had been no shortfall assessment on the taxpayer company in respect of the accounting period ended 31st December 1966, the amount of the covenanted donation to the charity could not be apportioned for surtax amongst the participators j of the taxpayer company (see p 520 a b e f and j to p 521 c and p 522 h, post).

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on 25th and 26th January 1971, C & J Clark Ltd ('the company') appealed against an apportionment of income of the company for the purposes of surtax made under the provisions of s 78 of the Finance Act 1965 for the accounting period from 6th April 1966 to 31st December 1966 as follows:

John Anthony Clark	689	5	11
Peter Thompson Clothier	536	19	4
Others	52,127	14	9
Total income apportioned	53,354	0	0	j

2. The sole question for decision was whether the apportionment could validly be made pursuant to the provisions of sub-s (2) of s 78 when, apart from those provisions, no apportionment fell to be made under the section.

3. The company's advisers had, since the commissioners' decision was given, brought to their notice information from which it appeared that there would unavoidably be much delay in agreeing figures pursuant thereto. They had asked the

a commissioners in those circumstances to state a case in principle, and, the Crown's representative having notified them that he supported that request, the commissioners acceded to it.

b 4. In a document proved or admitted before the commissioners there was set out a computation of the amount of the company's distributable income for the period from 6th April 1966 to 31st December 1966 (the amount as computed therein being £98,479), together with certain particulars of distributions (in which the amount of distributions computed to be apportionable to the period 6th April 1966 to 31st December 1966 was stated to be £35,662).

5. The following facts were admitted between the parties:

c (1) The company was incorporated on 16th November 1903 under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1900 with limited liability for the purpose of acquiring the business of boot and shoe manufacturers, paper box makers and other business at that time carried on by the firm of C & J Clark.

(2) The company was throughout the period relevant to the appeal, and remained, the parent company of the well-known group of companies which carried on in the main the business of boot and shoe manufacturers and distributors. The company carried on and was still carrying on the business of boot and shoe manufacturers.

d (3) The company's period of account ('the accounting period') from 2nd January 1966 to 31st December 1966 was an accounting period for the purposes of corporation tax.

e (4) The accounting period fell partly in the year 1965-66 and partly in the year 1966-67 and in pursuance of the provisions of para 14 of Sch 18 to the Finance Act 1965 the part of the accounting period from 2nd January to 5th April 1966 fell to be dealt with as a separate accounting period for the purposes of Chapter III of Part IX of the Income Tax Act 1952, and the part from 6th April to 31st December 1966 ('the relevant accounting period') fell to be dealt with as a separate accounting period for the purposes of ss 77 and 78 of the Finance Act 1965.

f (5) Throughout the relevant accounting period the issued share capital of the company was £5,068,282, divided into 50,000 5 per cent cumulative redeemable preference shares of £1 each, £100,000 5 per cent cumulative preference shares of £1 each and 4,918,282 ordinary shares of £1 each a majority of which was held by members of the Clark family and by trustees of their family trusts.

(6) The company was a close company for the purposes of corporation tax throughout the relevant accounting period.

g (7) The profits for the accounting period as computed for corporation tax purposes and on which the company was assessed to corporation tax amounted to £259,008.

(8) In the relevant accounting period the company made monthly payments of £6,666 13s 4d (less income tax) to the trustees of the Clark Foundation in accordance with the provisions of two deeds of covenant dated 22nd July 1960 and 26th May 1961 respectively made between the company of the one part and the trustees for the time being of the Clark Foundation, a charitable trust established by a trust deed dated 24th August 1959.

h (9) The company also made a payment of £21 (less income tax) to the Outward Bound Trust Ltd.

(10) The above-mentioned payments, totalling £53,354, were covenanted donations to charity within the meaning of s 52 (4) of the Finance Act 1965 and were accordingly treated for corporation tax purposes as charges on income under the provisions of that section.

i (11) On 30th October 1967 a print of the company's accounts to 31st December 1966, together with a detailed trading account and corporation tax computation and supporting schedules, were forwarded by the company's auditors to the Inspector of Taxes, Bridgwater, under the provisions of para 11 of Sch 18 to the Finance Act 1965.

(12) On 28th November 1967 the inspector of taxes confirmed that no action was proposed under s 77 of the Finance Act 1965, and accordingly no assessment has been made on the company under that section in respect of the relevant accounting period. a

(13) On 17th December 1968 the Board of Inland Revenue issued a notice to the company that in accordance with the provisions of s 78 of the Finance Act 1965, the income of the company for the relevant accounting period in the amount of £53,354 had been apportioned for the purposes of surtax as follows: b

John Anthony Clark	689	5	11
Peter Thompson Clothier	536	19	4
Others	52,127	14	9

7. It was contended on behalf of the company: (1) that under the provisions of s 78 of the Finance Act 1965, other than sub-s (2) thereof, no apportionment could, on the admitted facts set out above, be made under that section for the relevant accounting period; (2) that in those circumstances the provisions of s 78 (2) did not supply or import any power to make, and so did not authorise the making of, any apportionment under s 78; (3) that the reference to sub-s (2) in the opening words of sub-s (4) of s 78 did not override the first of the two specific provisions enacted in the last-mentioned subsection, that is to say, the provision that an apportionment was not to be made under s 78 of a company's income for an accounting period unless an assessment was made on the company under s 77 in respect of a shortfall in its distributions for that period, and that no assessment had been so made in respect of the relevant accounting period. d

8. It was contended on behalf of the Crown: (1) that the amounts of income of the company which were the subject of the apportionment made for surtax purposes under s 78 of the 1965 Act, were on the admitted facts set out above amounts of the kind described in sub-s (2) of s 78; (2) that on a proper construction thereof, s 78 authorised the making of an apportionment thereunder of such amounts, irrespective of whether or not any such apportionment would fall to be made by virtue of the provisions of s 78 other than those contained in sub-s (2) thereof; (3) that the reference to sub-s (2) in the opening words of sub-s (4) of the section applied in relation to each of the two specific provisions thereafter set out, and that those provisions did not accordingly preclude the making, by virtue of sub-s (2) of s 78, of the apportionment against which the appeal was made; (4) that the apportionment be in principle upheld. e

9. The commissioners gave their decision as follows: f

'We the Commissioners who heard the Appeal were of opinion that the words "there shall be added" in subsection (2) of Section 78 of the Finance Act, 1965, did not become ineffective by reason only of there being on the admitted facts set out herein no amount of income to be apportioned otherwise than by virtue of the provisions of the said subsection (2), and further that the provisions of the said Section 78 did on a proper construction thereof authorise the making of an apportionment thereunder of amounts of the kind described in the said subsection (2) notwithstanding that no apportionment fell to be made by virtue of the provisions of the said Section exclusive of subsection (2) thereof. As regards the reference to subsection (2) in the opening words of subsection (4) g

- a of the said Section 78, it seemed to us that it should be taken to apply in relation to both, and not only to the second, of the provisions thereafter set out, and that those provisions did not therefore operate to bar the apportionment which was the subject of the appeal before us. We held accordingly that the appeal failed and that the said apportionment was in principle valid, and left figures to be agreed.'
- b 10. Immediately after the determination of the appeal the company declared its dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and in due course required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.
11. The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the commissioners' decision set out in para 9 above was correct.

- MEGARRY J. This is an appeal from the Special Commissioners. The appellant is a company called C & J Clark Ltd, which is the parent company of a group of companies engaged in boot and shoe manufacture and distribution: I shall refer to it as 'the company'. The whole case centres on the Finance Act 1965, s 78. The point in issue is an apportionment of income of the company for the purposes of surtax made under s 78 for the accounting period 6th April to 31st December 1966. The apportionment was made by the Board of Inland Revenue to certain participators, a term defined by Sch 18, para 4, to the 1965 Act, but, broadly speaking, meaning shareholders. A sum of some £50,000 was concerned, though what is in issue is not the figures but whether any apportionment at all could validly be made. Counsel
- e for the company said No and counsel for the Crown Yes.

- Much was common ground. At all material times the company was a close company within para 1 of Sch 18 to the 1965 Act. The sum in dispute consists wholly of payments made by the company to charities which were 'covenanted donations to charities' within s 52 (4) of the 1965 Act, and these were treated for corporation tax purposes as charges on income within the section. In October 1967 the company
- f followed the procedure laid down by para 11 of Sch 18 to the 1965 Act, sending the requisite documents to the inspector of taxes; and in November 1967 the inspector confirmed that no action was proposed under s 77 of the 1965 Act.

- I pause there. Section 77 provides for an assessment to be made on a company if, and only if, there was a 'shortfall' in the company's distributions for any accounting period. By sub-ss (2), (3) and (4), the shortfall is to be ascertained by reference
- g to the 'required standard' there laid down. In other words, if in any accounting period a company did not distribute enough of its profits as dividends, and so on (see Sch 18, para 1), then the company was to be assessed to tax on a sum equal to the income tax for which the company would be liable on a distribution equal to the shortfall. Without a shortfall, there could be no assessment on the company under s 77. The result of the action taken by the company and the inspector under
- h Sch 18, para 11, was that thereafter no shortfall assessment under s 77 could be made on the company in respect of the accounting period in question, save in exceptional circumstances which do not arise here: Sch 18, para 11 (4). No question of any such assessment thus arises in the case in any direct way; but the absence of any such assessment is at the centre of the argument on s 78.

- I turn, then, to s 78. It was round the first four subsections that the argument
- j revolved. These subsections, I was told, are innocent of any reported authority. Subsection (1) reads as follows:

'Subject to the provisions of this section, the income of a close company for any accounting period may for purposes of surtax be apportioned by the Board among the participators, and any amount apportioned to a close company (whether originally or by one or more sub-apportionments under this provision)

may be further apportioned among the participators in that company; and on any such apportionment section 249 of the Income Tax Act 1952, as adapted by this section, shall apply as it applied on an apportionment of a company's income under Chapter III of Part IX of that Act.' a

By itself, the subsection thus confers a general power on the Board of Inland Revenue to apportion the whole income of a close company for any accounting period among the participators. It is not confined to an amount equal to the shortfall, nor by itself is its operation dependent upon any shortfall assessment having been made on a company. Dependence on a shortfall assessment is brought in by sub-s (4), to which I shall come in due course. b

Next there is sub-s (2):

'For purposes of an apportionment under this section, there shall be added to the amount of income to be apportioned any amounts which were deducted in respect of annual payments in arriving at the company's distributable income for the accounting period and which in the case of an individual would not have been deductible or would have been treated as his income in computing his total income for surtax.' c

It is common ground that the covenanted payments to charity in question in this case fall within this subsection. The amounts deducted in respect of these payments are accordingly 'to be added to the amount to be apportioned' under the subsection. The subsection is thus essentially concerned with making an addition to the amount of income to be apportioned. d

I turn to sub-s (3). This is as follows:

'Except in the case of a trading company, there may be apportioned under this section, if the Board see reason for it, the whole of a company's income for an accounting period up to the amount of the required standard (notwithstanding that there has been no shortfall in distributions for that period), together with any addition to be made under subsection (2) above but with such reduction, if any, as may be just in respect of distributions made for the period to persons other than participators and associates of participators (or amounts treated as such for purposes of section 77 above): Provided that for this purpose the required standard shall be treated as reduced by so much of any shortfall in the distributions for the period as would under section 77 (4) above be disregarded in an assessment made in respect of that shortfall.' e

Again I pause. First, Parliament is making a plain distinction between trading companies and other companies; and the company with which I am concerned is admittedly a trading company. If a company is not a trading company, sub-s (3) allows the whole of the company's income up to the amount of the required standard to be apportioned under s 78, even if there has been no shortfall; and this power extends to 'any addition' to be made under sub-s (2), such as covenanted donations to charity like those made by the company in this case. But this power is expressly excluded in the case of trading companies by the opening words of the subsection: the power to apportion under the subsection in accordance with sub-s (3) even if there has been no shortfall, does not apply to trading companies, and therefore does not apply to the company in the case before me. f

I turn to sub-s (4). I shall read this with the words which the Finance Act 1966, s 27 and Sch 5, para 10 (1), added to it before it took effect. The subsection is not subdivided, and of course I must construe it in its undivided state. But as an aid to clarity of exposition I shall read the subsection with the subdivisions [a] and [b] that I notionally inserted in the course of argument. Thus edited, the subsection is as follows: g a an assessment is made on the company under section 77 of this Act in respect of a shortfall in its distributions for that period, and [b] the amount apportioned shall be the amount of the shortfall taken into account in making that assessment.'

'Subject to subsections (2) and (3) above, [a] an apportionment shall not be made under this section of a company's income for an accounting period unless h

b Two points require mention. First, the opening words are 'Subject to subsections (2) and (3) above': and these words have been much discussed. Second, the subsection does two quite different things. First, limb [a] prohibits any apportionment under s 78 unless a shortfall assessment is made under s 77. Second, limb [b] lays down what the amount of the apportionment is to be. If I leave on one side the argument about the effect of the opening words of sub-s (4), it is clear that in the case of any company, whether or not a trading company, an apportionment can be made under sub-s (1) if, and only if, there is a shortfall assessment. It is also clear that in the case of a company which is not a trading company, an apportionment may be made under sub-s (3) even if there has been no shortfall. Trading companies are thus plainly better off in this respect than non-trading companies.

c I can now indicate what is in issue. Subsection (2) is the only part of s 78 under which any apportionment of the covenanted donations among the participators can be made; and this is common ground. Put as shortly as possible, what counsel d for the company says is that sub-s (2) does not confer any power to apportion, but merely directs an addition to be made to the amount of income to be apportioned if there is to be an apportionment of that income: if there is no apportionment of income, there cannot under sub-s (2) be any addition of the covenanted donations to that income. Furthermore, sub-s (4) prohibits any apportionment where, as here, there has been no shortfall assessment. True, that is qualified by the opening words e 'Subject to subsections (2) and (3) above', but this, said counsel, is merely a protective provision, in relation to sub-s (2) protecting what sub-s (2) may add to the income which is being apportioned. 'Subject to' is not the same as 'Except under', which might be said to assume that an apportionment could be made under sub-s (2) in cases where there has been no shortfall assessment. In relation to sub-s (3), which f allows an apportionment for non-trading companies even if there has been no shortfall, again 'Subject to' is merely protective, so as to allow sub-s (3) to operate despite the terms of sub-s (4).

At that point I pause again. Counsel for the Crown attacked these contentions as not giving proper effect to the words 'Subject to'. He emphasised the two limbs of sub-s (4) as being distinct in their operation. He accepted that in relation to sub-s (3) the words 'Subject to subsections (2) and (3)' worked properly. In sub-s (4) limb g [a] prohibited apportionments unless there had been a shortfall assessment. Subsection (3) allowed an apportionment where there had been no shortfall, and so in order to protect this provision it was right to subject sub-s (4) to sub-s (3). In sub-s (4), limb [b] regulated the amount to be apportioned: but as sub-s (3) had its own formula for the amount to be apportioned, again it was right to protect sub-s (3) and to subject sub-s (4) to sub-s (3). In relation to sub-s (3), the words 'Subject to' in sub-s (4) thus took effect and had content for both limbs of sub-s (4). But that, said h counsel for the Crown, contrasted strongly with the use in sub-s (4) of the phrase 'Subject to subsections (2) and (3)' in relation to sub-s (2). There was indeed content and purpose in the 'Subject to' in relation to limb [b] of sub-s (4), dealing with amount. Subsection (2) had its own provision for amount, and so it was right to protect that provision by subjecting the provisions as to amount in sub-s (4) [b] to sub-s (2). But i it was otherwise in relation to sub-s (4) [a]. There was nothing in sub-s (2) relating to apportionments being made where there was no shortfall, and so the prohibition in sub-s (4) [a] against making apportionments unless there had been a shortfall assessment did not need to be subjected to sub-s (2) unless sub-s (2), by implication, was to be treated as allowing apportionments to be made even if there was no shortfall. In other words, so ran the argument, in order to give content and effect to the opening 'Subject to' in sub-s (4), sub-s (2) must be read as authorising apportionments even where there is no shortfall. a

The highest compliment that I can pay this argument is that it is ingenious; but it seems to me to be fallacious and unreal. It drove counsel for the Crown into strange contentions. It requires the innocent and much-used phrase 'Subject to' to be treated as implying that the master provisions (if I may so describe sub-ss (2) and (3)) are contrary to each and every part of the subject provisions, and so require protecting from every part of the subject provisions by the words 'Subject to'. I have never met such a contention before, and if it were right I think it would strike terror into the hearts of Parliamentary counsel when contemplating their output over the last two decades. Counsel for the Crown did not shrink from the contention that the phrase 'Subject to' in effect warranted that without it each and every part of the two sets of provisions would be locked in conflict: he did not shrink, but I recoil. When counsel's attention was drawn to the first words in s 78 (1), 'Subject to the provisions of this section', he understandably did not contend that this meant that there was conflict between sub-s (1) and every other part of every other subsection of s 78. Yet his explanation seemed to me to increase the frailty of his main contention. It was that whereas the initial 'Subject to' in s 78 (1) was general and forward-looking, referring to the subsequent subsections, the 'Subject to' in sub-s (4) was specific and backward-looking, referring back to two identified subsections. Therefore, he said, the former 'Subject to' was free from the warranty of conflict that the latter gave. I cannot see why the simple phrase 'subject to' should be subject to such delicate adjustments; and if it were, I can foresee trouble, if, say, sub-s (6) of a section with ten subsections began 'Subject to sub-s (1) above and to the following provisions of this section'. b

In my judgment, the phrase 'subject to' is a simple provision which merely subjects the provisions of the subject subsections to the provisions of the master subsections. Where there is no clash, the phrase does nothing: if there is collision, the phrase shows what is to prevail. The phrase provides no warranty of universal collision. Where it appears in the opening words of s 78 (4), it does nothing, in my judgment, to demonstrate that sub-s (2) allows an apportionment to be made even if there has been no shortfall. c

That is not all. It seems to me that there is a firm contrast between the drafting of sub-ss (1) and (3), on the one hand, and sub-s (2) on the other. The main provision of sub-s (1) is that the income in question 'may for purposes of surtax be apportioned by the Board among the participators'. This plainly confers on the Board a discretionary power to apportion. Again, in sub-s (3), the main provision is that 'there may be apportioned under this section, if the Board see reason for it, the whole of a company's income'; and this, too, plainly confers on the Board a discretionary power to apportion. I think that at one stage counsel for the Crown derived some comfort from my observation that as the power of the Board under sub-s (3) was limited by the words 'if the Board see reason for it', the absence of any such limitation from sub-s (1) might lead an over-literal interpreter of statutes to assert from the contrast that the power under sub-s (1) could therefore be exercised even if the Board saw no reason for it. I accept, of course, that the drafting of statutes is sometimes less than perfect, and that there may at times be contrasts that afford a moment's light relief from sterner tasks: but I do not think that this absolves me from attempting to put a fair meaning on the words used. d

Subsections (1) and (3), therefore, plainly confer on the Board a discretionary power to apportion. Subsection (2), on the other hand, is framed in an entirely different way. First, it is drafted in the language not of a discretionary power but of an obligation: the operative words are 'there shall be added'. Second, the thing to be done under the subsection is not that income is to 'be apportioned' but that the covenanted payments, and so on, are to be 'added to the amount of income to be apportioned'. The process envisaged is not that of apportioning but that of adding, e a as is emphasised by the words 'any addition to be made under subsection (2) above' that appear in sub-s (3). Third, the language of sub-s (2) is plainly directed to an apportionment under s 78, in a manner which assumes that that apportionment will come from some other subsection of s 78. Subsection (2) begins 'For purposes of an apportionment under this section', and then it goes on with another reference to apportionment, 'there shall be added to the amount of income to be apportioned'.

b As sub-s (2) lies between immediate neighbouring subsections each of which plainly confers a power to apportion, I do not see why one should attempt to torture the language of sub-s (2) into itself conferring any power to apportion: there is ample content to be found in sub-ss (1) and (3) for the apportionment to which sub-s (2) refers. As it seems to me, the language of sub-s (2) is framed so that the subsection does not come into play unless there is first an apportionment under sub-ss (1) or (3):
c if there is, sub-s (2) makes an addition to the income to be apportioned: if there is not, sub-s (2) lies silently by and does nothing: and that is the crux of the case.

Now counsel for the Crown accepted that the meaning that he sought to put on s 78 less well accorded with the literal meaning of the language of the section, but he said that in these days one must not be too literal. He accordingly presented his argument in the form of a five-point analysis of the section. His five heads of analysis
d were the arithmetical, the functional, the linguistic, the analogous and the historical; and he supported his submissions by a number of authorities. The arithmetical head was directed against treating sub-s (2) as merely providing for something to be added to the amount of income to be apportioned, and as showing that what linguistically merely made an addition to an apportionment could stand on its own as a substantive provision for making an apportionment. I can only say that the authorities cited, though interesting, seemed to me to be of very little relevance. The e functional head was similar to the well-known mischief rule. An Act must be construed so as to be workable, even if its language is in some degree inept, and it must be construed so as to cure whatever mischief is being aimed at. This head shaded into the argument on anomalies: if the section was construed as counsel for the company would construe it, it produced anomalies, said counsel for the Crown, which
f his construction avoided. One alleged anomaly was that if a company had a pound's worth of income which was apportioned under the section, and a million pounds' worth of covenanted payments, under sub-s (2) the million would be added to the pound, and the whole apportioned, whereas if there was not even a pound to be apportioned, the million could not, on the construction of counsel for the company, be added, and would not be apportioned.

However striking this point is at first blush, I do not think that it survives close g examination. Even if the point were as it was put, that might well mean no more than that the legislature had failed to strike every possible case. Nor do I find any reality in the prospect of a trading company so adjusting its covenanted charitable donations as to absorb all its distributable profits and leave no distributable income, thereby preventing the existence of any required standard under s 77 (2) and leaving nothing to apportion. If one accepts to the full that in cases of real doubt the courts are
h more ready today than they once were to modify a strictly literal reading of a statute so as to make it efficacious and sensible in its operation, I cannot see either sufficient doubt about the meaning of s 78 or sufficient anomalies, impracticabilities or states of unreasonableness in the operation of the section, as read literally, to impel me to depart from its ordinary literal meaning.

i Counsel for the Crown's historical approach proved to be an inversion of history, in that it was based on considering not the ancestors of s 78 but its posterity. He relied on the Finance Act 1972, Sch 16, para 3 (1), as showing what, he said, s 78 (2) had really done all along. I cannot see how this sub-paragraph helps him. It is drafted in quite different language, it uses the phrase 'there may be apportioned' instead of 'there shall be added', and it is contained in an Act which is professedly to 'grant certain duties, to alter other duties, and to amend the law relating to the National Debt and the Public Revenue, and to make further provision in connection with Finance'. No doubt in certain cases a later Act may, by making amendments to an earlier Act on a basis which assumes that the earlier Act had a particular meaning, help to establish that the earlier Act did have that meaning. But when Parliament sweeps away one provision and in an amending Act enacts in its place another provision which is drafted quite differently, it seems to me to be impossible to rely on the later provision as showing what the earlier provision really meant. He who says 'Yes' and later changes his mind and says 'No' does not thereby demonstrate that for him 'Yes' means 'No'. I cannot see how the language of independent apportionment in the 1972 Act shows that the language of dependent addition in s 78 (2) of the 1965 Act is to be construed as being language of independent apportionment. I may add that I do not think I need mention separately counsel for the Crown's linguistic analysis: one way and another I think I have dealt sufficiently with his contentions under this head.

Finally, I must mention the decision of the Special Commissioners. For convenience of reference, I have inserted letters in order to divide it up. It reads as follows:

'We the Commissioners who heard the Appeal were of opinion [a] that the words "there shall be added" in subsection (2) of Section 78 of the Finance Act, 1965, did not become ineffective by reason only of there being on the admitted facts set out herein no amount of income to be apportioned otherwise than by virtue of the provisions of the said subsection (2), and further [b] that the provisions of the said Section 78 did on a proper construction thereof authorise the making of an apportionment thereunder of amounts of the kind described in the said subsection (2) notwithstanding that no apportionment fell to be made by virtue of the provisions of the said Section exclusive of subsection (2) thereof. [c] As regards the reference to subsection (2) in the opening words of subsection (4) of the said Section 78, it seemed to us that it should be taken to apply in relation to both, and not only to the second, of the provisions thereafter set out, and that those provisions did not therefore operate to bar the apportionment which was the subject of the appeal before us. We held accordingly that the appeal failed and that the said apportionment was in principle valid, and left figures to be agreed.'

On this, I would say that under para [a] the question is not so much whether s 78 (2) became ineffective because there was no income to apportion, but whether it ever was effective to confer any power to apportion, or, indeed, to do anything save make a mandatory addition to any apportionment that had been made. As for [b], that seems to me to be in part a repetition of the first point and in part an assertion, rather than a reason. Paragraph [c] reflects the argument that the words 'Subject to' at the beginning of sub-s (4) had the powerful effect that I have rejected. Further, I think that not only does sub-s (4) 'bar the apportionment', but also that sub-s (2) confers no power to make an apportionment, and so there is no apportionment to be barred. The legislation is complex, and I have by no means explored every facet of every argument put before me; but I have reached the conclusion that the decision of the Special Commissioners is wrong, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed; notice of apportionment discharged.

CHANCERY DIVISION

6th, 9th APRIL 1973

Income tax – Relief – Children – Income of child – Reduction or disallowance of relief – Child entitled in his own right to an income exceeding prescribed amount – Daughter – Marriage during year of assessment – Post-nuptial income of daughter – Income deemed for income tax purposes to be husband's income and not to be her income – Whether daughter entitled to post-nuptial income in her own right – Whether post-nuptial income to be disregarded for purposes of child relief – Income Tax Act 1952, ss 212 (4) (as substituted by the Finance Act 1963, s 13), 354 (1).

The taxpayer's daughter was born in May 1946. During the first 2½ months of the fiscal year 1969-70 she was receiving full-time instruction at a university. On 19th June 1969 she finished her university course and on 19th July she married. Since then she had been living with her husband. In October 1969 she began employment as a teacher. For the year 1969-70 her income prior to her marriage was only £10, whereas her income subsequent to her marriage was not less than £270. The taxpayer was assessed to income tax for the year 1969-70 on the basis that, by virtue of s 212 (4)^a of the Income Tax Act 1952, he was not entitled to claim child relief under s 212 (1) in respect of the daughter since her total income for that year was not less than £280. The taxpayer claimed that he was entitled to the full amount of child relief on the ground, inter alia, that on her marriage the daughter ceased to be a 'child' of his for the purposes of s 212 (4).

Held – (i) Section 212 was to be construed in the context of relationship and the relationship between the taxpayer and his daughter did not change on her marriage; accordingly the daughter did not cease to be the taxpayer's child for the purposes of s 212 (4) (see p 527 j to p 528 c, post).

^a Section 212, so far as material, and as amended by the Finance Act 1957, s 12, the Finance Act 1963, ss 12, 13, and the Finance Act 1969, s 11, provides:

⁽²⁾ The conditions referred to in subsection (1) of this section are—(a) that the child is born in, or is under the age of sixteen years at the commencement of, the year of assessment referred to in that subsection; or (b) that the child is over the age of sixteen years at the commencement of that year of assessment but is receiving full-time instruction at any university, college, school or other educational establishment . . .

(ii) However, as the daughter had been living with the husband since marriage, her post-nuptial income was, under s 354 (1)^b of the 1952 Act, 'deemed for income tax purposes to be [her husband's] income and not to be her income'. The taxpayer's entitlement to child relief under s 212 (4) was an income tax purpose. It followed that, for that purpose, the daughter's post-nuptial income was deemed to be her husband's income and therefore was not income to which she was 'entitled in [her] own right' within s 212 (4). Accordingly, since the income to which the daughter was entitled in her own right for the fiscal year 1969-70 was only £10, the taxpayer was entitled to full child relief for that year (see p 534 h and j, post).

1. At a meeting of the General Commissioners for the Division of Wembley held on 23rd March 1972 in the London Borough of Harrow, GH Murphy of 29 Sunny Gardens Road, London NW4 ('the taxpayer') appealed under s 42 (3) of the Taxes Management Act 1970 against a decision of an inspector of taxes under that section which disallowed the taxpayer's claim to child allowance for the year ended 5th April 1970 in respect of his child Eileen Murphy, born on 9th May 1946.

2. The question for decision was whether the taxpayer was entitled to the child allowance within the provisions of s 212 (4) of the Income Tax Act 1952, as amended by s 13 of the Finance Act 1963.

a 3. The taxpayer was present and gave evidence which the commissioners accepted.
4. The following facts were proved or admitted: (a) The taxpayer had a daughter, Eileen ('the daughter'), born on 9th May 1946. (b) The daughter was receiving full-time instruction at the University of York until 19th June 1969. (c) She married on 19th July 1969 and began employment as a teacher in October 1969. (d) The daughter's total income between 6th April 1969 and the date of her marriage was £10. (e) The daughter's total income between the date of her marriage and 5th April 1970 was not less than £270. (f) Her total income for the year ended 5th April 1970 was not less than £280.

b 5. The taxpayer contended: (a) that by a notice of coding dated 27th October 1969 the inspector of taxes had granted an allowance in respect of the daughter; (b) that by a letter dated 27th October 1970 from the inspector to the taxpayer the inspector asked for further information of the daughter's income before the application for an allowance could be finally determined; (c) (i) that under s 212 (4) of the Income Tax Act 1952:

'No relief shall be allowed under this section in respect of any child who is entitled in his own right to an income exceeding seventy pounds a year: Provided that in calculating the income of the child for the purpose of this subsection no account shall be taken of any income to which the child is entitled as the holder of a scholarship, bursary, or other similar educational endowment.'

e 'Section 212 of the Act of 1952 (child relief) shall have effect for the year 1964-65 and subsequent years of assessment as if subsection (4) . . . were amended by the substitution of the following for the words preceding the proviso:—“(4) In the case of a child who is entitled in his own right to an income exceeding £115 a year the appropriate amount for the child shall be reduced by the amount of the excess, and accordingly no relief shall be allowed under this section where the excess is equal to or greater than the amount which apart from this subsection would be the appropriate amount for the child:” . . .’

f (d) that between those two Acts there were four sections or subsections plus a schedule that particularly governed the position with others lending collateral support; (e) that following the daughter's marriage she ceased to be a child within s 212 (4) of the Income Tax Act 1952 and s 13 of the Finance Act 1963 and thus ceased to be the subject of the claim, Eileen Murphy; (f) that on the daughter's marriage she ceased to be a daughter and became the wife of her husband; thus it was incorrect for the Inland Revenue to say that she was a child for the remainder of the year under review for income tax purposes; (g) that the daughter was not entitled to the income from the date of her marriage in her own right, but that by s 354 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952 the income was that of her husband and that the taxpayer had no power to obtain from her or from her husband disclosure of her income; (h) that if the daughter's income exceeded £115 per annum any reduction fell to be made in the year following her marriage; the taxpayer had no power to obtain disclosure of her income by her husband.

i 6. It was contended by the inspector of taxes: (a) that s 354 of the 1952 Act was concerned only with the machinery of taxation; (b) that a married woman was not deprived by s 354 of the 1952 Act in favour of her husband of the right to receive income due to her; (c) that s 354 of the 1952 Act was not relevant to the construction of s 212 of the 1952 Act as amended by s 13 of the 1963 Act; (d) that a person who was a child for the purposes of s 212 of the 1952 Act was despite her marriage entitled in her own right for the purposes of s 13 of the 1963 Act to any income due to her under general law; (e) that the daughter was entitled in her own right during the year ended 5th April 1970 to the total income of £280; (f) that the taxpayer was, therefore, not entitled under the provisions of s 13 of the 1963 Act to the child allowance. a

8. The commissioners' decision was as follows:

'We were satisfied: (a) That the daughter remained a child within the meaning of Section 212 (4) of the Income Tax Act 1952 and Section 13 of the Finance Act 1963 notwithstanding her marriage. (b) That to support a claim b to child allowance it was the [taxpayer's] responsibility to satisfy H.M. Inspector of Taxes that he was entitled to such an allowance. That the [taxpayer] had failed to do so. (c) That the definitions and logic introduced by the [taxpayer] were not applicable to the Section of the Income Tax Acts by which child allowance should be determined. (d) That H.M. Inspector of Taxes was correct in disallowing the [taxpayer's] claim to the child allowance in the absence of c evidence of support of the [taxpayer's] claims. We therefore refused the appeal.'

9. Immediately after the determination of the appeal the taxpayer expressed his dissatisfaction with the decision as being erroneous in point of law and in due course required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.

The taxpayer appeared in person. d

Patrick Medd for the Crown.

MEGARRY J. This is an appeal from the General Commissioners for the Division of Wembley. It raises a question of some general interest, especially to parents whose daughters marry and enter employment soon after ending their university or other full-time education. The appellant taxpayer is, I understand, a former official of the Inland Revenue, although I gather that he had little to do with the use of reports of taxation cases. He conducted his appeal in person, while Mr Medd appeared for the Crown. e

The sole subject of dispute concerns the taxpayer's claim for child allowance in respect of his daughter Eileen for the year 1969-70. She was born on 9th May 1946 and during the first 2½ months of the fiscal year in question, until 19th June 1969, she was receiving full-time instruction at the University of York. A month later, on 19th July 1969, she married: and in October 1969 she began employment as a teacher. For the fiscal year, her income prior to her marriage was £10, whereas, subject to the contentions of the taxpayer, her income after the marriage was not less than £270, so that for the year as a whole her income was not less than £280. Her income thus exceeded £115 a year by £165, the amount on which the allowance for child relief is claimed by the taxpayer, and the result is that, on this footing, s 212 (4) of the Income Tax Act 1952, as amended, caused the whole of the taxpayer's claim for child relief to be disallowed. If, of course, Eileen's income after her marriage is to be disregarded, as the taxpayer contends, then he is entitled to the whole of the child relief. The sole issue in the case is whether he is thus entitled. f

The Income Tax Act 1952, s 212, in the amended form in which it was in force for the year in question, gives the right to a child allowance equal to tax at the standard rate on the appropriate amount 'If the claimant proves—(a) that there is living at any time within the year of assessment a child of his' with respect to whom the necessary conditions are satisfied. Subsection (1A) lays down the appropriate amount, which in the present case is £165. Subsection (2) lays down alternative conditions of the child being born in the year of assessment, or being under 16 years of age at the commencement of the year, or, if over 16 then, receiving full-time instruction at an educational establishment. There is then sub-s (4): g a 'In the case of a child who is entitled in his own right to an income exceeding £115 a year the appropriate amount for the child shall be reduced by the amount of the excess, and accordingly no relief shall be allowed under this section where the excess is equal to or greater than the amount which apart from this subsection would be the appropriate amount for the child: Provided that in calculating the income of the child for the purpose of this subsection no account shall be taken of any income to which the child is entitled as the holder of a scholarship, bursary, or other similar educational endowment.'

c In support of his contentions the taxpayer addressed me for over two hours, reading from what was evidently a carefully prepared statement; and in reply he read a further statement of this type. Some of the matters to which he referred were plainly outside the scope of an appeal by way of case stated, as where he read at length from the correspondence that he had had with the Revenue authorities. His comments ranged wide, from breach of natural law and ultra vires to the inadmissibility of hearsay evidence and the inaccuracy of some of the notes provided by the Revenue authorities in connection with income tax returns; and he was much concerned with the absence of any right of his to require Eileen or her husband to disclose to him her income after marriage, although he accepted that for the fiscal year in question it must have been at least £270. As he had put together a connected address, it seemed simpler and fairer to listen to all he had to say, however lacking in relevance to the appeal, rather than to interrupt him each time he went beyond what fairly seemed to arise within the limited scope of an appeal by way of case stated. I do not propose to discuss such matters, especially as counsel for the Crown has refrained from commenting on them; but the taxpayer's submissions contained two real points, and these I must consider. He did not, I may say, refer me to any of the reported authorities on the law of income tax, although in reply he mentioned certain cases on the meaning of 'children' under the general law.

e The first of the two points was that when Eileen married, she ceased to be a 'child' for the purposes of s 212 (4). The result was that no income that she received after her marriage fell to be included in calculating the £115 a year, on the ground that there was no 'child who is entitled in his own right to an income exceeding £115 a year' within the subsection. On this argument it might be said that on marriage there was similarly not a 'child' for the purposes of sub-s (1), which confers the right to relief; but this was admittedly immaterial, for Eileen's unmarried existence during the earlier part of the year, when on any footing she was a 'child', sufficed to confer the right to relief. That provision merely requires the child to be 'living at any time within the year of assessment'.

f The question, then, was whether for the purposes of sub-s (4) Eileen ceased to be a 'child' when she married. The taxpayer relied on the concluding words of sub-s (1), which run 'In this provision, "child" includes a stepchild and an illegitimate child whose parents have married each other after his birth', contending that this did nothing to turn a married woman into a child; and of course this is so. But the difficulty in the taxpayer's argument arises at an earlier stage. Subsection (1) is framed in terms of the claimant proving that there was 'a child of his' living, and so on. The reference to 'a child' in sub-s (4), disallowing or reducing what is conferred by sub-s (1), must plainly refer to the same type of child. I do not see how any limitation by reference to the married or unmarried state of a male or female is to be read into or deduced from this language, nor do I see how there can be any implication as to age, particularly in view of the sliding scale of the appropriate amount laid down by reference to age in subsection (1A), with the largest amount for those 'over the age of sixteen'. The short question, then, is whether, on marriage, a daughter ceases for this purpose to be a 'child', or a 'child of his', that is, her father, or ceases to be his daughter. The context is that of the extent to which a claimant is entitled to an allowance in respect of a child of his, and this is a context of relationship. I cannot see that a daughter ceases to be the child or daughter of her parents as soon as she marries, either for this or for any other relevant purpose. The daughter ceases to be only a daughter and becomes a wife as well; but her blood relationship to her parents remains. During the argument I reminded the taxpayer of the old saying—

'A son is your son till he gets him a wife,
A daughter's your daughter for all of your life.'

That, of course, is not a saying of authority, nor is it directed to this subject-matter: but it illustrates the normal and natural relationship between a daughter and her parents. In my judgment, Eileen remained a 'child' within sub-s (4) when she married, and that marriage did not result in her subsequent income being ignored on this score for the purposes of the subsection. This is what the General Commissioners held on this point, and in this I think they were right.

The second and more substantial point taken by the taxpayer was based on the Income Tax Act 1952, s 354 (1). This reads as follows:

'Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, a woman's income chargeable to income tax shall, so far as it is income for a year of assessment or part of a year of assessment during which she is a married woman living with her husband, be deemed for income tax purposes to be his income and not to be her income: Provided that the question whether there is any income of hers chargeable to income tax for any year of assessment, and, if so, what is to be taken to be the amount thereof for income tax purposes, shall not be affected by the provisions of this subsection.'

This, said the taxpayer, meant that the whole of Eileen's income received after her marriage and while she was admittedly living with her husband was to be 'deemed for income tax purposes to be his income and not to be her income'; and as s 212 plainly fell within the words 'for income tax purposes', this established that Eileen's post-nuptial income was not hers within s 212. Accordingly, for income tax purposes her income for the year in question was a mere £10, and so the taxpayer was entitled to the whole of the child allowance in respect of her. I may say that there is no suggestion that Eileen had sought to be separately assessed.

On a literal reading of the statute the taxpayer's contentions seem unanswerable. The essential words are wide and emphatic. The deeming is not for any limited purpose, but 'for income tax purposes', and that, with no apparent restriction, must mean for all income tax purposes. Further, the deeming is both positive and negative, covering 'to be' and 'not to be' alike: the income is to be deemed 'to be his income' and is also to be deemed 'not to be her income'. The question, then, is whether there is anything to displace this apparent result.

On this point, counsel for the Crown relied on certain authorities, two of which had been put before the General Commissioners. First, there was *Leitch v Emmott*¹ concerning the assessment of a widow. This was cited from the report in the Tax Cases, but for various reasons I prefer to use the version in the Law Reports. First, the headnote in the Tax Cases gives little or no indication of the process of reasoning involved in the decision: the Law Reports sets out the relevant statutory provision and the ratio decidendi, whereas although the catchwords in the Tax Cases mention r 16, the headnote does not quote or even mention the rule, and it states the conclusion in seven words that give no indication of what the point was, namely 'Held, that she was correctly so assessed'. Second, the Law Reports version includes a report of the argument of counsel, which the Tax Cases lacks. Third, the language of the judgments appearing in the Law Reports differs in a number of respects from a that in the Tax Cases; and almost certainly these revisions were made or approved by the judges. The revised language of the judges seems to me to be preferable to the unrevised. The Tax Cases series, if I may say so, has many virtues. For long the practice has been to set out the case stated in full, the volumes are relatively slender to handle, the series is not diluted by cases on other subjects, and it includes many cases that are never reported in the Law Reports. I would say nothing if cases

 b reported in the Law Reports were cited from the Tax Cases on points that arose unexpectedly during argument: but despite my interest in the Law Reports, I think I ought to say that where the few substantive cases round which an appeal turns are reported in the Law Reports, I consider that efforts should be made to assist the court by citing the cases from that series, and that this should be done in this court, and not merely in the House of Lords (see the statement by Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC in *National Bank of Greece SA v Westminster Bank Executor & Trustee Co (Channel Islands) Ltd*¹).

c Now in *Leitch v Emmott*² the provision in question was a proviso to r 16 of the All Schedules Rules³ of the Income Tax Act 1918. The rule ran thus:

d 'A married woman . . . entitled to any property or profits to her separate use, shall be assessable and chargeable to tax as if she were sole and unmarried: Provided that—(1) the profits of a married woman living with her husband shall be deemed the profits of the husband, and shall be assessed and charged in his name, and not in her name or the name of her trustee; . . .'

e I think I need read no more. In that case a husband died a few days after a fiscal year had begun, and his wife was held to be liable to income tax under Case III of Sch D in respect of income from War Stock during the first year of her widowhood, computed, notwithstanding the proviso, on the basis of her income from the same source in the preceding year while she was a married woman. The Court of Appeal, reversing the decision of Rowlatt J, rejected the argument that because of the proviso the widow had had no income while she was a wife. Lord Hanworth MR said⁴:

f 'We must, I think, take r. 16 as we find it and treat the proviso as a proviso. Rule 16 provides that a married woman shall be assessable and chargeable to tax. Bearing this in mind, the proviso will operate as a proviso and no more by allowing the husband to be the source through which collection shall be made. For that purpose and in that sense the profits which are not his are to be deemed to be his and in no other sense.'

h 'Rule 16 provides, in the first instance, that a married woman entitled to any property to her separate use shall be assessable and chargeable to tax as if she were sole and unmarried. Then, turning back to r. 2 of the Rules applicable to Case III, we find that the measure of that charge to tax is the amount of the income from her investments arising in the year preceding the year of assessment. It is clear to my mind, therefore, that the married woman is charged to tax in respect of her income for the year of assessment, to be measured by the income from the same investments received by her in the preceding year, thus showing that the income for the purpose of the charge and of the measure of the tax is treated as her income. The proviso does not alter the character of the income charged to tax or the measure of the tax, but merely provides, with the object of facilitating the collection of the tax, that the assessment and charge shall be made in the name of the husband and that for that purpose the wife's income shall be treated as the income of the husband. This provision does not, in my judgment, operate to convert the income of the wife into income of the husband further than is necessary for the purpose of collecting the tax; with the result that it affords no valid ground for the contention that there was no income arising from the wife's investments in the year preceding the year of assessment within the meaning of r. 2 of Case III.' a

It is in this passage that in *Elmhirst v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹ Lawrence J said that the real ground of the decision was stated.

The third member of the court in *Leitch v Emmott*², Sankey LJ, said this³:

"The word "deemed" introduces an artificial definition which, in my view, is only intended to be applied as long as the conditions exist to which it is intended to apply. There is some authority for that in the judgment of James L.J. in *Ex parte Walton*⁴: "When a statute enacts that something shall be deemed to have been done, which in fact and truth was not done, the Court is entitled and bound to ascertain for what purposes and between what persons the statutory fiction is to be resorted to." Founding myself upon those words, I turn to the proviso to r. 16, and it is to be observed that in the proviso what is being dealt with are "the profits of a married woman living with her husband." It starts with that assumption and then says that in that case—namely, when the profits are the profits of a married woman living with her husband, they shall be deemed to be the profits of the husband and shall be assessed and charged in his name; but they still remain the profits of the married woman living with her husband, because that is the subject with which the proviso is dealing. It appears to me that they are none the less her profits in one sense, although for the purposes, as it seems to me, of collection, they shall be deemed to be the profits of the husband and shall be assessed and charged in his name. I think that the assessment and charging in his name obviously only refers to a case when the husband is still alive and his wife living with him; but if those conditions do not exist, if the conditions upon which the artificial "deeming" depend no longer exist, then I think the profits are the profits belonging to the married woman. I cannot see, therefore, how they can be excluded as the source for taxation purposes. In other words, I think that the statutory election, if I may call it so, only applies for the purpose of collection, and when the conditions no longer exist the profits are those of the married woman.' c

The proviso was thus read as converting the wife's income into the husband's income not for all income tax purposes but only for the purpose of collecting tax, or, as Lawrence J put it in *Palmer v Cattermole (Inspector of Taxes)*⁵ 'for the purposes of assessment and collection'.

In *Elmhirst v Inland Revenue Comrs*⁶ the problem arose in relation not to the ending of a marriage by death but the beginning of a marriage. The wife had a large income of her own, and Lawrence J in effect held that the proviso did nothing to alter the computation of the wife's income. Her ante-nuptial income could therefore be taken into account for the purposes of average; all that the proviso did was to make her income, when ascertained, the income of her husband, to be assessed and charged in his name. h a Rule 16 endured until it was repealed by the Finance Act 1950, s 50 and Sch 8, Part II. In its place, s 30 of that Act enacted provisions which were repeated in the consolidation Act, the Income Tax Act 1952. Section 30 (1) of the 1950 Act was reproduced verbatim in s 354 (1) of the 1952 Act, which I have already read, with only the immaterial omission of the word 'following' in front of the word 'provisions' in the opening phrase. Contrasted with r 16, the change in language is marked. First, the substantive words of r 16, making the wife 'assessable and chargeable to tax as if she was sole and unmarried', disappear. Instead, the words deeming the wife's income to be her husband's are promoted from being a mere proviso to being themselves the substantive provision. Second, the new provision has a proviso which did not appear in the earlier Act; I shall consider this later. Third, the former r 16 was framed in terms of 'shall be assessable and chargeable' in the substantive provision, and 'shall be assessed and charged' in the proviso, whereas the new provision contains no such limiting expressions. The word 'chargeable' appears in the phrases referring to her 'income chargeable to income tax', and 'assessment' appears in the phrases 'year of assessment': but there is no trace of an imperative direction as to what is to be assessable and chargeable, or assessed and charged, with the restrictions that this suggests. Provision that income thus deemed to be the husband's is to be assessed on him instead of the wife was made in a separate subsection, formerly the Finance Act 1950, s 30 (2), and later the Income Tax Act 1952, s 354 (2). Fourth, in the proviso to the former r 16 the words of deeming were merely the single positive phrase 'shall be deemed the profits of the husband', whereas in the new provision they are a double phrase, both negative and positive, namely, 'shall be deemed . . . to be his income and not to be her income'. Fifth, in the new provision the deeming is 'for income tax purposes', whereas no such words appeared in the old r 16.

e In those circumstances, it seems plain that it cannot be safely assumed that decisions on r 16 necessarily apply to the quite different language of what became s 354 (1) of the 1952 Act. What was a mere proviso to an enactment relating to how a married woman should be assessable or chargeable, and was itself drafted in terms of what was to be assessed and charged in the name of the husband, became a substantive enactment, not confined to assessment and charge but expressed to be 'for income tax purposes'; and words deeming the income to be the husband's were replaced by words deeming the income not only to be the husband's but also not to be the wife's. These changes gave ample scope for an argument that the language of the new provision was no longer confined to the process of assessment and collection, but applied for all income tax purposes.

g Counsel for the Crown's answer was to refer me to the reserved judgment of Harman LJ in Re Cameron (decd), *Kingsley v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹, based on the new provision, s 354 (1) of the 1952 Act. The question there was one of allowances and claims for repayment in respect of farming losses to which a widow had become entitled during her husband's life. The Inland Revenue claimed that by virtue of s 354 the sums repaid or repayable formed part of the husband's estate for the purposes of estate duty. Harman LJ, however, held that although the husband or his personal representatives were the only persons who could claim the sums in question, they could receive them only in a fiduciary capacity, and must account to the wife for them. After discussing various other cases and contentions, he cited *Leitch v Emmott*², and read nearly the whole of the passage from the judgment of Lawrence LJ³ that I have already read. He then concluded his judgment by saying⁴:

i 'Relying on that authority, I would hold that the income remains the income of the wife and so far as collected by the husband must be accounted for to her.'

When counsel for the Crown cited *Re Cameron*¹ there was some discussion about the apparent omission to mention any difference between the statutory language before Harman LJ and that before the Court of Appeal in *Leitch v Emmott*²; and a tentative inference was drawn from the eminence of counsel who argued *Re Cameron*¹ that it was improbable that the change in language had escaped attention during argument. That in a sense made the absence from the judgment of any mention of the changed language the more remarkable; Harman LJ³ had merely remarked that the claim in *Leitch v Emmott*² had been 'under the old Rule 16 of the General Rules applicable to all Schedules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, the precursor of Section 354'. During the adjournment, however, I found that *Re Cameron*⁴ had been reported in the Law Reports; and this report indicated that the inference tentatively made from the report in the Tax Cases was unfounded. In the Law Reports, the arguments of counsel are reported⁵, and these show that there was apparently no mention during argument of either *Leitch v Emmott*² or r 16. It is therefore most improbable that counsel drew the attention of the court to the difference in language between r 16 and s 354 (1). *Leitch v Emmott*² must, it seems, have been brought into the case by Harman LJ after he had reserved judgment. I would only add that this is a further instance of the desirability of citing revenue cases reported in the Law Reports from those reports and not merely from the Tax Cases.

The question, then, is what is the right course for me to adopt. *Re Cameron*⁴ has the high authority of any decision of Harman LJ, and although the decision was at first instance, he was then a senior member of the Court of Appeal, and his judgment was a reserved judgment. On the other hand, the judgment is treating a decision on one statutory provision as applying to another statutory provision in substantially different language, in a case where those differences were never, it seems, the subject of any discussion in argument by counsel. Furthermore, the case is distinguishable in that what was in issue was estate duty and not income tax. Even if s 354 (1) is given its widest application, an enactment making a wife's income her husband's and not hers 'for income tax purposes' does not on the face of it make her income his and not hers for the purposes of estate duty. In other words, even if for income tax purposes the deeming of the wife's income to be the husband's and not hers has ceased merely to be for the purposes of assessment and collection, and applies for all income tax purposes, it is still perfectly possible to hold that for all other purposes, including estate duty, the wife's income is her own. Looked at in that way, *Re Cameron*⁴ may be read as having perhaps treated *Leitch v Emmott*² as being relevant mainly as an illustration that a statutory deeming for a limited purpose, be that purpose narrow or wide, is not to have effect outside that purpose. Accordingly, I do not think that *Re Cameron*⁴ binds me, either directly or by judicial comity, to decide this case in favour of the Crown; and the earlier cases are plainly distinguishable in that the statutory language there in question was quite different.

I therefore return to s 354, and seek to construe it with the history of previous decisions in mind, but without, it seems, any direct authority on the matter. I cannot find any real assistance in the headings. Section 30 of the 1950 Act appeared in Part II of the Act, together with 13 other sections dealing with a variety of matters, under the title 'Income Tax'; and this helps not at all. Section 354 of the 1952 Act is the first of eight sections which constitute Part XIV of the Act, entitled 'Special Provisions as to Married Persons'; and the most that can be said about Part XIV is that much of it has a general procedural flavour. Yet there are also substantive provisions, such as a ss 354 (3) and 358, relating to the amount of personal reliefs, and of course it is a personal relief with which I am concerned in this case; and see s 354 (5).

Then there is the proviso to s 354 (1) of the 1952 Act; and as Harman LJ said in *Re Cameron*¹ this is not easy to understand. He suggested that it was¹—

b 'put in ex cautela so that it cannot be argued that making the wife's income the husband's results in her having no income. What I think you are directed to do by the proviso is to ascertain first what is her income for income tax purposes and then to subject that income to the subsection as being "a woman's income chargeable to income tax".'

c Counsel for the Crown suggested that the proviso might be directed to cases where there was a non-resident wife with her own foreign income. In such a case, the proviso would prevent that income, which otherwise would not be chargeable to income tax, from being made chargeable to income tax merely because the husband was resident and the wife's income would by the substantive part of sub-s (1) be deemed to be his. Questions of residence in relation to a wealthy wife arose in *Elmhirst v Inland Revenue Comrs*², I may say, and possibly they suggested the proviso. In his reply, counsel for the Crown also suggested that the language might have resulted from the decision of the House of Lords in *Nugent-Head v Jacob (Inspector of Taxes)*³. The words of the proviso relating to the amount of the wife's income, too, accord with the Elmhirst case², in that the process of computation of the amount of the wife's income is not to be affected by the deeming provisions of the subsection. Be that as it may, I do not find the proviso of any assistance to counsel for the Crown in the question before me: there is no suggestion that the income in question, whether treated as Eileen's or her husband's, is not 'chargeable to income tax'.
e If anything, the proviso seems to me to assist the taxpayer, in that it may be said that the proviso constitutes the only qualification to the general and far-reaching enactment that the wife's income is to be deemed to be her husband's income and not hers 'for income tax purposes', that is, for all income tax purposes not embraced by the proviso. Without the proviso, it might be less difficult to imply some limitation to the scope of 'for income tax purposes'; but expressum facit cessare tacitum.
f If by 'for income tax purposes' Parliament had really meant no more than 'for the purposes of assessment and collection', it would have been easy enough to say so, especially with the guidance given by the previous provision and the decisions on it. Yet when statutory phrases such as 'assessed and charged' are repealed and replaced by the words 'for income tax purposes', I do not think that I ought to strain to construe the new and different language as showing an intention to adhere to the old meaning of the old language.

h It has also been contended that s 354 (1) was intended to operate only as between husband and wife and the Revenue authorities, and that it was to be ignored quoad others, such as the wife's parents. Counsel for the Crown said that 'for income tax purposes' in the context really means no more than 'for the purposes of income tax that are here relevant', and that is for the charging and collecting of tax in relation to husband and wife. To such a contention I think a similar answer must be given. I can see no language in the section to support such a contention; and as I have already indicated, the proviso and the phrase 'for income tax purposes' (which is not the same as 'for their income tax purposes') seem to me to point against any implied restriction.

j On the authorities and the arguments that have been put before me, I find it difficult to see what general considerations there are which could override or mould the language of the statute. The fact that under s 212 (1) the same child relief is a accorded to a taxpayer whose child is living for a single day in the year as to one whose child is alive throughout the year in question is discouraging to any contention that the child relief is intended to provide any fair or proportionate counterbalance (albeit partial) to the cost to the parent of maintaining the child. A similar comment may be made in relation to the date when a child attains the age of 16 or ceases to receive full-time instruction. It may well be that an 'all or nothing' approach was b adopted in the cause of simplicity: but this approach undoubtedly produces anomalous results as between one parent and another whose circumstances are on all fours save as regards the relevant dates affecting their children. Similarly, I recognise, and assert, the apparent anomaly that the taxpayer's contention produces as between two parents whose circumstances are on all fours save that the daughter of one marries (as in this case) and the daughter of the other does not. A daughter who soon c after the start of a fiscal year becomes employed at a living wage or salary is likely in most cases, at all events, to be as much or as little 'off her father's hands' in a financial sense whether or not she is married; and so it is not easy to see why the effect on the father's tax affairs should differ in one case from that in the other.

 Again, no distinction seems to be made between a father who maintains his son at home and at a fee-paying school, and a father whose much older son has cut himself d off from his family and is supported by a scholarship, whether here or abroad. If the subject of child relief were otherwise free from anomalies, I should find more weight than I do in the argument that the language of the statute should be moulded so as to produce a reasonable result. But when Parliament has built anomalies into the system, then until that system is recast (as well it might be), I find it hard to see that it would be right or decorous for a judge of first instance (albeit sitting in a e Revenue appeal) to seek to avoid another anomaly by doing to the language of the Act even the violence that Lord Reid was willing to do to the statutory language in *Luke v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹. After all, there is no equity about a taxing Act; and my duty is to attempt to put a fair meaning on the words of the statute. To deem, if I may say so, is usually perilous, in that it is always difficult to foresee all the possible consequences of the artificial state of affairs that the deeming brings into being. As f
 Lord Asquith of Bishopstone said in East End Dwellings Co Ltd v Finsbury Borough *Council*²:

'If one is bidden to treat an imaginary state of affairs as real, one must surely, g unless prohibited from doing so, also imagine as real the consequences and incidents which, if the putative state of affairs had in fact existed, must inevitably have flowed from or accompanied it.'

A research student in search of a suitable topic for a thesis might do worse than to choose as his subject 'The Dangers of Deeming'.

I come back to the essential question before me. The child relief for the taxpayer is disallowed under s 212 (4), as amended, if the child, Eileen, was entitled in her own h right to the post-nuptial income which she had in the year in question. That is plainly an income tax purpose. Under s 354 (1), as Eileen is living with her husband, that post-nuptial income is to be 'deemed for income tax purposes to be his income and not to be her income'. How, then, for income tax purposes can Eileen be said to be entitled in her own right to income which the statute says is to be deemed for income tax purposes to be her husband's income and not hers? I cannot see that she can. j Surprising though the result may be, and aware as I am that my decision may well result in the taxpayer being launched on a course on which he will be taken to the a Court of Appeal and perhaps beyond, I can only do the best I can on the material before me.

The decision of the General Commissioners does not in terms deal with the point. They held that the onus was on the taxpayer to support his claim for child allowance (as indeed it is), that the 'definitions and logic introduced by the [taxpayer] were not applicable to the Section of the Income Tax Acts by which child allowance should be determined', and that the inspector was correct in disallowing the taxpayer's claim to the child allowance in the absence of evidence in support of his claims. I have every sympathy with the General Commissioners in being faced with these problems of statutory construction without the aid of professional legal argument in support of the taxpayer's claim; and I should make it clear that much of the reasoning by which I have reached my conclusion in the taxpayer's favour was not put forward by the taxpayer. Nevertheless, I do not see any effective answer to that reasoning, and in my judgment the decision of the General Commissioners was wrong. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

Partnership — Relations between partners — Good faith — Partnership property — Leasehold interest — Underlease of premises where partnership business carried on — Acquisition of leasehold reversion by one of the partners — Dissolution of partnership — Appointment of receiver — Rent in arrears — Landlord's right to claim possession with leave of court — Whether fact that landlord a partner raising any equity which would preclude court from giving leave.

In April 1971 B and R began trading in partnership. The premises at which they carried on business were subject to an underlease at a rent of £1,000 per annum. The underlease was a partnership asset. In October 1971 a writ was issued for the dissolution of the partnership and subsequently W was appointed receiver. At about the same time as the appointment, R acquired the leasehold reversion expectant on the underlease. By November 1972 two quarterly payments of rent under the underlease had fallen into arrear and remained unpaid. The receiver had about £1,150 in hand and liabilities of about £6,000. R then made an offer to the receiver that he would accept a surrender of the underlease on the terms that the rent which was in arrear would be forgone and that one past quarterly payment of £250 would be refunded, an offer which was worth £750 to the partnership; a further term was that no liability would be enforced against the partnership as regards other breaches of covenant. According to the evidence the market value of the underlease was speculative with a top limit of £1,000. On a summons by the receiver for directions whether or not he should seek to sell the benefit of the underlease and whether or not he ought to pay the rent under the underlease as it fell due, a

Held – (i) The general rule was that the court would grant leave to a landlord to recover possession of demised premises, notwithstanding a receivership, unless there were special circumstances to justify a different course (see p 538 h, post); dictum of Romer LJ in Hand v Blow [1901] 2 Ch at 737 applied.

(ii) R's fiduciary capacity as a member of the partnership, which included the benefit and burden of the underlease, did not raise any sort of equity which could prevent him from exercising the rights of a landlord which he would have had as a stranger to the partnership. There would, therefore, be no grounds for refusing R leave to recover possession in forfeiture proceedings (see p 539 b and c, post); Bevan v Webb [1905] 1 Ch 620 applied. b

(iii) It followed that the alternatives were either to direct that R's offer be accepted, or to direct that the receiver pay the rent under the underlease as it fell due and seek to sell the benefit of the underlease. Since, on the evidence, the second course would put the receiver in jeopardy as to his remuneration and costs, the first alternative should be adopted (see p 539 e, post). c

Summons

By a writ issued on 29th October 1971, the plaintiff, Martin Maurice Brenner, sought against the defendant, Malcolm Joel Rose, the dissolution of a partnership carried on by them at 225 Finchley Road, London, NW3, the underlease of which premises was an asset of the partnership. The defendant having acquired the leasehold reversion expectant on the underlease, and a receiver, George Alfred Wale, having been appointed in the proceedings, the receiver on 17th May 1972 issued a summons for directions whether or not he should seek to sell the benefit of the underlease, and j a whether or not he ought to pay the rent under the underlease as it fell due. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Colin Sydenham for the receiver.

I H Maxwell for the plaintiff.

P S A Rossdale for the defendant.

b BRIGHTMAN J. This summons arises out of a partnership action. The applicant is the receiver appointed in the course of the action. The respondents are the plaintiff, Martin Maurice Brenner, and the defendant, Malcolm Joel Rose, who were the partners.

c The partnership commenced in April 1971. The affairs of the partnership were carried on at certain premises which were subject to an underlease, dated 18th August 1971, granted to the defendant. It is not in dispute that the underlease is a partnership asset. Under the terms of the underlease the property was let for a period expiring in 1988, with provision for two rent reviews in the meantime. There is a covenant against assignment or underletting without the consent of the landlord, which consent is not to be unreasonably withheld. There is also a covenant
d against carrying on certain specific trades or businesses, or permitting user for sleeping or residential occupation, and in particular a covenant that the lessee—

‘will only use the said demised premises for the purpose of the trade or business or occupation of Ladies Outfitters or such other trade or business or occupation as shall be approved of by the Lessor and Superior Lessors whose approval shall not be unreasonably withheld by the Lessor’.

e The partners traded in harmony for the brief period of six months. They fell out in September 1971. In the following month a writ was issued for the dissolution of the partnership. Both parties are in agreement that the affairs of the partnership should be wound up by the court. In November 1971 there was an application for the appointment of a receiver. The present receiver was then appointed. He closed f down the business in February 1972.

In May 1972 the stock of the business, such as it was, was sold to the defendant for £650. In November 1971 the leasehold reversion, expectant on the underlease which was the partnership asset, was acquired by the defendant. Since the defendant acquired the leasehold reversion, two quarters’ rent have fallen into arrear, that is, the rent due in June and September 1972. The present amount of the rent is £250
g a quarter. In about another month there will be a further quarter’s rent due if the underlease has not in the meantime been disposed of. The receiver has a sum of about £1,150 in hand. He has liabilities of about £6,000.

In May 1972, the underlease not having been realised for the benefit of the partnership, the defendant’s solicitors wrote a letter to the receiver, offering to accept on behalf of the defendant a surrender of the underlease on the terms that the March h 1972 payment of rent would be forgone and there would be a refund of the rent paid in December 1971. The offer might be regarded as worth something of the order of two quarters’ rent, i.e. £500. On the matter coming before the court today, and in circumstances which I will outline in a minute, the offer has been brought up to date by the defendant. The March 1972 rent has since been paid, but the i June and September 1972 instalments are still unpaid. The current offer by the defendant is to accept a surrender on the terms that the June and September instalments of rent should be forgone, and that the March 1972 payment be refunded, i.e. an offer which might be regarded as worth £750 to the partnership. The offer is on terms that no liability would be enforced against the partnership in respect of other breaches of covenant, such as the covenant to keep the premises in repair which, on the evidence, they certainly are not at the moment.

The receiver has issued a summons which, so far as present purposes are concerned, can be regarded as an application for directions whether he ought to seek to sell the benefit of the underlease, and whether he ought to pay the instalments of rent now due and the instalment which will become due next month. a

At this stage I should mention that the receiver has sought advice from a firm of estate agents on the market value of the underlease. The property is situated at 225 Finchley Road, London, NW3, and is in close proximity to other trading concerns with a profitable flow of pedestrian traffic in the vicinity. The estate agents advise that the current rent of £1,000 a year is approximately the full market rental. They advise that if the property were offered for sale, it is not likely that it would realise more than £1,000. They add that the open market value of the leasehold interest could probably be described as purely nominal. They state that if their valuation were the subject of any form of litigation they might feel some difficulty in substantiating the probability of a premium. It is, perhaps, not altogether easy to see what the estate agents have in mind, but it is the only evidence of market value before the court. I think, for the purpose of reaching a conclusion, I must regard the value as speculative with perhaps a top limit of £1,000. b

Now on the figures, if the rent is paid to date, and if the December 1972 rent is allowed for as well—because it would seem unlikely that a sale could be negotiated until after the December quarter day and probably completion would be somewhat later—there would not be much money left in the hands of the receiver after the sum of £750 is paid out and the costs and expenses of a sale are allowed for. There are no other assets of any other kind in the hands of the receiver, except the £1,150 which I have mentioned. It therefore seems to me, on the evidence I have, that if the arrears of rent and the December rent are paid out of the money in the hands of the receiver, the attempted sale of the underlease would be a gamble which might well put the receiver's financial position in jeopardy. On the other hand if the offer made by the defendant is accepted, not only is the £1,150 retained intact, but there will be another £250 coming in to the receivership as well. c

It is however submitted by counsel for the plaintiff that the receiver should not be authorised or directed to pay the current arrears of rent or the December rent until an endeavour has been made to market the underlease at a price which will cover these rents and leave a profit for the receivership over and above the rents so paid. Counsel for the plaintiff has further submitted that the defendant is in some way inhibited from exercising his rights as landlord by reason of the fact that the underlease is partnership property and that he, the defendant, is a trustee of that property. d

I must therefore consider whether I am entitled to keep the defendant, as landlord, out of possession and out of the rents while endeavours are made to realise this asset. It is true that, as a receiver has been appointed, it is not open to the defendant, as landlord, to enforce his legal right under the terms of the underlease to enter into possession of the property on the ground of non-payment of rent, unless he obtains leave from the court. But the general rule seems to be that the court will grant leave to a landlord to recover possession of the demised premises, notwithstanding the receivership, unless there are special circumstances to justify a different course. I refer in particular to *Hand v Blow*¹ and I read this passage from the judgment of Romer LJ:² e

... in a case where the landlord, by reason of his not being paid or of his covenants not being complied with, has a right to complain and to re-enter, he can apply, notwithstanding the appointment of a receiver, and obtain leave from the Court to re-enter, and so take away from the receiver his right of occupation; f

a and he can also, in a proper case, get leave to distrain: but the mere appointment of a receiver does not of itself, in my opinion, give the landlord any special rights, and has never, so far as I know, been held to do so.'

b I read that interpretation of the law as meaning that in the case before me I ought, if forfeiture proceedings were before me, to give the landlord the right to re-enter should the rent be unpaid and, by parity of reasoning, to direct the receiver to pay the rent if I do not allow the landlord to go into possession.

c In my judgment the right of the landlord in such circumstances either to have possession or to recover the rent is not to be whittled away by the mere fact that he is one of the partners, and is a purchaser of the reversion expectant on the underlease. I do not see that the defendant's fiduciary capacity as a member of a partnership which includes the benefit and burden of the underlease raises any sort of equity which should be allowed to prevent him from exercising the rights as landlord which he would have had if he were a stranger to the partnership. I need only refer to *Bevan v Webb*¹.

d So in the present circumstances it seems to me that the choice before the court is either to accept the offer made by the defendant to take a surrender of the underlease, waive all existing breaches of covenant and repay one quarter's rent, or alternatively to direct the receiver to pay the rent already in arrear, to pay, in due course, the December rent, to endeavour to sell the underlease and to take his chance as to what he may get as a result of that operation. On the evidence before me the second course would I think put the receiver in jeopardy as to his remuneration and costs. There is no offer by the plaintiff to pay arrears of rent out of his own money which might have safeguarded the position of the receiver.

e In these circumstances my proper course is to direct that the offer by the defendant be forthwith accepted, and that the receiver give up possession. If a document of surrender is needed, then no doubt that document can be agreed, or if necessary settled by the court. It does not hold up in any way the acceptance of the defendant's offer, which is now complete and unconditional, and a contract exists.

f Order accordingly.

Currency control – Exchange control – Evasion of restrictions or requirements imposed by Act – Power of Treasury to require information to be furnished for detecting evasion of Act – Extent of power – Exchange Control Act 1947, Sch 5, Part I, para 1 (1), Part II, para 1 (1).

In 1963 the respondent paid a resident in the scheduled territories £14,000. That sum was provided by his sister, and with the proceeds French francs were acquired. The respondent's sister used that sum to buy a property in France. In 1970, at the respondent's suggestion, the sister paid £3,000 to another resident in the scheduled territories, and with that sum French francs were acquired for expenditure on repairs to that property. In 1971, in answer to enquiries by the Treasury, the respondent referred to those sums. Thereafter the sister and her husband were charged with, and convicted of, contravening s 7 (1) (a)^a of the Exchange Control Act 1947 in respect of the £3,000 payment, and s 2 (1)^b of that Act in respect of the £14,000. Following their conviction a Treasury inspector wrote to the respondent asking him (i) whether he knew that the payment made in 1963 to a resident in the scheduled territories was made in association with the acquisition of property in France by the respondent's sister and brother-in-law; and (ii) whether he knew of the existence of the property in France and that his sister had paid £3,000 for repairs to it. The respondent refused to answer those two questions. He was thereupon formally directed by the Treasury to do so and when he again refused was charged with contravening para 1 (1)^c of Part I, and para 1 (1)^d of Part II, of Sch 5 to the 1947 Act. The magistrate dismissed the information on the grounds that para 1 (1) of Part I of Sch 5 was directed to the discovery of non-compliance with the Act rather than with the prosecution of an offender and, the non-compliance having been detected, the Treasury could not, having secured the conviction of the respondent's sister and her husband, ask the respondent in effect whether he was guilty as well. On appeal by the Crown,

Held – On the true construction of para 1 (1) of Part I of Sch 5 the Treasury had power to ask questions the answers to which might incriminate the person of whom they were required, and it was no defence that an evasion had been detected and others had already been convicted; the Treasury could therefore require the respondent to answer both questions as the first was for the purpose of detecting whether or not there had been an evasion of the Act by him which was separate and distinct from the evasions on the part of the sister and her husband, and in relation to the second the fact that the offence committed by the sister under s 7 had been detected did not preclude them from detecting the identity of all the persons participating in the evasion; accordingly the appeal would be allowed and the case sent back to the magistrate with a direction to convict (see p 545 d to j, post).

a This was an appeal by way of a case stated by the chief metropolitan stipendiary magistrate (Sir Frank Milton) in respect of his adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Bow Street on 5th July 1972.

b 1. On 16th March 1972 an information was preferred by the appellant, Frederick Powell for and on behalf of the Director of Public Prosecutions, against the respondent, Timothy Mitchell Ellis, that the respondent, between 16th January and 1st February 1972 within the Greater London area, being in the United Kingdom and having been given by the Treasury directions which required him within 14 days of 17th January 1972 to furnish in writing to one F Powell (being a person designated in the directions as a person authorised to require it) such information in his possession or control as F Powell (being the person so authorised) required for the purpose of securing compliance with or detecting evasion of the Exchange Control Act 1947, contravened the requirement, contrary to para 1 (1) of Part I and para 1 (1) of Part II of Sch 5 to the Exchange Control Act 1947.

c 2. The chief metropolitan magistrate heard the information on 21st June 1972 when he reserved his decision which he gave on 5th July 1972. He found the following facts: (a) By a letter of directions dated 13th May 1971 (and given pursuant to para 1 of Part I of Sch 5 to the 1947 Act) the Treasury required the respondent to furnish in writing signed by him to Inspector F Powell such information and produce such documents as Inspector Powell might require respecting the matters referred to in such letter. (b) A copy of that letter and of the other letters referred to below were annexed to and formed part of the case stated¹. (c) The letter dated 13th May 1971 was served on the respondent on 4th June 1971 by Inspector Powell, who informed the respondent of the information he required in relation to two payments made by or on behalf of the respondent's sister. (d) The respondent wrote to Inspector Powell by letter dated 15th September 1971. That letter was received by Inspector Powell on 22nd October 1971. In that letter the respondent referred to one payment made by him with funds made available to him by his sister and paid by him into the account of Ahmad Homoud Alkalid of PB 212, Kuwait, and one payment by his sister to Josef Yassawi of PB 280, Kuwait, Alkalid and Yassawi having accounts in London. (e) By letter dated 18th November 1971 Inspector Powell asked for further information as to the two payments of £14,000 and £3,000 therein referred to, and the respondent replied by letter dated 22nd December 1971 saying that he was awaiting legal advice. (f) By letter dated 4th January 1972 the respondent's solicitors notified Inspector Powell that the respondent had been advised that he was not obliged to supply the information requested. (g) By a letter of directions dated 14th January 1972 (given as aforesaid and served on the respondent on 17th January 1972) the Treasury directed the respondent to furnish in writing the information there specified. (h) By letter dated 24th January 1972 the respondent's solicitors informed the Treasury that the respondent had been advised that he was not obliged to answer the questions asked in the letter dated 14th January 1972. (i) On 1st November 1971 the respondent's sister and her husband were each convicted by the Harlow magistrates' court (i) of making a payment of £3,000 to a person resident in the scheduled territories in association with the acquisition by Barclays Bank (France) Ltd, of 38,775 French francs, contrary to s 7 (1) (a) of the Exchange Control Act 1947; (ii) failing to offer 138,300 French francs (the proceeds of the sum of £14,000) to an authorised dealer, contrary to s 2 (1) of the 1947 Act.

j 3. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the powers of the Treasury under Sch 5, Part I, para 1 (1) were limited to 'securing compliance with or detecting evasion' of the Act. The alleged function of the questions put in the letter of 17th January 1972 was to 'detect evasion' of the provisions of the Act. Since the evasion, and two illegal payments of £14,000 and £3,000, had been detected and the respondent's sister and her husband had been convicted of offences arising out of those evasions before the letter of 17th January 1972 was served on the respondent, that letter could not be said to be 'requiring information which the Treasury may require for the purpose of . . . detecting evasion' of the Act. The appellant did not contend that the letter could be said to be directed 'to securing compliance with . . . the Act'. That had already been secured and the respondent's sister and her husband had been ordered to make the necessary monetary adjustments to regularise transactions. a

4. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the respondent had contravened a requirement imposed by a direction validly given under para 1 (1) of Part I of Sch 5 to the 1947 Act. The information sought was required by the Treasury for the purpose of detecting evasion of the Act on the part of the respondent. The fact that the respondent's sister and her husband had been convicted under s 7 (1) (a) of the Act in respect of the £3,000 payment and under s 2 (1) of the Act in respect of the francs, though it established evasion of the Act on their part, did not preclude the Treasury from requiring information for the purpose of detecting evasion of the Act on the part of others who had been or might have been involved in the transactions. The term 'evasion' could not be confined to the mere unlawful payment by itself. Each act of evasion of the Act was within Part I of the Act. The questions asked were for the purpose of detecting whether the respondent had himself paid the sum of £14,000 in contravention of the Act and whether he had aided and abetted his sister in contravening the Act, and thereby himself evaded the Act. The questions asked were within the powers given by para 1 (1). b

5. No cases were referred to. c

6. The magistrate was of the opinion that para 1 (1) of Part II of Sch 5 was a penal section and that therefore para 1 (1) of Part I of the schedule must be strictly construed. The Treasury by their letter of 17th January 1972, having secured the conviction of his sister and her husband, were asking the respondent in effect whether he was guilty as well. Paragraph 1 (1) envisaged the discovery of a non-compliance with the 1947 Act rather than the prosecution of an offender. As the non-compliance had been detected well before the service of the letter dated 17th January 1972, the magistrate concluded that the Treasury had no power to require the information sought in that letter. He accordingly dismissed the information and awarded the respondent £150 on account of his costs. d

BRIDGE J delivered the first judgment at the request of Lord Widgery CJ. This is an appeal by the Director of Public Prosecutions by way of case stated from a decision of Sir Frank Milton, the chief metropolitan stipendiary magistrate, who on 5th July 1972 acquitted the respondent, one Timothy Mitchell Ellis, on an information which charged him with contravening a requirement to give information pursuant to directions given by the Treasury which was required for the purpose of securing compliance with or detecting evasion of the Exchange Control Act 1947, that offence being contrary to para 1 (1) of Part I and para 1 (1) of Part II of Sch 5 to that Act. g

The factual transactions which constitute the background of this appeal can be shortly recounted. In 1963 the respondent made a payment, with money provided by his sister, to a Mr Alkalid, a resident in the scheduled territories, of £14,000. With the proceeds of that £14,000 French francs were in fact acquired, and with the French francs the respondent's sister, a Mrs Harrisson, purchased a property in France. Subsequently, in 1970, at the suggestion of the respondent, Mrs Harrisson, then herself made a payment to a Mr Yassawi, another gentleman resident somewhere within the scheduled territories, and the ultimate destination of that £3,000 was again to acquire French francs for expenditure on repairs required to the property which Mrs Harrisson had acquired in France. h a '(1) Every person in or resident in the United Kingdom who is entitled to sell, or to procure the sale of, any gold, or any foreign currency to which this section applies, and is not an authorised dealer, shall offer it, or cause it to be offered, for sale to an authorised dealer, unless the Treasury consent to his retention and use thereof or he disposes thereof to any other person with the permission of the Treasury . . .'

b By s 7 (1):

'Except with the permission of the Treasury, no person shall in the United Kingdom, and no person resident in the United Kingdom shall outside the United Kingdom, make any payment to or for the credit of a person resident in the scheduled territories as consideration for or in association with—(a) the receipt by any person of a payment made outside the scheduled territories, or the acquisition by any person of property which is outside the scheduled territories. . .'

c Provisions for enforcement are contained in Sch 5. Schedule 5, Part I, begins with the power, which is here primarily in question, of the Treasury to require by directions information for the purpose of securing compliance with or detecting evasion of the Act. Paragraph 1 (1) is in very wide terms:

d 'Without prejudice to any other provisions of this Act, the Treasury may give to any person in or resident in the United Kingdom directions requiring him, within such time and in such manner as may be specified in the directions, to furnish to them, or to any person designated in the directions as a person authorised to require it, any information in his possession or control which the Treasury or the person so authorised, as the case may be, may require for the purpose of securing compliance with or detecting evasion of this Act.'

e I can then turn to Part II of the same schedule, which in para 1 (1) contains a comprehensive provision making it a criminal offence to contravene any restriction or requirement of the Act:

f 'Any person in or resident in the United Kingdom who contravenes any restriction or requirement imposed by or under this Act, and any such person who conspires or attempts, or aids, abets, counsels or procures any other person, to contravene any such restriction or requirement as aforesaid, shall be guilty of an offence punishable under this Part of this Schedule . . .'

g In May 1971 a direction in very wide terms under the provisions of para 1 of Part I of Sch 5 was given to the respondent by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, requiring him to provide them with a variety of information as to his financial transactions over a number of years. As a result of that direction, the fact of the payment made by the respondent to Mr Alkalid of £14,000, and the fact that he had suggested to his sister that she should make a payment of £3,000 to Mr Yassawi came to light. In November 1971 the respondent's sister and her husband were prosecuted and in due course convicted of offences under the provisions of the Act to which I have already referred in respect of their part in the two transactions arising out of these two payments of £14,000 and £3,000 respectively. It will be recalled that the payment of £14,000 to Mr Alkalid was made by the respondent, not by the sister; the sister provided the money. In respect of that payment, therefore, there could be no prosecution of the sister under s 7. But in respect of what followed from that payment, the sister was prosecuted and convicted under s 2; she was convicted of failing to offer, as s 2 required her to do, the foreign currency, namely the sum of French francs, which had been acquired with the £14,000 paid to Mr Alkalid, to an authorised dealer. In respect of the payment of £3,000 to Mr Yassawi, on the other hand, that payment having been made directly by the sister with the object of furnishing funds, as funds were in due course in fact furnished, for repair of the French property, the sister was prosecuted under s 7 (1) (a), it being clear from the facts of that case that that had been a payment made by her in association with the acquisition of property outside the scheduled territories, namely the sum of French francs required to expend on the French house. a

In this state of affairs, following the sister's conviction, a Mr Powell, the inspector authorised by the Treasury to receive the information originally demanded from the respondent by the direction given in May, wrote to the respondent on 18th November 1971 asking two specific questions in relation to these two transactions: b

'(1) Did you know that the first payment, i.e., the £14,000 to the Alkalid account was in relation to the acquisition of a property in France? (2) Did you know that the second payment, i.e., the £3,000 to the Yassawi account was in relation to repairs to the property in France?'

Having obtained legal advice, the respondent replied that he was not going to answer, having been advised that the inspector was not entitled to ask him those questions. There then followed on 14th January 1972 the formal direction under para 1 (1) of Part I of Sch 5, non-compliance with which was alleged in the information before the chief magistrate. The questions asked in that letter which the respondent was by the direction required to answer are four in number, but it is in my judgment unnecessary to go beyond the first two. Those questions are: c

'When in 1963 you made a payment of £14,000 to the account of Ahmad Homoud Alkalid, did you know that you were making that payment in association with the acquisition by your brother-in-law Major Peter Damer Harrison and your sister Mrs. Elizabeth Ann Harrison of a property in France? 2. When in 1970 you suggested to your sister, Mrs Elizabeth Ann Harrison, that she should make a payment of £3,000 to the account of Joseph Yassawi (a) did you know that the said Peter Damer and Elizabeth Ann Harrison owned a property in France? (b) did you know that the said Elizabeth Ann Harrison was making a payment in association with the carrying out of repairs to the said property?' d

Again on legal advice the respondent declined to answer those questions and it was that which led to his prosecution. e

The view which was submitted on behalf of the respondent of the proper construction of the provisions of para 1 (1) of Part I of Sch 5 to the 1947 Act, and which commended itself to the chief magistrate, appears from his opinion as stated in para 7 of the case: f

'I was of the opinion that paragraph (1) of Part II of the Fifth Schedule [i.e. the provision creating the offence of contravening the requirements of the Act] was a penal section and that therefore paragraph 1 (1) of Part I of such Schedule [the provision giving the Treasury power to require information] must be strictly construed. The Treasury by their letter of 17th January, 1972, having secured the conviction of the sister and her husband, were asking the respondent in effect whether he was guilty as well. Paragraph 1 (1) envisaged the discovery of a non-compliance with the Act rather than the prosecution of an offender. As the non-compliance had been detected well before the service of the letter dated 17th January 1972, I concluded that the Treasury had no power to require the information sought in the letter. I accordingly dismissed the information and I awarded the respondent £150 on account of his costs.' g

With great respect to the chief magistrate, I am unable to agree with that conclusion on the true construction of these provisions. First, it seems to me clear that the phrase 'evasion of this Act' as used in para 1 of Part I of Sch 5 is, as counsel for the appellant submits, certainly wider than but includes an offence under para 1 of Part II of the schedule. One may, as it seems to me, quite simply test the proposition that the questions asked in the Treasury's letter of 14th January 1972 were directed only to discovering whether the respondent was guilty as well as his sister and her h a husband of an offence under the Act by reference to the first transaction, the payment of the £14,000. In relation to that payment made by the respondent himself to Mr Alkalid, it is clear, of course, that there had been an offence, and an evasion of the Act when Mrs Harrison, the sister, provided the £14,000 to the respondent. It is clear again that there had been an offence and an evasion of the Act, and for this the sister was duly convicted, when the proceeds of that £14,000 had been converted into French francs which were not offered to an authorised dealer, but what, on the facts presently known to the Treasury, is not clear, is whether there had been any evasion of the Act by the act of paying the £14,000 to Mr Alkalid on the part of the present respondent. If that payment was made by the present respondent knowing that the eventual destination of the money was the acquisition of a property in France for his sister, then clearly that was a payment made in association with the acquisition of that property and accordingly was in contravention of s 7 (1) (a) of the Act, and a contravention rendering the respondent guilty of a criminal offence. If, on the other hand, that payment was made by him in ignorance of the fact that the money would be used to acquire a property in France, then the payment was not made in association with that acquisition; there was no evasion of s 7, and there was no offence committed by the respondent. Accordingly it seems to me that if one tests the basis of the learned magistrate's decision by reference to the question whether the first information sought by the Treasury in this direction was properly required for the purpose of detecting an evasion of the Act, the conclusion is clear that the information was required for the purpose of detecting whether or not there had been an evasion of the Act by the respondent, which was separate and distinct from those evasions on the part of Mrs Harrison and her husband which had already been discovered by and prosecuted by the Treasury. But I would not be content to rest my judgment on the proposition that information can only be required under this paragraph where there is, so to speak, a new evasion as opposed to a new evader to be detected. It seems to me in relation to the second question, where the object of the information sought by the Treasury is to discover whether or not the respondent aided and abetted the evasion of s 7, and therefore the offence committed under s 7 by Mrs Harrison in relation to the £3,000, that it would be quite artificial to say that the detection of an offence, once the fact of the evasion is known, cannot extend to detecting the identity of all the persons participating in that evasion.

If I may say so, for my part I feel considerable sympathy with the chief magistrate's attitude to the case. I think any of us brought up in the tradition of English law almost instinctively reacts against a statutory provision which entrenches on the well established principle of the common law that no person can be required to incriminate himself. However, as soon as one looks at the provisions of para 1 of Part I of this schedule, it is quite clear that, as counsel for the respondent frankly accepts, they are not susceptible of any construction which would hold that information sought in a direction given by the Treasury under this provision must stop short of requiring a man to incriminate himself. In the course of detecting evasion the Treasury may require information from a person who will have to disclose that he has been an evader. Once that conclusion is reached it seems to me that the strict construction which the chief magistrate was seeking, which would enable him to avoid conviction in this case by distinguishing between detection of an evasion and detection of the evader, becomes quite untenable. For those reasons I would allow this appeal and send the case back to the magistrate with a direction to convict.

Highway – Dedication – Evidence – Provisional map – Dispute – Determination of quarter sessions – Effect – Issue whether path a public right of way as shown on map – Decision of quarter sessions that path a public path – Decision in rem – Decision binding on court in subsequent litigation – National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949, s 31 (1).

A county council prepared a provisional map under the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 which showed a path across the appellant's land as a public path. The appellant applied to quarter sessions under s 31 (1)^a of the 1949 Act for a declaration that there was no public right of way over his land. Quarter sessions refused to make the declaration asked for by the appellant. The necessary consequence of that decision was that, when the county council came to prepare the definitive map under s 32 (1)^b of the 1949 Act, the path would be shown as a public path and, by virtue of s 32 (4)^c, the definitive map was conclusive evidence that it was a public path. After the decision of quarter sessions and before the definitive map had been prepared, the appellant chained and padlocked a gate giving access to the path. He was charged before the justices with wilful obstruction of a highway, contrary to s 121 (1) of the Highways Act 1959. At his trial the earlier decision of quarter sessions was proved and the justices refused to allow the appellant to call evidence to show that the path was not a public path. The appellant was convicted and appealed.

Held – The appeal would be dismissed. Under the provisions of the 1949 Act quarter sessions was the tribunal deliberately set up to determine whether or not a path was a public path. A decision of quarter sessions on that issue was therefore a decision in rem which was binding on the justices and which could not be relitigated before them (see p 550 f and p 551 d and e, post).

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the county of Cumberland in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Carlisle on 1st August 1972.

- c* 1. On 23rd June 1972 an information was preferred by the respondent, Thomas John Roland Whitfield, clerk of Cumberland County Council, against the appellant, George Lionel Wood Armstrong, charging that he on 31st May 1972, at Harker, Stanwix, in the county of Cumberland, without lawful authority or excuse, wilfully obstructed the free passage along Green Lane, Harker, a highway, by chaining and padlocking the gate giving access to Green Lane, contrary to s 121 (1) of the Highways Act 1959.
- d* 2. The following facts were found. Green Lane was a highway. The appellant wilfully obstructed Green Lane as alleged in the information. The following was a short statement of the evidence given on behalf of the respondent on the basis of which the justices found as a fact that Green Lane was a highway. The Cumberland County Council was the responsible authority under Part IV of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 for the preparation of a map showing rights of way within the county of Cumberland and for reviewing the particulars contained in such map from time to time. The county council commenced a review of rights of way within the county on 1st November 1967 and included Green Lane on the draft revised map as a public footpath. Green Lane was also included on the provisional revised map, published on 19th November 1970, as a public footpath. The appellant and Margaret Jane Armstrong applied to the general quarter sessions for the county of Cumberland under s 31 (1) (a) of the 1949 Act for a declaration that at 1st November 1967 there was no public right of way over Green Lane. That application was heard on 14th April 1971 and an order was made dismissing the application. No appeal was lodged against the decision of quarter sessions. A copy of the order of quarter sessions was produced in evidence.
- e* 3. It was contended by the respondent: (a) that under s 31 (3) (a) of the 1949 Act the court of quarter sessions was compelled to make the declaration sought by the appellant and Margaret Jane Armstrong unless it was proved to the satisfaction of the court that there was at the relevant date a public right of way over the land; since the application for a declaration had been dismissed it was a necessary inference that the court of quarter sessions had found proved to its satisfaction that there was, on 1st November 1967, a public right of way over Green Lane; that decision, by a court of record, not having been appealed against, was a final and conclusive finding of fact that a public right of way on foot existed over Green Lane; (b) that the county council had a statutory duty under s 32 of the 1949 Act to prepare a definitive map and statement which must inevitably include Green Lane as a public right of way on foot and as such definitive map (when published) would be conclusive as to the particulars contained therein by virtue of s 32 (4) (a) of the 1949 Act the justices were bound to give effect to that statutory provision.
- f* 4. It was contended by the appellant: (a) that on the true construction of s 31 of the 1949 Act the effect of the order of 5th April 1971 could not be to establish for the purposes of the proceedings before the justices that Green Lane was a highway; (b) that the principle (which the respondent appeared to invoke) that 'Equity looks on that as done which ought to be done' should have no place in a criminal court; (c) that the burden of proof in civil and criminal cases being so different it was not open to the justices to accept the order of quarter sessions as evidence in a criminal case, particularly in view of the last paragraph of the judgment of quarter sessions which read: 'So the application for a declaration fails, and one might say that it fails at the last ditch . . .'; (d) that in the premises there was no case for the appellant to answer in that the respondent had not established that Green Lane was a highway; (e) that in any event it should be open to the appellant to call further evidence on the issue of whether or not Green Lane was a highway.
- h*
- j*

5. The justices were of the opinion that the issue whether or not Green Lane was a highway was res judicata, that the appellant was estopped from calling evidence on that issue, and that counsel for the appellant should not be allowed to address them further on the question of the admissibility of such evidence on other grounds. Accordingly they ordered that the appellant be fined £15 and that he pay £10 costs.

John Spedding for the appellant.

J C C Blofeld for the respondent.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the county of Cumberland sitting as a magistrates' court in the petty sessional division of Cumberland ward at Carlisle on 1st August 1972. On that day they had before them an information preferred by the respondent, who is the clerk to the Cumberland County Council, against the appellant, who is a local landowner, that the appellant on a date in May without lawful authority or excuse did wilfully obstruct the free passage along Green Lane, Harker, a highway, by the chaining and padlocking of the gate giving access to Green Lane, contrary to s 121 (1) of the Highways Act 1959.

When the matter came before the justices, they found that Green Lane was a highway. Precisely what the significance of that finding is I have some doubt, but of course it is not simply a question of fact but a mixed question of fact and law. However, they found that Green Lane was a highway, and they found what was undoubtedly a fact that the appellant had wilfully obstructed Green Lane as alleged in the information; in other words, he had locked a gate that crossed the way. From those simple beginnings, there comes a somewhat complicated and not altogether easy question of law for the determination of this court, because what had happened was this. Pursuant to their duty under the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 the Cumberland County Council were, as far as the case shows, in the process of preparing a footpath map under the terms of that Act. I say 'as far as the case shows' because we have not been told of any previous activity in the form of an earlier map, and we must take this as the case sets the facts out.

It will be remembered that, under the 1949 Act, county councils were required in the first instance to prepare a draft map of the public footpaths in their area. Those who were aggrieved by the insertions of a public footpath over their land which they challenged, had initially a right of appeal to an authority set up by the county council, and if the county council, having heard these objections, was still minded to say that the path in question was a public path, the county council was required by s 30 to move on to the preparation of a provisional map showing the path as a public path. If the landowner had failed at the first round and found that this land was still incumbered by an alleged public footpath in the provisional map, his course was to appeal to quarter sessions under s 31. That provides as follows:

'(1) At any time within twenty-eight days after the publication of a notice under subsection (1) of the last foregoing section, the owner, lessee or occupier of any land shown on the map to which the notice relates, being land on which the map shows a public path, or a road used as a public path, may apply to quarter sessions for a declaration—(a) that at the relevant date mentioned in the provisional statement there was no public right of way over the land . . .'

a It is therefore clear enough so far; the landowner has the right to apply to quarter sessions and ask quarter sessions for a declaration that there is no public footpath along the line alleged on the provisional map. Section 31 (3) provides for what is to be done when such an application comes before quarter sessions; it is in these terms:

b 'If on the hearing of an application under subsection (1) of this section, being an application for a declaration under paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of that subsection, it is not proved to the satisfaction of the court or committee—(a) in the case of an application under the said paragraph (a), that there was at the relevant date a public right of way over the land . . . the court or committee shall make the declaration sought by the applicant.'

I have left out the irrelevant words. So when the matter comes before the quarter sessions, unless the county council can prove that there was at the relevant date a public right of way over the line in question, then the court shall make a declaration to the effect that no such public right of way exists. It is provided by s 31 (8) that:

c 'Subject to the last foregoing subsection and to the next following section, a declaration made under this section shall be conclusive evidence of the matters stated in the declaration'.

d So if the landowner wins at quarter sessions and the declaration is made that there is no public right over the line in question, then that is conclusive evidence of the facts stated.

Finally, by s 32 (1) it is provided that:

e 'As soon as may be after the determination of all applications made under the last foregoing section as respects any map and statement, or if no such applications have been duly made then as soon as may be after the time for making such applications has expired, the surveying authority shall prepare a definitive map and statement, and shall cause notice of the preparation thereof, and of places where copies thereof may be inspected at all reasonable hours, to be published in the London Gazette and in one or more local newspapers circulating in the area of the authority.'

f By s 32 (4):

'A definitive map and statement prepared under subsection (1) of this section shall be conclusive as to the particulars contained therein in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this section [to the extent there set out].'

g So at the end of the day, one sees the scheme of the Act to be as follows, that if the landowner wins at quarter sessions he gets an immediate declaration in his favour, and that is conclusive evidence that there is no public right of way. If he loses at quarter sessions, quarter sessions makes no declaration at all, and the effect under s 32 is that when the definitive map is published, it will show the disputed path as a public right of way, and by virtue of s 32 (4) the definitive map is itself conclusive of statements of that kind.

h What happened in this case was that the earlier steps under the Act having duly taken place and the provisional map having been prepared showing the disputed path a public right of way, the present appellant applied to quarter sessions under s 31; we have the judgment of quarter sessions before us, although we have not had to look at it in detail, and I pause only to say that it is perfectly clear that before quarter sessions both parties were represented by counsel, and the matter was evidently fully debated and examined, as one would expect. In the result the present appellant lost—
i in other words quarter sessions found that there was a public path; they declined to make the declaration in his favour, and all that was left under the Act was for that conclusion to be reflected in the definitive map which on its publication would be conclusive of the particulars there disclosed.

But what happened in fact was that some delay occurred between the hearing of this application before quarter sessions and the publication of the definitive map, and in that interval the appellant locked the gate and obstructed the path, as the justices have found. When he was prosecuted for that offence before the justices, the prosecution, the county council, merely proved the previous decision of the quarter sessions on this question and submitted that that was conclusive of the matter and that the justices were not entitled to go afresh into the question of whether this path was or was not a public path. The appellant submitted that the justices were required to go into the matter again; he sought to open it again and the justices' finding as stated in their opinion is that the appellant was estopped from calling evidence on this issue, the estoppel being based on the earlier decision of quarter sessions under s 31.

It is a nice point as anyone who hears the circumstances will appreciate. The main argument for the respondent below was that this was a case of issue estoppel; this was a case in which the issue, public path or not, having been decided by a competent court, any subsequent court was estopped from rehearing the matter, and indeed the appellant was estopped from calling evidence with a view to hearing the issue afresh.

We have had the assistance of counsel on this question, and counsel for the appellant contends that this is not a case of issue estoppel. It will not, I hope, be thought disrespectful of his argument if I summarise the way in which I understand it to be put. He says first of all that issue estoppel is a topic still largely undeveloped in the law of this country and he has referred us to at least two dicta of Lord Parker CJ¹ indicating that in Lord Parker CJ's view there was little, if any, room for issue estoppel in criminal cases; it is of course to be remembered that the charge of obstructing the highway was a criminal charge, albeit a relatively minor one. For my part, without developing the argument more fully, I accept what counsel submits on this issue, and if this turned solely on the somewhat esoteric principle of issue estoppel, I would have been inclined to say that the justices were wrong, and that issue estoppel would not bar the reconsideration on evidence of the issue whether this path was a public path.

But in my judgment there is a shorter and far more reliable route to the answer which the justices reached, and that is on the submission of counsel for the respondent that the decision of quarter sessions in this case was a decision in rem, a decision which bound the world so far as this issue was concerned, and therefore a decision which prevented the justices from going into the matter again.

His principal authority is *Mayor, Aldermen and Citizens of the City of Wakefield v Cooke*². The headnote accurately illustrates the point then in issue. It says³:

'In proceedings taken by an urban authority under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, ss. 6, 7, 8, to compel owners of premises to do private street works in a street, the determination by a Court of summary jurisdiction that the street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large is a judgment in rem and conclusive as to the status of the street, and the question whether it is so repairable is res judicata in any future proceedings under these sections.'

The speech dealing with this matter is that of the Earl of Halsbury LC. His Lordship said⁴:

'... let us turn for a moment to the statute which is before your Lordships, and the distinction will be at once apparent. Instead of its being left to the determination of the local authority to give notice, and when that notice is disobeyed

a to do the work themselves, and thereupon when they have done the work themselves to sue for the amount against the person who disobeyed their order—instead of that, a whole machinery is created by which the question of whether or not the street is repairable by the parish shall be determined by a particular tribunal—a tribunal erected for this express purpose; and when one looks to see what that particular forum erected for that purpose is to determine, it is sufficient to see the number of objections which can be made and what has to be determined: “(a) That an alleged street or part of a street is not or does not form part of a street within the meaning of this Act” (that is a question which relates to a different class of things that the urban authority have got to do). “(b) That a street or part of a street is (in whole or in part) a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.” So that, instead of being, as it is, under the Public Health Act [1875], something removed from the jurisdiction of the justices, who have only power to issue process and enforce the payment of a sum of money payable under the circumstances stated in the 150th section, in this Act the very question whether or not a particular road is or is not a highway repairable by the parish is remitted to that tribunal, and remitted to that tribunal for the purpose of determination.’

d It seems to me that virtually every word of that passage could be said of the Act with which we are presently concerned, because I have already referred to the Act sufficiently to show quarter sessions here is set up deliberately as a tribunal for the express purpose on application of determining whether the path is a public path or not. If the decision in the Wakefield Corporation case¹ was a decision in rem, as it was in the view of their Lordships, then it seems to me abundantly clear that the decision

e of quarter sessions in this case was also a decision in rem.

I must say that I reach that conclusion without regret, because it really would be an extraordinary thing if the situation were otherwise. It would mean that the present appellant could go to the justices and relitigate the whole issue of the status of this path only to find, if he succeeded before the justices, that as soon as the definitive map was published, the definitive map put him back in the position in which he had

f been before he sought to relitigate the issue.

On the face of it there is a lacuna in the Act, because there is nothing which in terms says that the decision of quarter sessions shall be conclusive, pending the publication of the definitive map, but that the support for quarter sessions in the definitive map is inevitable in these circumstances is something which seems entirely clear to me, and accordingly it would be at the least very odd if the decision were not a decision in rem g and were capable of being relitigated with those unfortunate consequences.

For those reasons I have come to the conclusion that the justices were right, although I base my conclusion on somewhat different grounds, and I would dismiss the appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

ROSKILL LJ, THOMPSON AND SHAW JJ

15th FEBRUARY 1973

Criminal law – Verdict – Alternative offence – Allegations in indictment amounting to or including allegation of another offence – Rape – Indecent assault on woman – Count alleging rape – Victim aged 14 – Age irrelevant to charge of rape – Defence of consent – Consent no defence to indecent assault where victim under age of 16 – Acquittal of rape – Whether allegation of rape including allegation of indecent assault – Whether open to jury to convict of indecent assault – Sexual Offences Act 1956, s 14 (1), (2) – Criminal Law Act 1967, s 6 (3).

The accused were charged with rape. At the time of the alleged offence the victim was 14 years old. The defence of each of the accused was that the girl had consented to have sexual intercourse. In his summing-up the judge directed the jury that if they found the accused not guilty of rape, it was open to them under s 6 (3)^a of the Criminal Law Act 1967 to find the accused guilty of indecent assault, contrary to s 14 (1)^b of the Sexual Offences Act 1956. The accused were acquitted of rape but convicted of indecent assault. They appealed contending that the allegations in the indictment could not 'amount to or include' an allegation of indecent assault, within s 6 (3) of the 1967 Act, since age, while not relevant to a charge of rape, was an essential averment in a charge of indecent assault, for the question whether consent was a defence to the charge depended, by virtue of s 14 (2) of the 1956 Act, on whether the victim was under the age of 16.

Held – The accused had been properly convicted and the appeals would be dismissed. Age was not an ingredient of or an essential averment in the framing of a count of indecent assault contrary to s 14 (1) of the 1956 Act. Every charge of rape contained the essential ingredients of indecent assault—an assault and indecency. It followed that where a man was acquitted of rape on the ground of the victim's consent it was nonetheless open to the jury to convict him, where the victim was under 16, of indecent assault because the consent which provided a defence to the charge of rape could not, by virtue of s 14 (2), provide a defence to the charge of indecent assault (see p 556 g to p 557 c, post).

Appeals

- b* The appellants, Roger Harry Watson Hodgson, Roger Johnson Marshall, David Douglas Hadden and Kevin Alan Moon, were charged on an indictment in the Crown Court at Lewes before Thesiger J and a jury, that each appellant, save Hadden, had, on 23rd July 1972, 'had sexual intercourse with [a named girl] without her consent, she being fourteen years of age'; Hadden was charged with attempt to commit the same offence. Each appellant pleaded not guilty on the ground that the girl had consented to have sexual intercourse. On 23rd November 1972 each of the appellants was found not guilty of rape, or attempted rape, but in each case guilty of indecent assault. They were sentenced as follows: (i) Hodgson, six months' imprisonment, three months' imprisonment concurrent for breach of a conditional discharge of two years passed on 30th September 1971 and two months' concurrent for breach of such a sentence suspended for one year imposed on 31st January 1972; (ii) Marshall, six months' imprisonment; (iii) Hadden, six months' detention and three months' detention concurrent for breach of a conditional discharge of two years passed on 30th September 1971; (iv) Moon, three months' detention and three months' detention concurrent for breach of a conditional discharge of 12 months imposed on 1st November 1971. They appealed, by leave of the full court, against their convictions and sentences. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

D H Penry-Davey for the appellants.

Christopher Sumner for the Crown.

- e* ROSKILL LJ delivered the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal, brought by leave of the full court on 22nd January 1973, by four young men, one of whom one might almost still call a boy, against their respective convictions before Thesiger J at Lewes Crown Court on 23rd November 1972. They are, respectively, Hodgson who was 21 at the time, Marshall who was 20, Hadden who was 18 and Moon who was 15. The first three I have named are now in the dock in this court, having been sentenced by the learned judge in the case of Marshall and Hodgson to sentences totalling six months' imprisonment and in the case of Hadden to six months in a detention centre. Moon has served the three months' detention centre sentence passed on him by the learned judge and is accordingly no longer in custody.

- f* Three of these boys were charged with the rape of the girl concerned and the fourth with attempted rape. Of those charges of rape and attempted rape respectively they were all acquitted. They were convicted of indecent assault in circumstances I shall relate more fully in a moment.

- g* It is not necessary to go into the facts at any great length save to say that the story which was disclosed by the Crown was, by any standards, nauseating—harsher language could legitimately be used—for the girl who was the subject of the charges of rape and the convictions of indecent assault was about 14 at the time. It is true she was not a virgin, and she was referred to by the learned judge, before he passed sentence, as a 'tart', but these boys were 'greasers' and there is no doubt when one looks at the evidence, that they subjected this girl, whatever her part, to a quite horrifying experience. The girl had had, apparently fairly recently, a brain operation. She was simple. When she was found afterwards, she was semi-dazed, covered in dirt, there was gravel in her hair, and her speech was slurred. Her own doctor said at her trial that she had brain weakness and was somewhat vacant. Her mental processes were slow because both of her general condition and the barbiturates she had been taking. She had been drinking that night, and of course it is elementary that alcohol on top of barbiturates can have, and did on that occasion have, a devastating effect.

I only mention these matters because it has been suggested in support of the appeals against sentence that these young men have been convicted and sentenced for purely anti-social behaviour and not for criminal activity. This court, which proposes to uphold the convictions and sentences, wishes emphatically to make it clear that it rejects the arguments that these young men have only been convicted of and sentenced for anti-social behaviour. They have all been convicted of serious indecent assaults against a girl of 14 who, whatever her part, was subjected that evening to a series of sexual assaults by these young men in furtherance of their own lusts.

I now pass to the central point in this case on which leave to appeal was given by the full court. There was in the original indictment against each of these young men, a charge of rape only. The charge was framed in the usual way, that is to say that the three who were charged with rape, had sexual intercourse with the girl without her consent. Hadden was charged only with attempted rape. There was not in the indictment as originally framed (and it was right that there was not) any averment relating to the age of the girl. For a reason which is fairly obvious in the light of what happened later, the learned judge, before the trial started, in the presence of counsel, but not in the presence of counsel actually appearing for the Crown at the trial, gave a direction that the words 'she being 14 years of age' should be added to each of the counts of rape and to the count which charged attempted rape. That was done and the trial proceeded on that basis.

With the greatest respect to a most experienced judge, that addition ought not to have been made. It was an irrelevant averment and it is quite wrong that any difficulties which may arise under s 6 (3) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 should be sought to be overcome in advance by adding to the major charge in the indictment an unnecessary and in fact irrelevant averment. This court agrees with what was said on this point by Cusack J in *R v Fisher*¹ tried by that learned judge at Newcastle in December 1968. In that case the count charging rape included the age of the girl. The learned judge expressed the view that that averment as to age was irrelevant and ought not to have been added. This court agrees and proceeds to deal with the present appeal on the footing that these irrelevant words had not been added.

The critical question is whether, these counts being of rape or in the one case of attempted rape, the judge was right in leaving to the jury the possibility of convicting these men, as ultimately each was convicted, of indecent assault. That is the central point on which leave to appeal was given.

The legal history of this problem is complex and arises in this way. As is well known, under the Sexual Offences Act 1956, Sch 2, Part I, provision was made that on a charge of rape, there were no less than nine other offences of which a jury might find an accused guilty if they acquitted him of rape. It is not necessary to go through all those nine in detail. Suffice it to say that they include in the right-hand column '(v) of intercourse with a girl between thirteen and sixteen' and in (ix) in the right hand column 'of indecent assault on a woman'. When the Criminal Law Act 1967 was passed by Parliament, it was thought necessary, in connection with the enactment of s 6 (3), to repeal parts of the earlier legislation. When one looks at the Criminal Law Act 1967, Sch 2, para 13 (1), one finds:

'The following provisions (under which on a trial on indictment a person may be found guilty of certain offences if found not guilty on a charge of another offence) shall cease to have effect . . . (d) in the Sexual Offences Act 1956, in Schedule 2,—(i) in item 1 (a), paragraphs (iv), (v), (vi) and (viii) in column 4 (conviction of intercourse with girl under 13, or under 16, or with defective, or of incest, on charge of rape) . . .'

When one passes from that provision to the provisions of Sch 3, Part III, to the 1967 Act, one finds against the rubric of the Sexual Offences Act 1956, the repeal 'In a Schedule 2, in item 1, paragraphs (iv) to (ix) in column 4 together with the word "or" at the end of paragraph (iii) . . .

Therefore, so far as concerns the present convictions of indecent assault, it is clear that they can only be supported if they can be justified under s 6 (3) of the Criminal Law Act 1967. This subsection has been before this court on a number of occasions since it was first enacted and it is well known that it has unfortunately given rise to difficulties. The most recent case is *R v Lillis*¹. Section 6 (3) reads thus:

b 'Where, on a person's trial on indictment for any offence except treason or murder, the jury find him not guilty of the offence specifically charged in the indictment, but the allegations in the indictment amount to or include (expressly or by implication) an allegation of another offence falling within the jurisdiction of the court of trial, the jury may find him guilty of that other offence or of an c offence of which he could be found guilty on an indictment specifically charging that other offence.'

In *Fisher's case*² Cusack J held, as this court thinks rightly, that where a person was charged with rape, it was not open to a jury to convict him by reason of the provisions of s 6 (3) on a charge of unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under the age of 16.
d That was all *Fisher's case*² decided. This court respectfully agrees with the learned judge's decision, which in substance anticipated the decision and reasoning in *Lillis's case*¹.

The present point arose for direct decision in *R v Mochan*³ also tried by Cusack J at the Monmouthshire Assizes. The point which had arisen in *Fisher's case*² regarding the possibility of an alternative conviction for unlawful sexual intercourse with a e girl under 16 also arose. In that latter respect the learned judge followed his previous decision in *Fisher's case*². But he also held that the position was different in the case of indecent assault, and that it was open on a charge of rape, if the jury acquitted of rape, for them to convict a defendant of indecent assault. The learned judge dealt with the matter in this way. When dealing with *Fisher's case*², he said⁴:

f 'This case is weaker than *Fisher's case*² because there there was the averment in the indictment that the girl was under 16, although that is an unnecessary averment for the purposes of rape. In the present indictment the age is rightly omitted. If the absence of consent is the essence of the offence of rape I do not see how it includes an offence distinguished from rape by being capable of being committed with consent. I shall direct the jury that it is not open to convict g of unlawful sexual intercourse.'

When he dealt with the present point, he said⁵:

h 'The situation with regard to indecent assault is different. Rape implies an assault and that the assault was indecent. I shall direct the jury that indecent assault is an alternative verdict open in this case.'

It is that decision which counsel for the appellants has sought to criticise in this court.

It is interesting to observe what is said about that decision in a note in the Criminal Law Review⁶. The learned judge's decision was not criticised. But the underlying reasoning was criticised by the unnamed writer who said:

1 [1972] 2 All ER 1209, [1972] 2 QB 236
2 [1969] 1 All ER 265, [1969] 2 QB 114
3 [1969] 1 WLR 1331
4 [1969] 1 WLR at 1332
6 [1969] Crim LR 663 at 664

'Where the offence alleged in the indictment consists of, for example, four ingredients, A, B, C and D, it would seem that the accused could properly be convicted on that indictment of any offence compounded solely of these ingredients and no other. Thus he might be convicted of an offence which consisted in ingredients A, B and C or A, B and D or A and B, and so on. He could not, however, be convicted of any offence containing an additional ingredient, E, not being an essential constituent of the offence charged. The victim's being under sixteen is not an essential constituent of rape—i.e., it is ingredient E in the above example. [The writer goes on:] The judge gave an additional reason why the allegation of rape did not include an offence under section 6 of the Sexual Offences Act—"If the absence of consent is the essence of the offence of rape I do not see how it includes an offence distinguished from rape by being capable of being committed with consent". This is more difficult to follow. The absence of consent is an essential ingredient of rape which is not required on a charge under section 6; if fornication or adultery were an offence, surely it would be possible to convict of it on a charge of rape. It is indeed not entirely clear that this additional reason given by the judge is consistent with his decision that indecent assault was an alternative verdict open to the jury. Since the girl was under sixteen, this too was an offence that was capable of being committed with consent. It is respectfully submitted that the second reason given is unsound.'

With great respect to Cusack J, this court agrees with that criticism. The true reason for the distinction is that age, though irrelevant to the charge of rape, is relevant to the charge of unlawful sexual intercourse, and therefore the 'red pencil' test could not be applied to the count charging rape to justify conviction of unlawful sexual intercourse. Counsel for the appellants has sought to persuade us that the count of indecent assault is not, as it were, a 'built in' alternative under s 6(3), because he argues, that age is likewise an essential averment in a charge of indecent assault, since otherwise acquittal on a rape count on the ground of consent would also be a defence to a charge of indecent assault unless the girl was under 16. His argument was in effect that since age is irrelevant to the rape count, there cannot be a conviction on any alternative count to which the age is relevant. He claimed that there ought to have been an alternative count of indecent assault on a girl under the age of 16 if the prosecution wished to seek conviction of that offence as an alternative to the rape charge.

That argument, in the view of this court, is unsound. The offence against s 14 (1) of the Sexual Offences Act 1956, as *R v Stephenson*¹ (decided under earlier legislation) shows, is indecent assault. The position is different in the case of the offence created by s 5 of the 1956 Act, namely unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under 13. The offence here in question is indecent assault contrary to s 14 (1). It is properly charged without the girl's age being averred. Age is not an essential ingredient of or essential averment in the framing of the count, though sometimes it is included. Age only arises, if at all, when the question of consent is raised on the part of the accused. Then the prosecution have to show that that defence of consent is not open to the accused as a matter of law because of the provisions of s 14 (2) of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 that in a case of a girl under 16 consent cannot be a defence.

There is a marked contrast between the language of s 5 and the language of s 14 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956. The former provides that it is a felony—that no longer exists—for a man to have unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under the age of 13. Therefore, if a man is charged under s 5, age is an essential averment. But if he is charged with an offence against s 14 (1) the age, as I have already said, is not an essential averment, for the subsection provides:

'It is an offence, subject to the exception mentioned in subsection (3) of this section, for a person to make an indecent assault on a woman.'

a There is nothing about age. Subsection (2) provides:

‘A girl under the age of sixteen cannot in law give any consent which would prevent an act being an assault for the purposes of this section.’

b It is plain, of course, that a charge of rape of necessity involves two of the same constituent elements that are also involved in the charge of indecent assault—an assault and indecency. Every charge of rape therefore as it were contains within itself the essential ingredients of indecent assault. It follows that in a case where a man is acquitted of rape nonetheless it is open to the jury to convict him, in a case where the victim is under 16 years of age, of indecent assault, because the consent which provides a defence to the charge of rape cannot as a matter of law provide a defence to the charge of indecent assault.

c Therefore, in the view of this court, although the learned judge ought not to have added the irrelevant words at the end of the rape count, nonetheless he was entitled to direct the jury that it was open to them on the facts of this case if they acquitted of rape, to convict of indecent assault. It is to be observed that on their own stories, none of the appellants could for one moment have any defence to indecent assault once it was proved that this girl was under 16 years of age.

d It was also said that as a matter of practice it is unjust, where the real charge is rape, to leave to the jury an alternative charge of indecent assault on the ground that the girl concerned was incapable of consent because she was under 16. In the view of this court, it is impossible to generalise. No two cases are precisely alike. In some cases one can imagine circumstances where it might be said to be unfair that if a jury were to acquit on the rape charge on the ground of consent, that the accused should be put in peril on an indecent assault charge. But there are undoubtedly other cases, and in the view of this court the present is without question such a case, in which the overall interests of justice require that a charge of indecent assault should be left to the jury as what is sometimes called a ‘built in’ alternative to the rape charge. That was what the learned judge did in the present case. In the view of this court what he did in this respect was justified.

f We have also been referred to a number of cases. It is not necessary to go through them. They were heard in the Court of Criminal Appeal in the early days following the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1922. All it is necessary to say is that there is nothing in them which assists us towards a solution of the present case. All the appeals against conviction are dismissed.

g So far as sentences are concerned, in the view of this court this was an exceedingly bad case of indecent assault by all these boys on a girl of whom, although they were acquitted of her rape, they unquestionably took advantage in the condition in which she was that night. This court sees nothing wrong in the sentences of six months’ imprisonment or detention passed in the case of the three boys in the dock or in the three months’ sentence passed on Moon which has already been referred to. In the view of this court these sentences were in no way severe. Furthermore each of these young men was not only guilty of criminal conduct that night, but each of them has a variety of previous convictions. Their records are lamentable. Their conduct that night was criminal. What injury they inflicted on that girl only they know. There is no ground for extending any leniency towards them and all their appeals against sentence are dismissed.

S was a lighterman employed by the plaintiffs on one of their barges in the Port of London. Like his fellow employees S was a member of the defendant trade union; it was a long tradition in the London docks that every man should belong to a union. However, for reasons of his own, S decided to leave the union and, in June 1972, he stopped paying his dues. In consequence his membership lapsed. On Thursday, 28th September he informed the skipper of his tug, who was also a shop steward of the union, that he was in arrears with his contributions. In consequence the crew refused to work with S unless his union dues were fully paid up by the following Monday. The skipper also reported the matter to the union which endorsed the crew's decision. An official of the union told the plaintiffs' manager what had happened and said that if S was not withdrawn from the tug she 'will not sail on Monday, nor will any of the rest of the [plaintiffs'] tugs'. The plaintiffs had no quarrel with the union about their policy; they accepted the principle of 100 per cent union membership. In consequence of the attitude adopted by the union and the men the plaintiffs sent S home on full pay. Under the Dock Workers Employment Scheme 1967^a, however, they were unable to dismiss S without the consent of the National Dock Labour Board. The board refused an application by the plaintiffs for consent to his dismissal. Accordingly S remained at home on full pay. Thereafter the plaintiffs issued a writ against the union and certain officials of the union claiming a declaration that their conduct was unlawful and by notice of motion sought an interim order restraining the union and two other defendants from instructing, directing or recommending to any union member in the plaintiffs' employment that he should withhold his labour because of the employment of S as a lighterman. Brightman J^b dismissed the motion on the grounds e a that, under s 132 (1), (2)^c, of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, the defendants' acts were not actionable in tort since they had been done in contemplation or furtherance of an 'industrial dispute' within s 167 (1)^d of the 1971 Act. On appeal, Held – (i) The acts of the defendants had not been done 'in furtherance of an industrial dispute', since the only dispute which existed at the time the acts were done was a dispute between S and the defendants, i.e. a dispute between workmen and workmen, which did not fall within the definition of 'industrial dispute' in s 167 (1). Furthermore the defendants had failed to establish that the acts done by them had been done 'in contemplation of' a dispute between the defendants and the plaintiffs; the plaintiffs were not concerned to espouse the cause of S and the threats of strike action had been made by the defendants in the expectation that they would be successful and that the plaintiffs would agree to comply with the defendants' demands.

c Accordingly the defendants' acts were actionable in tort (see p 562 e and j to p 563 a, p 565 e f and h to p 566 b, p 570 c, p 571 f to p 572 a and p 572 j to p 573 b, post).

(ii) The plaintiffs were not, however, entitled to the interlocutory relief sought, and the appeal would be dismissed, because (per Lord Denning MR) their action was doubtful of success in that it appeared likely that S had been actuated so much by ill-will that the defendants had sufficient justification or excuse for their conduct (see p 567 b to g and p 569 c, post); (per Buckley and Orr LJ) the loss flowing from the allegedly wrongful acts was wholly financial, precisely quantifiable, modest in amount and well within the financial competence of the union to recoup; there was no evidence that any of the respondents to the motion intended to do any of the things mentioned in the notice of motion or that the status quo would be disturbed pending the trial of the action; in the circumstances the balance of convenience lay decisively against the grant of interlocutory relief (see p 572 f to h and p 573 d, post).

Semle. The words 'terms and conditions' in para (a) of the definition of 'industrial dispute' in s 167 (1) of the 1971 Act relate to contractual terms and conditions and the words 'suspension of employment' in para (b) do not refer to a mere suspension from duty but to temporary discontinuance of both work and pay under a contract which permits such discontinuance whilst the contract of employment remains in force. Accordingly a dispute between employers and workers relating wholly or mainly to the suspension of a worker from duty on full pay would not be an 'industrial dispute' within s 167 (1) (see p 566 c to e, p 572 b to d and p 573 c, post).

Per Lord Denning MR. Where, by virtue of s 132 of the 1971 Act, conduct would not otherwise be actionable in tort, the fact that that conduct constitutes an unfair industrial practice cannot have the effect of making it actionable in tort (see p 568 h to p 569 a, post).

Decision of Brightman J, p 341, ante, affirmed on other grounds.

h c Section 132, so far as material, provides:

'(1) An act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute shall not be actionable in tort on the ground only—(a) that it induces another person to break a contract to which that other person is a party or prevents another person from performing such a contract, or (b) that it consists in his threatening that a contract (whether one to which he is a party or not) will be broken or will be prevented from being performed, or that he will induce another person to break a contract to which that other person is a party or will prevent another person from performing such a contract.

'(2) For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that an act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute is not actionable in tort on the ground only that it is an interference with the trade, business or employment of another person, or with the right of another person to dispose of his capital or his labour as he wills ...'

Interlocutory appeal

By a writ issued on 5th January 1973 Cory Lighterage Ltd brought an action against (1) the Transport and General Workers Union ('the union'), (2) Jack Larkin Jones, (3) William A J Lindley, (4) Henry John Medhurst, (5) George James Spragg and (6) Frederick T Evans, claiming a declaration that certain threats alleged to have been

- a* made by the defendants were unlawful and an injunction restraining the first three defendants and each of them by themselves, their servants or agents, from giving any instructions, directions or recommendations to any member of the union in the plaintiffs' employ to withdraw or withhold his labour by reason of the employment by the plaintiffs of one Andrew Shute to work as a lighterman. The second defendant was at all material times the general secretary of the union; the third defendant was at all material times the secretary of the waterways section of the union; the fourth defendant was at all material times the captain of the motor tug Swiftstone, one of the plaintiffs' tugs, and a shop steward of the union; the fifth and sixth defendants were at all material times shop stewards of the union. By notice of motion, also dated 5th January 1973, the plaintiffs sought an injunction, until judgment or further order, against the first three defendants ('the respondents') in the same terms as that claimed in the writ. On 22nd February 1973 Brightman J¹ dismissed the motion and the plaintiffs appealed.

Ralph Gibson QC, K W Wedderburn and Ian Hunter for the respondents.

- d* Cur adv vult
17th April. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING MR. In this action the leading actor is Andrew Shute, but he is the only one on the stage who has not given evidence. To some he is the hero. To others the villain of the piece. To his union he is 'something of an eccentric'. He is a lighterman on the London river. In June 1972 he was one of the crew of the tug Swiftstone. She was one of a fleet of five tugs belonging to the plaintiffs, Cory Lighterage Ltd ('the employers'). The tugs go to wharves on the river, pick up loads of refuse, and take them off for deposit. They do this under contract between the employers and the Greater London Council.

- f* Mr Shute was earning good money. His fixed basic weekly wage was £42.50. In addition he earned overtime. Yet he decided to leave his union. In June 1972 he stopped paying his dues. In consequence, after 13 weeks, his membership lapsed. He was no longer a member. He immediately took steps to make it known. On Thursday, 28th September 1972, he went aboard the tug at 6 a.m. He did his work with the others. Then at 1 p.m. he went to the bridge of the tug. He was quite calm. He told skipper Henry Medhurst: 'I am 13 weeks in arrear with my union contributions'. The skipper told the crew about it. They were very angry with Mr Shute. It is a long tradition in the London docks that every man should be a member of a union. The crew all said: 'We won't work with him unless he pays up his dues'. The skipper went back to Mr Shute and told him: 'The crew will not work with you unless you have a fully-paid up union card by Monday morning.' Mr Shute replied: 'That's what I wanted you to say. There will be a writ for you on Monday morning, for you personally.'

- h* The skipper was himself a shop steward of the union. So he got into touch with Mr Lindley, the secretary of the waterways section of the union. Mr Lindley said to the skipper: 'I agree with you and the crew. Your action is in line with union policy. Don't sail with Shute next Monday unless his union dues are fully paid up by then'.

- j* Both the skipper and the union secretary then telephoned the manager of the employers, Mr Crozier, and told him what had happened. They said: 'If Mr Shute is not withdrawn from the tug, the Swiftstone will not sail on Monday, nor will the rest of the Cory tugs.' Now the employers have no quarrel with the union about their policy. They know full well that the principle of 100 per cent union membership has long been practised in dockland. It has been informally recognised and accepted by the employers and the National Dock Labour Board. So Mr Crozier, the manager, did not resist the demand made by the skipper and the union secretary. He acceded to it. He felt he had no alternative. So at zero hour, early on Monday, 2nd October, at 6 a.m., he went to the base where the tugs were lying. All the crew were standing on the quay. None of them had boarded his tug except Mr Shute. He was in the Swiftstone. Mr Crozier, the manager, went aboard her. He ordered Mr Shute off. After some hesitation he came off. The manager told him: 'The men refuse to sail with you. I must safeguard the company's contract and the jobs of the other men—so I must send you home. There is no work for you to do.'

So Mr Shute went home. The employers paid his wages. Two months later the incident repeated itself. On Monday morning, 4th December 1972, Mr Shute telephoned the manager, and said: 'On counsel's instructions I am turning up for work tomorrow morning at six o'clock.' Without waiting for an answer, he slammed down the receiver. So on Tuesday morning at 5.30 a.m. the manager, Mr Crozier, went again to the base. Again Mr Shute was aboard the tug. Again the men were ashore. Mr Crozier asked the men: 'Will you sail with Shute?' They made it clear that they would not. They used words which I will not try to repeat. Mr Crozier told Mr Shute that the men would not sail with him. Mr Shute said: 'Are you ordering me off?' Mr Crozier said: 'That is my intention.' Mr Shute said: 'That is what I wanted you to say'. He left the tug remarking: 'I will not rest until I have Mr Lindley's head on a platter.' A few days later he gave an interview to a newspaper. It reported him as saying: 'I am prepared to bring London's dockland to a halt. . . I will do anything in my power to bring this union to its knees . . . I can and will raise hell if I have to.'

At that stage there was a burning dispute between Mr Shute and the union and its officials, but none, so far as I can see, between him and his employers. He was only too pleased to be sent home on paid leave. The employers would have liked to have dismissed Mr Shute. But, under the national dock labour scheme¹, they were unable to do so without the permission of the dock board. On 15th December 1972 the employers' chairman asked for permission to terminate Mr Shute's employment. But the board declined. They said that Mr Shute had not broken any of the provisions of the scheme. They have since been asked to agree to his being transferred. But no other employer on the river will accept him. So the employers have been obliged to pay Mr Shute his basic weekly wage of £42.50 a week, whilst he has been doing no work for them. Meanwhile he has been making hay while the sun shines. He has obtained casual employment in the government explosives branch at £21.85 a week for a 40 hour week, plus any overtime that he does.

The employers now bring an action against the union and its officials claiming a declaration that their conduct was unlawful. They seek an injunction to restrain the union from instructing its members to withhold their labour.

The law

The dispute in this case is a typical dispute about union membership. The great majority of the men wish every one of them to be a member of a union. One or two stand out. The great majority then refuse to work with the non-union men. The employer, for the sake of his business, dismisses or suspends the non-union men. Before the Industrial Relations Act 1971 the union and its members would not be liable to an action either at the suit of the non-union men or the employers: see *Morgan v Fry*². Since the 1971 Act the position is different, at any rate in a case like the present, where the trade union is not registered under the Act. Being unregistered, it does not qualify for the protection afforded by an 'agency-shop agreement' or an 'approved closed-shop agreement'. It has also to reckon with a striking change a which has been little noticed hitherto. It is this: a dispute 'between workmen and workmen' is no longer protected by statute law. Typical is a dispute as to union membership or a demarcation dispute. The parties to such a dispute are no longer exempt from liability for acts done in contemplation or furtherance of such a dispute. They are subject to the common law as to conspiracy, both in its criminal and civil aspects, as explained in *Quinn v Leatham*¹. They are subject to the common law as to intimidation, as explained in *Rookes v Barnard*². If the parties to such a dispute do anything which amounts to a conspiracy or intimidation, or any other wrong, the proceedings against them must be taken in the High Court. The National Industrial Relations Court has no jurisdiction in the matter.

b But this is subject to this important qualification: in some cases the employers may themselves become parties to the dispute. A dispute which starts as a dispute 'between workmen and workmen' may evolve into a dispute between 'employers and workmen'. From that time onwards, the dispute will be protected by statute. The parties to it will be exempt from liability in tort for many acts done in contemplation or furtherance of it. If they are liable at all, it will be for unfair industrial practices cognisable by the Industrial Court.

c So it is of the first importance to decide the nature of the dispute: was it a dispute 'between workmen and workmen'? Did it evolve into a dispute 'between employers and workmen'? This depends very much on the facts, remembering that the burden of proof is on those who claim that it is an industrial dispute: see *J T Stratford & Son Ltd v Lindley*³. But, before applying the law to the facts, I feel that I must make good my assertion that a dispute 'between workmen and workmen' is no longer protected by statute law.

d The definition of an 'industrial dispute'

e Section 167 (1) of the 1971 Act defines an 'industrial dispute' as 'a dispute between one or more employers or organisations of employers and one or more workers or organisations of workers, where the dispute relates wholly or mainly to any one or more' of several matters which are set out. This definition differs in an important respect from the Trade Disputes Act 1906, s 5 (3), which defined 'trade dispute' as 'any dispute between employers and workmen, or between workmen and workmen' which is connected with various matters there set out. The important difference is that the 1971 Act omits a dispute between 'workmen and workmen'. The significance of this difference can only be seen by tracing the history.

f In 1875 Parliament passed an Act which took strikes out of the reach of the criminal law of conspiracy. Section 3 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875 was in these words:

g 'An agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or procure to be done any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute between employers and workmen shall not be indictable as a conspiracy if such act committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime ...'

h This section was obviously confined to disputes between employers and workmen. It did not extend to disputes between workmen and workmen. It was considered by the House of Lords in the leading case of *Quinn v Leatham*¹. Leatham was a wholesale butcher who employed non-union men. Quinn was an officer of a trade union of butchers' men. They objected to Leatham employing non-union men. They threatened Leatham that they would stop his customers from dealing with him unless he dismissed his non-union men. Leatham refused to put them out on the street. He brought an action for damages for conspiracy against the officers of the union. The jury awarded him damages of £200 and their verdict was upheld in every court up to the highest. In the House of Lords Lord Lindley said¹:

'I cannot myself see that there was in this case any trade dispute between employers and workmen within the meaning of s. 3. I am not at present prepared to say that the officers of a trade union who create strife by calling out members of the union working for an employer with whom none of them have any dispute can invoke the benefit of this section even on an indictment for a conspiracy.'

The trade unions were much disturbed by the decision in *Quinn v Leatham*², just as they were with *Taff Vale Railway Co v Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants*³ a fortnight earlier. In 1906, when Parliament gave them a charter of immunity—I refer, of course, to the Trade Disputes Act 1906—Parliament deliberately widened the definition of 'trade dispute'. It was extended so as to include any dispute 'between workmen and workmen'. The ambit of immunity was also extended. No longer was the immunity confined to an indictment for criminal conspiracy. It was extended to a civil action for damages for conspiracy.

The effect of this widening of the definition is seen by *White v Riley*⁴. White was a member of the Workmen's Union. Riley was an official of a rival union, the Curriers' Union. White refused to join the Curriers' Union. Riley gave notice to the employers that the men would cease work unless White joined the Curriers' Union. In consequence, the employers suspended White and afterwards discharged him. White sued Riley and the officers of the union for conspiracy. He lost. Lord Sterndale MR considered the definition of 'trade dispute' in the 1906 Act, and said in effect⁵:

'The words "between workmen and workmen" are an addition to the earlier Act of 1875, and were probably added in view of what was said in *Quinn v. Leatham*² and other cases, that a dispute of this description would not be a dispute between employers and workmen, which was the only dispute protected by that Act . . . if union and non-union men are working in the same employment and the union men say, "We will no longer work with the non-union men unless they join our union," that is . . . a . . . dispute between workmen and workmen connected with the employment or non-employment of any person . . . I think the case comes within the words "a dispute between workmen and workmen," . . .'

Since that case there have been many cases in which union men have refused to work with a non-union man. They have threatened the employers that unless the non-union man is dismissed, they will stop work. It has always been accepted that a dispute on those lines as to union membership is a 'trade dispute'. Such was *Rookes v Barnard*⁶ and *Morgan v Fry*⁷. The reason is plain. It was because the dispute fell exactly within the words of the 1906 Act as a dispute 'between workmen and workmen' which is connected with the employment or non-employment of any person.

Now amongst the many changes made by the Industrial Relations Act 1971 there is one very significant one. It omits the words 'between workmen and workmen'. So all the cases which rested on those words since *White v Riley*⁴ onwards must be put on one side. A dispute as to union membership is a typical dispute between workmen and workmen. It does not fall within the new definition of industrial dispute.

a A parallel can be drawn from a demarcation dispute. This, too, in its inception is a dispute between workmen and workmen. The employers may afterwards get involved in it, much against their will. But that does not make them parties to the dispute. The point was specially considered by the Royal Commission on Trade Unions, presided over by Lord Donovan. Their report¹ says:

b 'The following members of the Commission, namely, Lord Robens, Sir George Pollock and Mr. John Thomson, are of the opinion that demarcation disputes between trade unions in which the employer is neutral (that is, is indifferent as to which of the contending parties' members do the particular job) should be excluded from the statutory definition of trade dispute, and that this should be achieved by deleting the words "or between workmen and workmen". They point out that the dispute they have in mind is not of the employer's making, c that he can do nothing to resolve it and that in these circumstances it is unjust that he should be debarred from exercising legal remedies which might otherwise be open to him.'

The remaining members of the Royal Commission did not agree with the deletion of the words. 'To do so' they said 'would, in any event, not solve the dispute: it would merely leave the employer free to sue for damages in certain cases where he cannot d sue now'.

Yet Parliament, with the report before them, did delete the words 'or between workmen and workmen'. The omission must have been deliberate. Parliament must have intended that a dispute between workmen and workmen should be subject to the ordinary law unless the employer was, or became, a party to it on his own account.

e Applying the law to the facts

Counsel for the union was constrained to admit that the dispute in this case was, at its inception, a dispute 'between workmen and workmen' which was not protected by the 1971 Act. But he submitted that the employers afterwards got involved in it, so that it became a dispute between employers and workmen. I cannot f accept this submission. The employers never were in dispute with the union or its officers. The employers recognised their desire for 100 per cent membership. So the employers did not resist the demands of the union or its officers. They acceded to them. They ordered Mr Shute off the tug. They told him to go home. The employers were just at the 'receiving' end of the dispute. They took the only course open to them. They had no option. The tugs had to sail. The refuse had to be collected. So Mr Shute had to stay ashore. It is rather like passengers in a railway strike. If the g trains do not run, the passengers have to walk or get a lift. The passengers may sympathise with one side or the other. They may get very annoyed with the disputants, but they are not themselves parties to the dispute.

I realise, of course, that in this very case the employers have since brought an action at law against the union and its officers. So there is now a dispute between the employers and the organisation of workers. And Mr Shute has himself brought proceedings against the employers in the industrial tribunal. So there is now a dispute h between Mr Shute and the employers. But neither of those disputes was in the mind of anyone on 2nd October 1972 and 5th December 1972. The acts done on those days were not done 'in contemplation of' these later disputes. An act is not done 'in contemplation of' a trade dispute unless it is done in expectation of and with a view to it: see *Conway v Wade*².

i On the evidence so far, it seems to me that there has only been one dispute in the present case, and that is the dispute between Mr Shute on the one hand and the union and its officers and members on the other hand. It was a dispute between workmen and workmen relating to his membership of the union. All the acts done on 2nd October and 5th December 1972, were done in contemplation or in furtherance of that dispute or in consequence of that dispute, and not in contemplation or in furtherance of any other dispute.

1 Report of the Royal Commission on Trade Unions and Employers' Associations 1965-1968, Cmnd 3623, p 220, para 820

The nature of the dispute

Even if, contrary to my view, there was a dispute between employers and workers, there is yet another requisite before it comes within the definition of an 'industrial dispute'. It must relate wholly or mainly to one of the matters set out in paras (a), (b), (c) or (d) of the definition. The relevant matters for us are those in paras (a) and (b). Paragraph (a) relates to the 'terms and conditions on which one or more workmen are, or are to be, required to work for their employers'. Those words seem to me to relate to the contractual terms and conditions. There was no dispute as to those in Mr Shute's case. Paragraph (b) relates to the 'termination or suspension of employment, of one or more workers.' This dispute did not relate to the 'termination' of Mr Shute's employment. But did it relate to the 'suspension' of his employment? 'Suspension from employment' indicates a suspension from both work and pay. This paragraph contemplates a case where a man is dismissed by his employers or is suspended by them with the consequence that he is off work with no pay. It does not seem appropriate to this case where he is off work on full pay.

I recognise, however, that this is a debatable point. I prefer to put my decision on the ground that there was no dispute between employers and workmen at all.

This action

If there was no industrial dispute

If I am right in thinking that there was no industrial dispute, it has important consequences. The union and its officials are not entitled to the immunity given by s 3 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875. Nor to the immunity given by s 132 of the 1971 Act (replacing the immunity given by s 3 of the 1906 Act and s 1 of the Trade Disputes Act 1965). The union and its officers are exposed to the full effect of the common law as to conspiracy and intimidation. They can be sued in the High Court for those torts and in the High Court only. They cannot be sued in the Industrial Court: see s 136 (a).

At common law conspiracy is a combination of two or more persons to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means: see *Mulcahy v R*¹ and *Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co Ltd v Veitch*². Here it will be said at the trial that the trade union and its officials combined to do an unlawful act, namely, to deter Mr Shute from exercising his statutory right not to belong to a union; and they combined to do it by unlawful means, namely, by inducing men to break their contract of employment.

At common law intimidation is intentionally to compel a person, by means of a threat of an illegal act, to do some act whereby loss accrues to him or to another: see *Rookes v Barnard*³. Here it will be said at the trial that the trade union and its officials threatened the employers that they would do an illegal act, namely, induce the men to break their contracts of employment. By that means they compelled the employers to send Mr Shute off the tug.

In both conspiracy and intimidation damage is the gist of the action. Here Mr Shute was damnified. He lost his overtime. The employers were damnified. They had to pay him wages for nothing.

Although those suggestions, and others like them, will be made at the trial, I can well see that a further issue may arise. I raise it because of the views expressed by a Lord Donovan and his colleagues in their report¹. If Mr Shute's conduct was justifiable—as, for instance, if he conscientiously objected to joining the union, or was dissatisfied with it—then he should, of course, recover compensation for any damage done to him. But, if his conduct was not justifiable as, for instance, if he did it out of malice and with intent to injure—then he should not recover compensation. In such a case, the union and its members may plead that their own conduct—in refusing to work with him—may be justified or excused.

b On this footing, the union may well say that Mr Shute provoked the action of which he now complains. True it is that he has a right not to belong to the union. True it is that he has a right to work. But he abused those rights beyond measure. So far as we know, he joined the union quite willingly. He knew that it was a condition of his employment. He had no possible justification for withholding his dues to the union. All that he did was done maliciously with intent to injure the union and its officers. His own words show it: 'I will not rest until I have Mr Lindley's head on a platter'—'I will do anything in my power to bring this union to its knees'—and so forth.

c Suppose that Mr Shute had himself sued the union and its officers for conspiracy and intimidation, causing him to lose overtime. Would he succeed? He wanted the employers to do what they did. He wanted to be sent off work. He wanted to get full wages for doing no work. And he has made much profit out of it. Would any jury give him a verdict? I doubt it. He may have been a troublemaker just as those in *Morgan v Fry*². I said there³:

e '... if Mr. Hammond and his friends were really troublemakers who fomented discord in the docks, without lawful cause or excuse, then the defendant Mr. Fry and his colleagues might well be justified in saying the men would not work with them any longer.'

So here, Mr Shute may be said to have brought everything on himself by his own eccentric conduct.

f Now, if Mr Shute could not sue the union and its officials, I doubt whether his employers can. After all, the conspiracy and intimidation was aimed at him, not at the employers. If he cannot sue, how can they? The loss to the employers (in paying wages for nothing) was caused by the conduct of the National Dock Labour Board in refusing to give the employers permission to dismiss Mr Shute. I would hope that the board would reconsider their decision in this matter. Mr Shute was threatening to bring dockland to a halt by his own unjustifiable conduct. The employers should g not be compelled to employ such a man, or to pay wages to him.

If there was an industrial dispute

In case I am wrong in thinking there was no industrial dispute, I will go on to consider the legal points if there was an industrial dispute and the union and its officers h acted in contemplation or furtherance of it. In that case Mr Shute had a statutory right, as between himself and his employers, not to be a member of the union: see s 5 (1) (b) of the 1971 Act. He had a right to work without being a member of the union. Anyone who knowingly interfered with that right was acting unlawfully. The union and its officials acted unlawfully when they interfered with it. They told the employers that the men would not sail with Mr Shute unless he paid up his dues. j That pressure was an unfair industrial practice: see s 33 (3) (a) of the 1971 Act. The employers could at once have applied to the Industrial Court for an order directing the union and its officials not to interfere: see s 101 (3) (c). But the employers did not do so. Instead they submitted to the pressure. They ordered Mr Shute off the tug. They sent him home. By doing so they were discriminating against him by reason of his exercising his statutory right. That was an unfair industrial practice by the employers: see s 5 (2) (b). It is true that the employers were forced to do this because of the pressure which the union and its officials brought to bear on the employers. But this pressure afforded the employers no defence: see s 33 (1) (a), (b); and no ground for decreasing his compensation: see s 116 (5). Mr Shute would be entitled to go to an industrial tribunal and get compensation from his employers for the discrimination against him: see s 106 (1) (b). But the employers would be entitled to bring in the union and its officials and claim from them contribution or indemnity for the sums it had to pay Mr Shute: see s 119. In addition to this right, however, the employers would be entitled to take proceedings in the Industrial Court against the union and its officers and claim compensation because of the pressure they had brought on the employers: see ss 33 (3) (a), 101 (1) (a), (b), (c), 101 (3) (b), 105 (1). Such compensation would be such amount as the Industrial Court considered just and equitable in all the circumstances: see s 116 of the Act.

Those provisions seem to me to provide adequate remedies for Mr Shute and for the employers in respect of the conduct of the union and its officials. Those remedies are, however, only in the Industrial Court; and only when there is an industrial dispute. Section 33 only applies when the action is taken in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute.

Counsel for the employers submitted that, apart from those remedies, it was open to the employers to bring an action in the High Court in tort against the union and its officials, even if their acts were done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute. He had to admit that the employers could not bring an action in the High Court for conspiracy. That was excluded by s 132 (3) and (4). Nor could employers bring an action in tort for inducing breach of contract: see s 132 (1) (a); nor for intimidation by threats of the nature mentioned in s 132 (1) (b). But he submitted that the employers could bring an action in the High Court for any other extraneous wrongdoing. He submitted that the employers could bring an action for direct intimidation in that the union and its officers directly intimidated the employers by threats of an illegal act (*Rookes v Barnard*¹), such illegal act being the interference with Mr Shute's right to work. He also submitted that the employers could bring an action for interfering with the business of the employers by unlawful means: see *Daily Mirror Newspapers Ltd v Gardner*²; *Acrow (Automation) Ltd v Rex Chainbelt Inc*³ and *Brekkes Ltd v Cattell*⁴. When pressed to say what unlawful means were used in this case, counsel for the employers seemed to me to have to come back every time to the Industrial Relations Act 1971. As the argument proceeded, it seemed to me that ultimately the question was whether wrongful conduct, which offended against the 1971 Act as being unfair industrial practice, could also be actionable in tort. This is a question of construction of the Act: see *Cutler v Wandsworth Stadium Ltd*⁵ and *Cunard v Stacey*⁶. I am of opinion that when the conduct is an unfair industrial practice, the complainant must ordinarily seek his remedy before an industrial tribunal or the Industrial Court, as the Act provides. He cannot bring an action in tort for the selfsame conduct unless such conduct is, of its own force, actionable in tort apart from the 1971 Act. If a there was an industrial dispute in this case, I cannot find any tortious conduct by the union or its officers which is actionable in the High Court.

Conclusion

b The judge proceeded on the basis that there was an 'industrial dispute'. On that basis I would agree with him that no action lies in the High Court. But, I would differ from him in that, on the evidence as it stands, I do not think there was an 'industrial dispute' within the 1971 Act. On this basis, if anyone has a cause of action in tort against the trade union or its officers, it must be brought in the High Court, and not in the Industrial Court. So I think this action was properly brought here. Nevertheless, I doubt very much if it is well founded. Mr Shute may have been actuated so much by ill-will that the other men and the union may have sufficient justification or excuse for what they did. The action is so doubtful of success that I do not think any interlocutory relief should be granted. Counsel for the employers said that the employers were put in an intolerable position—by having to pay wages to Mr Shute for no work. But I think the solution lies with the dock labour board. It is their duty under the scheme to take into account all relevant circumstances obtaining in the port at the relevant time. On further consideration they may well think it right to give permission for Mr Shute to be dismissed. I do not see why employers should be made to keep paying a man for no work, if he is, as it would appear on the evidence he is, a man who is determined to make trouble and to disrupt the work in the docks—out of malice and with intent to injure. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal, but for reasons which are different from those of the judge.

e BUCKLEY LJ. In this action the plaintiff company sues the defendants in tort. The tort alleged in the statement of claim is pleaded as a continuing one, namely, that since 28th September 1972 the defendants have threatened to instruct, direct or recommend all members of the first defendant (which, although it is not registered as a trade union under the Industrial Relations Act 1971, and so is not a trade union within the meaning of that Act, I will for simplicity call 'the union') in the plaintiffs' employment to withdraw or withhold their labour, if the plaintiffs were to employ Mr Shute to work as a lighterman. The allegedly tortious nature of the threat or threats is elaborated in the statement of claim, but I need not refer to this in any detail.

g 'An act done by a person in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute shall not be actionable in tort on the ground only—(a) that it induces another person to break a contract to which that other person is a party or prevents another person from performing such a contract, or (b) that it consists in his threatening that a contract (whether one to which he is a party or not) will be broken or will be prevented from being performed, or that he will induce another person to break a contract to which that other person is a party or will prevent another person from performing such a contract.'

h If the alleged tort sued on in this action was an act done in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute, a question arises whether s 132 (1) is a bar to the action. If, on the other hand, the alleged tort was not such an act, the defendants have not suggested on this appeal that the action will not lie nor, indeed, that it will not succeed.

i In the forefront of the case, therefore, there stands the question whether the threat or threats (for I will so call them without prejudice to the question whether they are properly so described) was or is being or were or are being made in contemplation or in furtherance of an industrial dispute within the meaning of the Act.

An industrial dispute is defined in s 167 (1) of the Act thus:

“‘industrial dispute’ (subject to subsection (5) of this section) means a dispute between one or more employers or organisations of employers and one or more workers or organisations of workers, where the dispute relates wholly or mainly to any one or more of the following, that is to say—(a) terms and conditions of employment, or the physical conditions in which any workers are required to work; (b) engagement or non-engagement, or termination or suspension of employment, of one or more workers; (c) allocation of work as between workers or groups of workers; (d) a procedure agreement, or any matter to which in accordance with section 166 of this Act a procedure agreement can relate’.

Subsection (5) of this section has no relevance to the present case. It should be noted that, unlike the definition of ‘trade dispute’ in the Trade Disputes Act 1906, s 5 (3) (which was repealed by the 1971 Act), this definition of the term ‘industrial dispute’ does not embrace any dispute which is only between workmen and workmen.

All the registered dockworkers in the Port of London, now with the exception of Mr Shute, are members either of the defendant union or of the National Amalgamated Stevedores and Dockers, and in practice it is impossible for a man to become a registered dock worker in the port without his belonging to a union. This situation according to the evidence before the court is not the consequence of any agreement between the employers and the men or the unions; it is a state of affairs which has existed for 50 years or so, and has been and is acquiesced in by both sides in the industry. The men are a close-knit community and according to the evidence they would in practice always refuse to work with a non-unionist. This is what has happened in this case. Mr Shute, who appears to hold strongly individualistic views on union membership, purposely allowed his membership of the union to lapse and on 28th September 1972, he so informed Captain Medhurst, who was not only the skipper in command of the tug, of the crew of which Mr Shute was a member, but also a shop steward of the union. The other members of the crew collectively decided that they would not work with Mr Shute after the following Monday, if his union dues were not by then paid up. Captain Medhurst then telephoned Mr Lindley, the union’s regional secretary of its waterways section, who confirmed the decision. Captain Medhurst later telephoned the plaintiff company’s manager, Mr Crozier, and informed him of the decision and of the fact that Mr Lindley agreed with it. Mr Lindley himself also telephoned Mr Crozier to say that he endorsed the action of the crew and officially supported them in their refusal to work with Mr Shute. Mr Lindley also told Mr Crozier that the rest of the plaintiff company’s tugs would not be sailing on the Monday unless Mr Shute was withdrawn from work. At this stage, I think, it is perfectly clear that the dispute was between Mr Shute on the one hand and his workmates and the union on the other. Indeed, this is common ground.

On the following day Mr Spragg, a shop stewards’ convenor of the union, and Mr Evans, one of its shop stewards, visited Mr Crozier at his office, confirmed what Mr Lindley had said, and stated that the whole of the plaintiff company’s labour force would be withdrawn unless Mr Crozier withdrew Mr Shute from the crew of the tug.

Early on the Monday morning, 2nd October, Mr Crozier went to the tug, ordered Mr Shute off her and sent him home. Since then Mr Shute has done no work for the plaintiff company but the plaintiff company has continued to pay him. Mr Shute has found other employment for which also he is being paid. On 5th December Mr Shute presented himself aboard the tug early in the morning, having previously told Mr Crozier that he would be turning up for work. Mr Crozier asked the crew whether they were prepared to sail with Mr Shute. They refused. Mr Crozier again ordered Mr Shute off the tug and he left.

The question for decision falls into two parts. First, was any of the threats sued on made in contemplation or furtherance of any dispute to which the plaintiff company was a party? If so, was that dispute an industrial dispute within the statutory definition?

a The plaintiff company cannot dismiss Mr Shute without the consent of the National Dock Labour Board. This they have twice attempted to obtain but have been unsuccessful. Mr Shute is costing the plaintiff company £42.50 a week for his wages, but the plaintiff company has preferred to make these payments without requiring or permitting Mr Shute to work rather than to come into conflict with its other employees and the union. The plaintiff company favours the policy of all its employees being b has done all that its other employees and the union have required it to do in relation to Mr Shute; it has withdrawn him from his duties as a lighterman and has not required any of its employees to work with him. I cannot see how it could have pursued a more acquiescent course.

c On the evidence before the court it seems clear that Captain Medhurst and his crew, Mr Lindley and Messrs Spragg and Evans, all exerted pressure on the plaintiff company to remove Mr Shute from working with any employees of the company who were union members, which amounts to suspending him from work altogether. The plaintiff company proved to be entirely amenable to this pressure. It capitulated. Having done so, it is not now seeking to reinstate Mr Shute as an active member of its staff; it is, however, asserting that the threat or threats to which it capitulated was d accordingly.

The plaintiff company asserts that its only remedy is in the High Court under the common law, because on the facts there is no industrial dispute, and so the National Industrial Relations Court lacks jurisdiction. The defendants say that it would be very advantageous to have the matter dealt with by the Industrial Court, where they say there is valuable machinery for conciliation. They assert that the e plaintiff company has had to resort to a complicated argument and a distorted view of the facts to demonstrate that there is no industrial dispute.

In these circumstances can it be properly said that (apart from the present action) there is or has ever been in the course of this history a dispute between the plaintiff company and any of the defendants? I think not. The plaintiff company had not, f when the threats were made, and has not since, espoused Mr Shute's cause. It has remained wholly aloof from it; or, if it has favoured any side in Mr Shute's differences with the union and its members, this has been the side of the union and its members. If someone threatens me with physical injury unless I hand over my wallet and I hand it over without demur, no one could, in my opinion, sensibly say that there had been any dispute about my handing over the wallet. I do not think that the threats to the plaintiff company can properly be said to have been made in furtherance of any g dispute between it and the union or any of its members.

Can it, then, be said that the threats were made in contemplation of a dispute between the plaintiff company and the union or any of its members? No dispute has emerged in contemplation of which the threats can be said to have been made. If therefore the threats were made in contemplation of a dispute, it must have been one which the threateners believed would arise but which, contrary to that belief, h has not eventuated.

In my judgment, this has not been established. The evidence, in my opinion, indicates that the parties who made the threats made them because they believed that they would be successful and that the plaintiff company would agree to do what it was required to do. An act done in the belief that no dispute will in any event arise cannot, in my judgment, properly be described as an act done in contemplation of a dispute. I i very much doubt whether an act done in the belief that, if it is done, no dispute will arise can properly be so described. In the present case no one on the men's side seems to have troubled to ask before any threats were made whether the employers would suspend Mr Shute from duty without the pressure of any threat. On the evidence at present before the court it seems to me to be very probable that the plaintiff company would have done so. It is conceded that the burden rests on the defendants to establish, if they can, that the threats were made in contemplation or furtherance of an industrial dispute. In my judgment they have not discharged this onus. a

Of course, this action constitutes a dispute between the plaintiff company and the defendants, but it cannot be supposed that any of the threats was made in contemplation or furtherance of that dispute.

If the act or acts complained of as constituting the alleged tort or torts was or were not done in contemplation or furtherance of any dispute between the plaintiff company and any of the defendants, it is unnecessary to consider whether any alleged dispute falls within the definition in s 167 of an 'industrial dispute'. We heard some interesting argument about the meaning of the expression 'suspension of employment' in this context. On the view which I take of this case it is unnecessary to arrive at any conclusion about this, but I may perhaps say that, as at present advised, I am of opinion that what is here referred to is not mere suspension from duty, as in the case of Mr Shute, but temporary discontinuance of both work and pay under a contract which permits of this while the contract of employment remains in force. If this is right, I feel great difficulty in holding that any dispute which might, contrary to my view, exist between the plaintiff company and the union or any of its members would fall within the terms of any of the paragraphs of the definition of 'industrial dispute' contained in s 167. b

Brightman J took the view that, when the defendants threatened the plaintiff company, assuming that their acts amounted to threats, an industrial dispute existed or was in prospect. For the reasons which I have endeavoured to express I feel unable to agree with the learned judge about this. But even if the learned judge had taken a different view on that question, he would not have been disposed to grant the relief sought on the motion. He said¹: c

'Even if the plaintiffs had both the law and the facts on their side, there would be the added question where the balance of convenience lay. This is a case where, as I see it, the loss flowing from the wrongful acts of the [defendants], assuming them to be wrongful, is wholly financial, is precisely quantifiable, is modest in amount and admittedly within the financial competence of the union to recoup to the plaintiffs. I doubt whether, in such unusual circumstances, interlocutory relief is appropriate. So, even if I felt that the plaintiffs were correct on the law and the facts, I would be much disposed to leave matters to be resolved at the trial of the action rather than unnecessarily impose on the plaintiffs' labour force the stresses which might result from an interlocutory order.' d

With this I agree. In my judgment the present case is not one for interlocutory relief. There is no indication that, while things remain as they are, any of the first three defendants (who are the only respondents to the motion) threaten or intend to do any of the things mentioned in the notice of motion. Nor is there any indication that things will not remain as they are until the trial of the action. If the plaintiff company succeeds in the action, there is no reason to suppose that the defendant union will not be fully able to meet any damages which may be awarded. e

I would dismiss this appeal. f

ORR LJ. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed and only wish to add a few words. g

On the first of the two issues which arise as to the definition of 'industrial dispute' contained in s 167 (1) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, I agree that, for the reasons h a given by Lord Denning MR and Buckley LJ, the plaintiffs, on whom the burden rests, have failed to establish that there was at the material time any dispute other than between Mr Shute on the one hand and his fellow workers and the union on the other. That dispute, being 'between workmen and workmen', would have fallen within the definition of a 'trade dispute' contained in the Trade Disputes Act 1906, but clearly does not fall within the definition of 'industrial dispute' contained in s 167 (1) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, in which the words quoted do not appear and from which I agree with Lord Denning MR they must have been deliberately omitted.

b Having reached that conclusion on the first issue I too do not find it necessary to decide the second issue, whether the alleged dispute relates wholly or mainly to one or other of the matters set out in paras (a) and (b) of the definition; but if it had been necessary to decide that issue I would have held that 'terms and conditions' in para (a) is a reference only to contractual terms and conditions, and I should have found it very difficult to read 'suspension of employment' in para (b) as applying to a mere suspension from duty as distinct from a suspension of both pay and duty pursuant to a provision of the contract.

c On the basis of the conclusion, which this court has reached, that the respondents have not established an 'industrial dispute' it was accepted for the respondents that the present action lies, and the sole remaining question is whether the plaintiffs should be granted interlocutory relief. In my judgment the balance on this issue falls heavily against the grant of such relief and I am content to rest this conclusion on the reasons given by Brightman J¹ in the passage quoted by Buckley LJ.

PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION

LATEY J

10th, 11th MARCH 1969

Infant – Name – Change of surname – Divorce of parents – Mother having custody – Re-marriage of mother – Rights of mother as custodian – Rights of father as natural guardian – Interests of child – Whether mother or father having unilateral right to change surname of child.

The father and mother, Mr and Mrs Y, had two children, A and G, both girls. The mother obtained a decree nisi on the ground of the father's adultery, which was made absolute in August 1964, and custody of the children was granted to her. In January 1965 the mother married a Mr D and in February 1967 the father married the woman with whom he had been living. In the summer of 1964 the mother stopped all staying access of the children with the father on the ground that it upset them and in July 1965, without consulting the father and unknown to him, she arranged for the children to be known at school by the surname of D, instead of Y. When much later the father discovered what had happened, he issued a summons asking, inter alia, that the children should assume their former name of Y. At the date of the hearing in 1969 A and G were aged 13 and nine respectively.

Held – (i) Where a mother had been given custody of children she was not entitled to change their surname unilaterally for that would infringe the father's rights as their natural guardian; nor, in those circumstances, was the father entitled to do so for that would infringe the mother's rights as custodian. Their surname could only be changed by agreement between the parties or, in the absence of agreement, by a decision of the court. Accordingly the mother had been gravely in error in changing the children's surname without the consent of the father, as that infringed his rights as the children's natural guardian (see p 578 g and h, post); dictum of Buckley J in Re T (otherwise H) (an infant) [1962] 3 All ER at 972 explained.

(ii) Whatever the court's decision might have been in 1965, the matter had, after the lapse of four years, to be decided in a way which best served the interests of the children. Although at 13 A was not in any real sense a young woman, she was old enough to be sensitive about her name and all the evidence pointed to a feeling of acute social embarrassment in yet a further change of surname. That did not apply to G, but it was plain that both girls had to bear the same name; accordingly, in the circumstances it was best to leave the children's surname as D (see p 578 j and p 580 g and j, post).

Adjourned summonses

By a summons dated 21st February 1968, the father applied for an order that the mother change the surname of the children of the family, A and G, back to the father's surname, Y, the mother having previously, without his knowledge or consent, changed

- a their surname to that of D, her second husband's surname. By a summons dated 20th February 1968 the mother applied for general directions as to the future welfare and upbringing of the children. The summonses came before Karminski J on 28th February 1968 who adjourned them with a direction that the children be represented by the Official Solicitor and made an interim order that A use the surname of D as she was about to attend a new school. The judgment was delivered in chambers and is reported by permission of Latey J. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- c LATEY J. There are two issues in this case, the first being by what surname should the children be known, and the second, whether their father, Mr Y, should have them to stay with him from time to time. This summons is in chambers, but the issues raised are of real importance to the children, and to their parents and I think it right that I should state in outline the reasons for the conclusions I have reached. At the same time, it would be the reverse of helpful to add to the friction—the very considerable friction—between the parents, and I do not propose to review all the detail
- d which has been canvassed in evidence, both written and oral.

- The two children concerned are A, born in February 1956, so that she is now just 13, and G, born in July 1959, who is rising ten. The marriage finally broke up, I think, fairly early in 1963. The mother was granted a decree nisi on the ground of the father's adultery, which was made absolute in August 1964, and the custody of the children was committed to her. The father and mother had been to the National
- e Marriage Guidance Council, who had referred them to doctors, and the father began a course of deep analysis which is still continuing. At the moment he is having analysis, he told me, three times a week; and he told me that the purpose of it, as he summed it up, is 'to know thyself'; that is, to come to terms with oneself.

- f The mother married Mr D in January 1965. In February 1967 the father married the lady with whom he had been living, her previous marriage having been dissolved by decree absolute in August 1966, and she, that is to say, Mrs Y, is expecting a baby, by the father, in May of this year. Both families are in comfortable circumstances financially. Mr D and the children get on very well indeed and are very fond of each other. Mr D's son, aged 17, also lives with them. It is a very happy family and home. They live in North London. Mrs Y gets on very well with the children, as they do with her.

- g The children stayed with their father at weekends until the summer of 1964, when the mother stopped this form of access, saying that it upset the children. Since then, access has been for a day or part of a day, with periods when there has been none. Both the father and mother are Jewish, as is Mr D; Mrs Y is not. The father and mother belong to the Reform Synagogue, whose rules of observance and ritual are much less inflexible and rigid than in the Orthodox Synagogue. The father is an agnostic
- h and Mrs Y a humanist, and accordingly they themselves have no religious beliefs or observances.

- i In July 1965, without consulting the father and unbeknown to him, the mother arranged that A and G should be known at school by the surname of D. Nothing was said to the father, either by the mother or by the children's headmistress, and the copies of the school reports sent to the father gave the children's name as Y. It was not until very much later that the father found out what had been done and, not surprisingly, he was greatly upset and resentful. He issued a summons asking for directions that the children should resume the name of Y, and at the same time asking that, as part of the access, the children should come and stay with him from time to time. The mother also issued a summons at the same time, asking for directions about the children in general terms.

Those summonses came before Karminski J in February 1968—a little over a year ago. At that time, A was about to go to a new school. Karminski J, taking the view—as, indeed, I take the view—that this was a difficult problem—a difficult case—directed that the children be separately represented by the Official Solicitor, and for that purpose he adjourned the summonses generally, directing that A should go to her new school under the name of D, but stressing that that interim direction was entirely without prejudice to the ultimate decision of the court. He also gave interim directions for access covering March and April 1968, and he evidently anticipated that that should give everybody sufficient time to restore the summonses for hearing.

It is, in my view, unfortunate for all concerned that so long has elapsed. I have to deal with the issues in the circumstances prevailing today and to decide them in the way which seems best for the children. Lapse of time itself can become an important factor in children's cases, and the procedure and practice of this court, together with the availability of several judges, have been tailored to reduce delay to a minimum. Any question affecting children can be brought before the court immediately, and I repeat that for reasons which I do not propose to go into—because I am not sure that I know them in detail—that it is most unfortunate that so many months have elapsed before this case was brought back.

That is the broad history of the matter, and what are the right conclusions on the two issues? Each is very far from easy, as is often the case when a family has broken up and new families have formed. There is a good deal of written evidence in the form of affidavits and exhibited correspondence. In this case it is difficult, if not impossible, to resolve some of the conflicts on matters of fact on the basis of the written evidence. More importantly, even though one had the opportunity of seeing them sitting behind counsel and identifying them, that and no more left the parents and the step-parents, who are the four people most closely concerned with these children, as no more than paper figures.

Accordingly, I was responsible for the invitation to counsel that the parents and step-parents should give evidence and be cross-examined. That has happened. Where does it all lead one? There was, on paper, the stoppage by the mother of the staying access, the changing of the children's name without a word to the father, the fact that without any discouragement the children were allowed to call Mr D 'daddy', the fact that when A went into hospital for an operation for appendicitis her father was not informed; all this, especially when viewed in writing, suggested that there might well have been a deliberate plan, by stages, to cut the father out of the children's lives.

I am bound to say, and I have thought it important to bear in the forefront of my mind, that he, as it seems to me, cannot be blamed for entertaining that view in his mind. But after the evidence which has been given in the witness box, the matter is very far from being so simple. There is no doubt in my mind, and in my judgment, that the mother and Mr D, so far as he came into it, were gravely in error, not necessarily in changing the children's name in 1965, but in doing so without first consulting the father. And this weighs heavily against her.

Before coming to other factors, it is convenient to state my view of the approach to the change of surname of young children. Counsel have referred me to *Re T (otherwise H) (an infant)*¹ as the only reported case on the matter. Until that decision this question of the changing of the surname of infants where their parents were estranged was devoid of any authority. The facts were these. There was a divorce on the petition of the mother in December 1959. That petition was undefended. The mother applied for and obtained the custody of the child, a ten year old girl. The father had access by agreement. In July 1960 the father remarried. In October 1960 the mother remarried, acquiring the surname of her second husband. On 24th August 1961 the mother, without any previous communication with the father, executed a deed poll whereby she, purporting to act as legal a guardian of the infant, renounced and abandoned the use of the infant's surname and declared that, as from the date of the deed poll, the infant had assumed the mother's new surname. That, as I say, was on 24th August 1961. The father was first informed of this change of name in September 1961. On 31st January 1962 he issued a summons, asking that the child be made a ward of court and that the deed poll be cancelled, or that there be a further deed poll to be registered, which would change the infant's surname back to the former one.

b Those being the facts, the matter came before Buckley J and his decision is accurately summarised in the headnote¹. He held—

c '(1) that a child of a tender age could not, of its own motion, change his or her surname since it involved a conscious decision and the power or right to make such a decision primarily resided with the father as the natural guardian, but where the father was not living or was not available for some other reason such power might reside in the legal guardian; that where there had been a divorce in which the father was the person against whom the decree was granted and an order for custody was made in favour of the mother the order did not deprive the father of all his rights and obligations in respect of the child but he remained the natural guardian of the person of the child.

d '(2) That in the case of a divided family it was always one of the aims of the court to maintain the child's contact, respect and affection for both of its parents so far as the circumstances would permit, and to deprive the child of its father's surname was not in the best interests of the child because it was injurious to the link between the father and the child to suggest to the child that there was some reason why it was desirable that it should be called by some name other than the father's name.

e 'Accordingly, the infant's mother had no status which entitled her to take any step on behalf of the infant which would result in the infant being known by a surname other than the father's surname.'

f Though not binding, any decision from so eminent and experienced a judge as Buckley J must, and does, command the greatest respect. It was argued that the effect of the decision was not only that an order for custody in favour of the mother does not vest in her the unilateral right to change the children's surname, but the rights of the father to do so, as the natural guardian, remain unimpaired or unrestricted by the custody order.

g I do not read the judgment as going as far as that. Buckley J² points out that the point is not covered at all by authority. He refers to the *Encyclopaedia of Forms and Precedents*³. He points out that there is a precedent for changing an infant's name by deed poll to be executed by the guardian of the infant, and he refers to the *Enrolment of Deeds (Change of Name) Regulations 1949*⁴, as amended by the 1951 regulations⁵, which are regulations made by the Master of the Rolls under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, s 218. Then he goes on as follows⁶:

h 'As I understand it, these rules have no statutory force. They are merely practice rules of the registration department in respect of deeds poll for changing names. But that fact does give some support to the view that it may be competent for a parent or legal guardian to change the name of an infant. If there is such a right or power it is one which, in my judgment, resides primarily in the infant's father as the natural guardian of the person of the infant. It may be that if an infant has no father living or if for some reason the father is not available such power may reside in whoever is the legal guardian of the infant. In the present case the deed was executed without the consent of the infant's father and indeed without his knowledge at all; it was executed by the mother of the infant who was the person to whom the custody of the infant had been given by the order of the Divorce Court. An order for custody is as its name implies, an order which gives the person in whose favour it is made the right to the custody of the child and the right to bring up the child subject, of course, to any direction which the court may think right to make from time to time under its jurisdiction in relation to any matter. It does not deprive the father, who is not given the custody of the child, of all his rights and obligations in respect of his child. He remains, subject to the rights conferred upon the person to whom custody is given by the court, the natural guardian of the child and among the residual rights which remain to him are any rights which he may have at law with regard to the name of the child. In my judgment, the deed which the mother has executed with regard to the child is one which she had no power to execute so as to have any effect on the infant. a

Then the learned judge points out that the most effective way in which this child's name has actually been changed is in the school register. In my opinion, what Buckley J is saying is this: that an order for custody to a mother does not deprive the father of all rights and obligations in respect of the child, a view, if I may say so, with which I wholly and respectfully agree. Secondly, in particular, such an order does not entitle the mother to take steps unilaterally to change the child's surname. Again, I agree. And thirdly, that if there is a right or power in a parent, where parents are estranged and custody has been committed to the mother, the right is in the father, and remains so, though custody is vested in the mother. b

But I do not think that Buckley J was expressing a final view on this point, which indeed it was not necessary for him to decide, and I think that he has left the point open. I asked counsel at an early stage whether they or any of them could tell me that, in this context, the powers of this court differed from those of the Chancery Court, acting for the Sovereign as parens patriae in its wardship jurisdiction. Counsel were agreed that in this context both courts had similar powers. c

That being so, in my opinion, the matter being res integra, unregulated by statute and undecided at common law, the correct view is this. As Buckley J said, an order for custody in a mother does not entitle her unilaterally to cause a child's surname to be changed, as to do so would infringe the father's rights as natural guardian. But, in my opinion, where the mother has been given custody, the father is no longer entitled unilaterally to cause a child's name to be changed, as to do so would be to infringe the mother's rights as custodian. Where the court has become seised of matters affecting children, and at least unless and until parents are in agreement, a parent who wishes to take some step importantly affecting a child, such as a change of surname, should seek the decision of the court. d

This is in line with the development of the law by the courts, which nowadays pay much less attention to technical rights and a great deal more to realities. Those realities are to encourage parents to consult, and agree when they can, on matters importantly affecting their children, and, if they cannot agree, for the court to make the decision which seems best to serve the welfare of the children, whether or not such decision may override some technical and often illusory right of a parent. e

If I am right that this is the proper approach, the mother did something she was not entitled to in 1965, and she was, from any sensible and human point of view, gravely in error in doing so. But does it follow that now, in 1969, the right direction should be that the children should reassume the name of Y? In my opinion that has to be decided in the way which will best serve the children, as things now are, and as they are likely to be in the future. f

a Both this question of the name and the question of whether there should be staying access have to be considered in the light of all the available evidence. For the reasons that I have already given, I shall not—deliberately not—review it in detail. Seeing the four people most concerned giving their evidence in the witness box has been of much help to me, and from that and the written evidence the following has emerged in my judgment.

b First, the father. It has to be borne in mind that the father has been in the difficult position throughout of having access only, a situation which does not make it as easy to develop the best relationship with one's children as it is for the parent with whom they are living and by whom they are being brought up, and I have borne that in mind throughout. The father is a complicated person. He is highly intelligent. He is a proud man and has a strong streak of arrogance, and it is very difficult for him to change his mind once he has made it up, or to accept that he may be mistaken.

c This is not to say that his approach to the children has been a selfish one, or a wholly selfish one; as witness, for example, in 1964 he accepted the medical view that he should not insist on staying access. At the same time he has not been wholly selfless or always wise about the children; as witness, merely for example, his refusal to accept the mother's very reasonable and sensible suggestion that he should have the children for the whole day at a weekend instead of for two very unsatisfactory hours on Wednesday evenings. To accept that would have disrupted his weekends in Sussex, and this he was not prepared to do, but preferred to take a course which, in fact, resulted in his cutting himself off from contact with the children for some eight or nine months. This, I must say straightly, was selfish and stiff-necked, and this cannot in any way be mitigated by his very natural feeling of resentment about the change of name, because at that time he did not know anything about it.

e Again I was left with the strong impression that he was, sometimes at any rate, far from wise or understanding in his handling of the children. A special illustration was in July 1968, when he told the children that it was his intention to take steps to have their name changed, and to see that they came to stay with him. Of course, in this kind of situation, children themselves often ask questions about what is happening or going to happen, and parents have to do their best in what they say and how they deal with it. But that is not what happened here. The father started it by asking them whether they wanted to go on seeing him. I am not at all sure whether that was a very wise topic to broach. Happily, they both said that they did. Having received that reply, why did the father not leave it there? Instead, he went on to volunteer what his further intentions were, though he knew that at the very least those intentions might not be welcome—indeed, much more probably, would not be welcome—at that time. As he himself said, he did not raise it in any way to discuss with the children, but it was his pronunciamiento—his edict—that he was laying down. The result was to distress these children very seriously in the way which a doctor described in his affidavit, and which the mother has described.

f The mother is a very different kind of person. She, too, is intelligent, but she is a much more straightforward, uncomplicated person, a much warmer, more easy and natural kind of person, and I thought her most impressive, not merely as an honest witness but as a person and as a mother. I do not overlook that she acted quite wrongly in changing the children's names for school purposes without consulting their father, but that has to be looked at in conjunction with the equally undoubted fact, as I am satisfied, that she had a difficult man to deal with, as she knew from long experience.

j Having heard the mother and the father and Mr D, I no longer think, as I was inclined to think on the written evidence, that she had set out to cut him off from the children so far as she could, though she did make that serious error. She has done, with that exception, what she has done, wisely, in the interests of the children, and not to oust their father.

Mrs Y and Mr D are, neither of them, in at all easy positions. I think that both have been doing their best. It might be said against Mrs Y that she has, herself, perhaps a somewhat over-elaborate and introspective approach, but I do not see anything to suggest that that has any unfavourable impact on the children. She is a school-teacher by profession; and ever since A mentioned that there were some things that she preferred not to eat because it was against the dietary laws, I am sure that Mrs Y has not served food which does conflict with the dietary laws and will so continue.

Mr D made no bones about his view that, in one way and another, the father had let down the mother and the children. I do not propose to go into that part of fairly ancient history at all, but Mr D was entirely honest and frank in his evidence. He said that his view was that the father had greatly failed the children as a father but, he said, 'they are not my children, they are my wife's children, and I have always left it to her to decide what is the right course to take'.

There is no doubt at all that, although there has been friction between the mother and father, the mother has never for a moment forgotten that the father is the children's father, and she has done what she can to foster a normal affectionate relationship between father and daughters. Moreover, both the mother and Mr D told me that, to their way of thinking, a very important factor is what A and G themselves feel about visits to their father, and that unless it seems that to impose visits is going seriously to disturb the children—as I am afraid, on occasions, it undoubtedly has in the past—they will do all they can to co-operate in gently nudging A, at first, and then one hopes G, towards a frame of mind when she is, at least, not averse to going to or staying with her father from time to time; something which, once it begins, one hopes will develop into a regular pattern.

Now what are the right decisions—if indeed, 'right' is the proper word in a situation like this—on these two questions, which remain very difficult? As to the problem of the name, whatever might have been the decision of the court in 1965, had the matter come before it then, as it probably would have done had the mother done what she should have done, and consulted the father, I have to reach a decision now in 1969. Counsel for the father argued that a mother should not benefit now from her wrong action then. That contention has force and attraction but, of course, more important is what is best for the children.

Today, A is the main problem on this topic, though plainly both children must have the same name, and therefore the decision will affect them both. Accepting, as I do, that the initial decision was the mother's, it is plain on all the evidence that A does now feel, deeply and acutely, the social embarrassment of a further change of name back to Y. She is 13 years of age, and though I do not agree at all that she is, in any real sense of the word, a young woman, she is old enough to be sensitive on questions about her name and the circumstances in which it is changed, if it be changed. The father acknowledged that to force a change on her might well set her against him, but he feels this is a risk he should run, and that he is prepared to run.

He, himself, put the arguments on the other side thoughtfully and very sensibly, I thought. He says that when A is older, say 17 or 18, she may want to bear her own father's name—her patronym, as it is—but it will then be a good deal more difficult for her and more embarrassing for her to resume it, and I think there is a good deal of force in that view. But it does, of course, presuppose that A—or, indeed, both the children—are likely, later on, to want to resume the name of Y.

No one can foretell the future, but to my mind, in this case, having seen the grown-ups, I am far from sure that the children will want to change their name again. They may. If they do, and they feel strongly about it, they will be able to do so, though I agree entirely with the father that it will not be so easy for them to do so.

Weighing it all up as best I can—and without anything approaching certainty, I am afraid, that I am right—I have reached the conclusion that the scales do come down in favour of leaving the name as it is for the time being.

a [His Lordship then considered the question of staying access and considered that the time was not ripe for such an order; the summons would be adjourned generally should it be found necessary to bring the matter before the court; meanwhile the father would be granted access for one day every fortnight.]

g H was a student at a teacher-training college which was governed by a trust deed. Clause 3 of the deed appointed the Archbishop of Canterbury to be the visitor of the college. Clause 17 (ii) provided that the college should be conducted so as to comply with the Education Acts 1944 to 1967, as amended by any subsequent enactment, and with any regulations for the training of teachers made thereunder. Clause 27 provided, inter alia: 'Within the limits prescribed by this Trust Deed and subject to any Regulations made by the Secretary of State for Education and Science . . . (iv) subject to the general responsibility and control of the Governing Body the Academic Board of the College shall . . . (d) make recommendations to the Principal for the suspension or dismissal of students whose standard of work is unsatisfactory . . .'. By h cl 24, it was provided that the principal of the college should have power to recommend the dismissal of a student from the college, and that every such recommendation should require to be confirmed by resolution of the college's governing body after it had considered such representations in writing or in person as the student might wish to make. After H had completed his third teaching practice the academic board met and recommended to the governing body that H should be required to withdraw forthwith from the college on academic grounds. H was not accorded a hearing by the academic board before the recommendation was made but he was present when the matter came before the governing body and was given, prior to the meeting, a copy of the academic board's report, which was the only document that i the governing body had before it at the meeting. The governing body resolved unanimously to accept the academic board's recommendation. H claimed, inter alia, that the resolution was contrary to the terms of the trust deed and in breach of the rules of natural justice in that he had not had an opportunity to challenge the evidence against him or to meet the details of the case made. He brought an action against three members of the governing body in which he sought, inter alia, (i) a declaration that the resolution was ultra vires, null and void and (ii) an injunction ordering the college to readmit him. The defendants moved for an order that H's statement of claim be struck out under RSC Ord 18, r 19, as disclosing no reasonable cause of action on the grounds (i) that, by virtue of s 68^a of the Education Act 1944, which was applied to teacher-training colleges by the Training of Teachers Regulations 1967^b, the action was outside the jurisdiction of the court and that by reason of s 68 H's only proper remedy was a reference to the Secretary of State; and (ii) alternatively, that the matter was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury as visitor.

Held – (i) The plaintiff was not precluded by s 68 of the Act from resorting to the courts, for, although such resort was prohibited where the alleged impropriety was a wrong exercise of discretion, it was not prohibited where the allegation was that an educational body was acting ultra vires, and the allegations against the defendants were such that they were being charged with a breach of the law in a more fundamental manner than a faulty exercise of discretion (see p 588 h to p 589 a, post); Cumings v Birkenhead Corpn [1971] 2 All ER 881 applied.

(ii) The statement of claim would however be struck out for the matters of which H complained, although they raised the issue of natural justice, touched the internal affairs of the college, and the construction of the regulations of the college and the carrying into effect of those regulations in relation to persons who subjected themselves to them came within the exclusive jurisdiction of the visitor (see p 589 b and c, and p 591 d post); Attorney-General v Talbot (1747) 3 Atk 662, R v Dunsheath, ex parte Meredith [1950] 2 All ER 741 and Thorne v University of London [1966] 2 All ER 338 applied.

Motion

- f* Ivan Wynford Herring brought an action against Geoffrey Templeman, Leonard George Appleton and Frederic Mason as members of and representatives of the governing body of Christ Church College, Canterbury ('the college'), claiming (i) a declaration that a resolution of the governing body of the college made on 31st January 1972, whereby the governing body accepted a recommendation of the college's academic board to the effect that the plaintiff be required to leave the college forthwith, and the recommendation of the academic board itself, and each of them, was ultra vires, null and void; (ii) an injunction ordering the college to readmit the plaintiff to it as a student in time for him to pursue the third year course of study in the academic year 1972-73 or 1973-74; (iii) damages; (iv) further or other relief. The defendants moved for an order (i) that the statement of claim be struck out under RSC Ord 18, r 19, and (ii) that the action be dismissed. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- j* 15th February. BRIGHTMAN J read the following judgment. This is an action by Ivan Wynford Herring against three members of the governing body of an educational charity known as Christ Church College, Canterbury. The plaintiff seeks a declaration that a resolution of the governing body passed on 31st January 1972 was ultra vires and therefore null and void. The resolution that is challenged is one which unanimously accepted a recommendation of the academic board of the college that the plaintiff be required to withdraw from the college on academic grounds. This motion before me is an application by the defendants under RSC Ord 18, r 19, to strike out the amended statement of claim on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action. a

It appears from the statement of claim and the documents referred to therein that the college is a teacher-training college originally set up pursuant to charitable trusts declared by the Central Board of Finance of the Church of England by a trust deed dated 5th April 1961. The governing body of the college were given certain powers to vary the terms of the trust deed, as also was the visitor. These powers were exercised. The college is currently governed by what is called a revised trust deed, signed on 9th July 1968 signed by the chairman of the governing body. b

Clause 2 of the revised trust deed provides that the college and its endowments (of which the Central Board of Finance is custodian trustee) shall be administered by the governing body as the administering trustees thereof. Clause 3 appoints the Archbishop of Canterbury to be the visitor of the college. Clause 5 regulates the constitution of the governing body. The governing body consists of not more than 25 persons, that is to say, seven representative members of the Church of England appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and certain Church of England bodies, six representatives of educational authorities, the principal and deputy-principal of the college and a few other members. Clause 17 (ii) provides that the college shall be conducted so as to comply with the Education Acts 1944 to 1967 as amended by any subsequent enactment, and with any regulations for the training of teachers made thereunder. Clause 23 sets up an academic board consisting of the principal, who is the chairman of the board, the deputy-principal and members of the academic staff. Clause 27 is headed 'Curriculum and Teaching'. So far as material for present purposes it provides: c

'Within the limits prescribed by this Trust Deed and subject to any Regulations made by the Secretary of State for Education and Science . . . (iv) subject to the general responsibility and control of the Governing Body the Academic Board of the College shall . . . (d) make recommendations to the Principal for the suspension or dismissal of students whose standard of work is unsatisfactory . . . ' d

Turning back in the trust deed, one finds cl 24, which is of prime importance, and I will read it in full: e

'The Principal shall have power to recommend the dismissal of a student from the College. Every such recommendation shall require to be confirmed by resolution of the Governing Body after considering such representations in writing or in person as the student may wish to make except that in emergency the Chairman or in his absence the Vice-Chairman shall have power to act on behalf of the Governing Body and shall report his action to the next meeting of the Governing Body. Every such dismissal, after confirmation by the Governing Body or by the Chairman or Vice-Chairman acting on behalf of the Governing Body, shall at once be reported to the Secretary of State for Education and Science. The Principal, for any reason he may judge adequate, shall have power to suspend any student from his studies in the College and to exclude him from the premises of the College. The Principal shall at once report any such suspension or exclusion to the Chairman or in his absence the Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body.' f

I will also mention cl 39. This provides that any question as to the construction of the trust deed or as to the validity of any act done or about to be done thereunder shall be determined conclusively by the Secretary of State for Education and Science on application made to him for that purpose by the governing body. The defendants do not rely on this clause as by itself removing this action from the jurisdiction of this court. g a It also appears from the statement of claim and the documents referred to therein, and from certain explanations given to me during the hearing of the motion, that the college conducts a three-year training course for teachers. The course includes periodical examinations, and also practical exercises in teaching at other schools which are called 'teaching practices'. The plaintiff took part in three teaching practices: the first in 1970 during his third term; the second in 1971 during his fifth term; the third also in 1971 during his seventh term. Had all gone well the plaintiff would have remained at the college for nine terms, leaving in the middle of 1972.

b On some date after the plaintiff's third teaching practice, the academic board held a meeting. It made a recommendation to the governing body that the plaintiff should be required to withdraw forthwith from the college on academic grounds. In its report, it stated that it had reached this decision because it was of the opinion that the plaintiff had shown himself unfit on teaching practice to be a teacher. The board stated in its report that the decision was based on the unanimous judgment of all those involved in assessing the plaintiff's final teaching practice, i.e. the external examiner, the college tutors and the head of the school, together with supporting evidence from reports of the plaintiff's first and second teaching practices. I understand 'the Head of the School' means the head of the school at which the plaintiff took his final teaching practice. For the purposes of the first teaching practice, students were assessed according to three grades, the lowest being 'weak'. That is the grade which the plaintiff attained. For the purposes of the second teaching practice there were five lettered grades, A to E. After his second teaching practice, the plaintiff was assessed as grade D/E, grade D being the lowest pass grade and grade E signifying failure; an assessment of D/E presumably signifies that the assessing body was uncertain whether the plaintiff should be graded as a failure, or should be passed at the lowest grade. The plaintiff's grade assessment after the third teaching practice is not set out in the report of the academic board. The report concluded with this statement:

f 'In the present case [the plaintiff] unhappily seems to be unaware of or unable to understand his deficiencies and to be lacking in that capacity for self-criticism which might have given hope that he would one day be able to equip himself satisfactorily for the teaching profession. Consequently, it is the Academic Board's view that there is no justification for continuing [the plaintiff's] course at the college.'

g It is common ground that the plaintiff was not accorded a hearing by the academic board itself before the board recommended his dismissal. He was, however, offered a sort of ex gratia hearing before a committee of the academic board by way of informal appeal, but this was not acceptable to him.

h The matter came before the governing body on 31st January 1972. The proceedings of the governing body are the subject-matter of lengthy minutes, which counsel agreed that I should read; their accuracy was not challenged. There were present the chairman of the governing body and 11 other members. The plaintiff appeared before the governing body, as also did his solicitor who acted in part as his spokesman. The governing body spelt out its duties as follows, according to the minutes (minute 535 (e)):

j '... the Governing Body must make a decision either to accept the recommendation of the Academic Board or to reject it. It was not the business of the Governing Body to interfere with the Academic Board's assessment of [the plaintiff's] academic and professional competence, but an opportunity must be given to [the plaintiff] to offer reasons why he should be allowed to complete his course.'

The governing body had before it one document only, namely, the report of the academic board to which I have already referred. The plaintiff had been given a copy of this report prior to the meeting. In answering questions from the governing body, the plaintiff said that he found it difficult to make a case because the academic board had not told him why he was unfit to be a teacher. There is then this passage in the minutes, recorded as an answer by the plaintiff to a question put to him: a

‘the final teaching practice assessment as an examination result was not being contested, but [the plaintiff] should have been warned he was in danger of failing and given an opportunity to make representations.’ b

Many other points were urged on his behalf which it is not necessary for me to recite. In conclusion, as I have already mentioned, the governing body resolved unanimously to accept the recommendation of the academic board.

The writ in this action was issued in September 1972 and the statement of claim was served shortly thereafter. The first defendant, Dr Templeman, is the chairman of the governing body. The second defendant, Canon Appleton, is a member of the governing body. The third defendant, the Rev Frederic Mason, is the principal of the college and the chairman of the academic board. He is an ex officio member of the governing body but did not in fact sit with his fellow governors when the plaintiff's case was reviewed. c

The statement of claim is a document of considerable length. I will endeavour to summarise the plaintiff's contentions briefly. (1) The academic board acted contrary to the terms of the revised trust deed, ultra vires and in breach of natural justice. The allegations in support of this contention are: (a) the academic board had no power to make a recommendation to the governing body; under cl 27 (iv) (d) a recommendation for the dismissal of the plaintiff had to be made to the principal, who was then empowered but not obliged under cl 24 to make his own recommendation to the governing body; (b) the academic board ought to have given the plaintiff a hearing before recommending dismissal, because other matters than his examination marks and teaching practice were taken into consideration by the academic board; (c) if, which was not admitted, the recommendation made to the governing body ought to be treated as a recommendation by the principal of the college, the principal acted in breach of natural justice, for four reasons: he did not accord the plaintiff a hearing; he adopted the recommendation of the academic board without reconsidering it; he relied on the recommendation of the academic board although arrived at wrongfully; the principal had himself sat on the academic board. (2) The resolution of the governing body was contrary to the terms of the trust deed and in breach of natural justice. The reasons put forward are broadly as follows. So far as the governing body had before it a recommendation of the principal, that recommendation was a nullity for reasons explained. The recommendation of the academic board was also a nullity. The academic board reported to the governing body opinions it had arrived at or accepted from the teaching staff, but did not report the evidence on which such opinions were founded. The plaintiff had no opportunity to challenge the evidence against him, or to meet the details of the case made. The governing body treated the report of the academic board as a binding assessment of his competence, and as subject only to what was called in argument a ‘plea in mitigation’ on the part of the plaintiff. The governing body ought to have had before it the evidence which was before the academic board, and should have called as witnesses the authors of the reports on which the academic board acted. Generally, the plaintiff did not have an opportunity of appreciating and answering the case which was sought to be made against him. d

Counsel for the defendants submits that the statement of claim should be struck out on three grounds. First, that the action is outside the jurisdiction of the court having regard to the Education Act 1944, by reason whereof the only proper remedy of the plaintiff, it is said, is a reference to the Secretary of State for Education and Science and not to this court. Secondly, it was submitted that, if the Education Act

a 1944 is not applicable in the manner contended for, the matter is within the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury as visitor and therefore not within the jurisdiction of this court. Thirdly, if, contrary to these submissions, this matter is justiciable, the statement of claim discloses no cause of action which has any foreseeable chance of succeeding, and should therefore be struck out in limine.

b The first two points, therefore, go to jurisdiction. It was agreed and indeed asserted by both counsel that the issue of jurisdiction, being a pure question of law, was proper to be decided on this motion; counsel for the plaintiff did not seek to oppose the motion merely on the ground that there was an arguable case in favour of the court's jurisdiction.

Section 68 of the Education Act 1944, as amended, provides:

c 'If the Secretary of State is satisfied, either on complaint by any person or otherwise, that any local education authority or the managers or governors of any county or voluntary school have acted or are proposing to act unreasonably with respect to the exercise of any power conferred or the performance of any duty imposed by or under this Act, he may, notwithstanding any enactment rendering the exercise of the power or the performance of the duty contingent upon the opinion of the authority or of the managers or governors, give such directions as to the exercise of the power or the performance of the duty as appear to him to be expedient . . .'

Christ Church College is not, of course, a local education authority, but s 68 is applied to it by certain provisions of a statutory instrument, the Training of Teachers Regulations 1967¹. There are two regulations which are relevant. Regulation 12:

e 'Every college shall be conducted in accordance with articles of government made with the approval of the Secretary of State, which shall in particular determine the functions to be exercised in relation to the college by the body providing the college, the governing body, the academic board and the principal.'

f The word 'college' has been changed by the Training of Teachers (Amendment) Regulations 1969² to read 'voluntary college', and this means a college not maintained by a local education authority.

The other regulation of 1967 which is relevant is reg 15; this reads, so far as material, as follows:

g 'The provisions relating to the reasonable exercise of functions and the making of reports and returns respectively contained in sections 68 and 92 of the Education Act 1944 shall apply to the governing bodies of voluntary colleges as they apply to authorities . . .'

h The argument on behalf of the defendants, based on these provisions, is that the only remedy open to a person who wishes to complain of a wrongful exercise by the college of the powers given to it, is an application to the Secretary of State. Both sides relied on *Cumings v Birkenhead Corp*³. In that case a local authority with a duty to allocate particular pupils in their area to particular schools was said to have acted wrongfully in telling parents that pupils who attended Roman Catholic primary schools would be considered only for Roman Catholic secondary schools and not for maintained county secondary schools. The important passages for present purposes appear in the judgment of Lord Denning MR, and are these⁴:

j '... in case of a wrong exercise of their discretion, the only remedy is that given by statute. If the education authority fail to discharge a duty which is imposed on them by the Act, a remedy is given by s 99 of the Act. If the education authority are acting or proposing to act unreasonably in regard to the execution of their duties, then again a remedy is given by s 68 of the Act. In either case the person aggrieved can apply to the Minister. Counsel for the parents realises the force of the argument in those sections. So he puts forward the proposition that in this case the education authority are not merely exercising their discretion wrongly. They are acting beyond their powers, or, in Latin, ultra vires. If that were the case, then this court would interfere. The courts will always interfere if a Minister or county borough or any other body is acting beyond the powers conferred on it by law.' a

4 [1971] 2 All ER at 884, [1972] Ch at 36

Then later Lord Denning MR said¹:

'So, here, if this education authority were to allocate boys to particular schools according to the colour of their hair or, for that matter, the colour of their skin, it would be so unreasonable, so capricious, so irrelevant to any proper system of education that it would be ultra vires altogether, and this court would strike it down at once. But, if there were valid educational reasons for a policy, as, for instance, in an area where immigrant children were backward in the English tongue and needed special teaching, then it would be perfectly right to allocate those in need to special schools where they would be given extra facilities for learning English. In short, if the policy is one which could reasonably be upheld for good educational reasons, it is valid. But, if it is so unreasonable that no reasonable authority could entertain it, it is invalid...'

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that the case before me did not fall within s 68, because the section is expressed to apply to 'the exercise of any power conferred or the performance of any duty imposed by or under this Act'. The power of dismissal is not, it was submitted, a power conferred by the 1944 Act, nor was the duty of the governing body to dismiss an unsuitable pupil one which was imposed under the Act; this power and this duty arose under the revised trust deed. In my judgment, this submission of the plaintiff is not correct. Regulation 12 of the 1967 regulations, which I have already read, requires that Christ Church College shall be conducted in accordance with articles of government made with the approval of the Secretary of State. I assume that the revised trust deed was in fact so approved; there was no suggestion made to me by counsel that it had not been approved; and I observe that seven clauses of the trust deed involve action on the part of the Secretary of State; such clauses would scarcely have been included in the revised trust deed without the approval of the Secretary of State. As the college has a statutory duty to conduct its affairs in accordance with the revised trust deed, it seems to me that s 68 of the Act and reg 15 must be interpreted as providing a means of complaining of an unreasonable performance of the college's functions, without creating an exception for powers or duties which owe their primary origin to a trust deed. Such an exception would not in my view be a reasonable interpretation of the Act and the regulations. c

It does not, however, follow from the Cumings case² that an aggrieved party is necessarily precluded from resort to the courts in every case of alleged malperformance by an educational body of its functions. Clearly such resort is prohibited, on the authority of the Cumings case², where the alleged impropriety is a wrong exercise of a discretion. Equally clearly, resort to the courts is not prohibited, on the authority of that case, where the educational body is said to be acting ultra vires. It seems to me that an educational body which is said to be acting contrary to natural justice is not being charged with the faulty exercise of a discretion. The charge runs j

a much deeper and is a charge of a breach of the law in a more fundamental manner. In my view, the Cummings case¹ would not prevent resort to the court in such circumstances. I therefore reach the conclusion that the plaintiff is not precluded by s 68 of the 1944 Act and the regulations from resorting to the courts in the present case.

b That is not, however, the end of the matter. The defendants further submitted that the subject-matter of the plaintiff's complaint lay within the jurisdiction of the visitor, namely the Archbishop of Canterbury, and that the jurisdiction of this court was therefore ousted. Before I refer to the cases cited in support of this proposition, it would be convenient to adumbrate the plaintiff's reply thereto. The plaintiff's counsel conceded during the later part of his argument that the relief claimed by the plaintiff was within the jurisdiction of the visitor. He submitted, however, that in a case where the party aggrieved asserted that the defendant had acted in breach of natural justice the court had a concurrent jurisdiction. If, as submitted, there was c concurrent jurisdiction, it was proper to allow the action to proceed in this court. In none of the reported cases on the jurisdiction of the visitor, it was said, did the issue of natural justice arise.

d An early case in which the exclusive jurisdiction of the visitor was asserted was *Attorney-General v Talbot*². This was decided by Lord Hardwicke LC in 1747. The relator was Robert Mapletoft, a native of the county of Northampton. He claimed that the election of the defendant, William Talbot, to a vacant fellowship at Clare College was null and void because the election disregarded the founder's rule that a native of Northampton (possessing the appropriate qualifications) should have preference. Having decided that the chancellor of the university was visitor of Clare College, Lord Hardwicke LC continued as follows³:

e 'If the Chancellor of this University then is visitor, the general powers of a visitor are well known; no court of law or equity can anticipate their judgment, or take away their jurisdiction, but their determinations are final and conclusive. And it is a more convenient method of determination of controversies of this nature, it is at home, forum domesticum, and final in the first instance, and they f should be adjudged in a short way secundum arbitrium boni viri: it is true this power may be abused, but if it is exercised in a discreet manner, it is a much less expence than suits at law, or in equity; and in general, I believe, such appeals have been equitably determined.'

g In *R v Dunsheath, ex parte Meredith*⁴ the suitor was a graduate and a member of convocation of London University. The statutes of the university enabled members of convocation to requisition a meeting. Convocation was empowered to discuss any matter relating to the university and to declare its opinion thereon to the senate of the university. A sufficient number of members of convocation put their signatures to a requisition for a meeting to consider a motion challenging the propriety of the dismissal of a lecturer who, it was said, was being dismissed as a result of discrimination on political grounds. The chairman of convocation declined to implement the requisition on the ground that the motion did not relate to the university and did not raise a matter on which convocation was entitled to declare its opinion to the senate. An application was made for an order of mandamus directing the chairman of convocation to summon a meeting. Under the statutes of the university, the King in Council was the visitor. Lord Goddard CJ, delivering the judgment of the Divisional Court, said⁵:

5 [1950] 2 All ER at 743, [1951] 1 KB at 131, 132

'It is important to remember that mandamus is neither a writ of course nor a writ of right, but that it will be granted if the duty is in the nature of a public duty and specially affects the rights of an individual, provided there is no more appropriate remedy. This court has always refused to issue a mandamus if there is another remedy open to the party seeking it. This is one of the reasons, no doubt, why, where there is a visitor of a corporate body, the court will not interfere in a matter within the province of the visitor, and especially this is so in matters relating to educational bodies such as colleges. I see no difference for this purpose between a college and a university. Any question that arises of a domestic nature is essentially one for a domestic forum, and this is supported by all the authorities which deal with visitatorial powers and duties, and, although the question has generally arisen with regard to election to fellowships, I see no difference in principle between the question whether a particular person ought to be elected to a fellowship or whether a particular person is a fit and proper person to be appointed or retained as a teacher at a university or a school.'

Lord Goddard CJ concluded¹:

'The case, then, is that an officer of the university is alleged to have refused to perform a duty placed on him by the statutes of the university, and that seems to me to be essentially a matter for the visitor, because it is a domestic question. The officer objects to calling this meeting on the ground that the matter sought to be discussed is not a matter relating to the university. Whether it is such a matter is essentially a question for the visitor, who is also presumed to understand the statutes generally relating to the university, and will have knowledge of the status of these particular schools, which we have not gone into at any length, and which do not seem to be entirely clear.'

There is only one other case to which I think it is useful to refer. That is *Thorne v University of London*². This was a case in which a law student, who was also a doctor of philosophy and no doubt a person of some academic attainments, failed two out of the five examination papers which he took for the purposes of an LLB degree at London University. He sued the University of London for damages for negligently misjudging his examination papers, and also sought an order of mandamus requiring the university to award him an appropriate grade. The university applied to a Queen's Bench master to strike out the statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. This the master did. His decision was affirmed by the judge in chambers. Dr Thorne then took the matter to the Court of Appeal. He conducted his case in person. Although he did not satisfy the examiners of London University in trusts and criminal law, he seems to have been no mean advocate. In the course of the appellant's argument Diplock LJ said³:

'In disputes of this kind the sole jurisdiction vests with the Visitor to the university, not with the courts. The authority for that is *Thomson v. London University*⁴, where it was held that the Visitor to the university had the sole exclusive jurisdiction to deal with such issues.'

A little later, he said³:

'The principle is that at common law the court had no jurisdiction to deal with the internal affairs or government of the university, for those have been confided by the law to the exclusive province of the Visitor.'

a In his judgment, which was in fact the judgment of the court, Diplock LJ¹ quoted with approval the words of Kindersley V-C spoken a century earlier in *Thomson v London University*². The words bear repetition:

b 'The holding of examinations and the conferring of degrees being one, if not the main or only object of this University, all the regulations, that is, the construction of all the regulations and the carrying into effect of all those regulations as among persons who are either actually members of the University or who come in and subject themselves to be at least pro hac vice members of the University—I mean with respect to the degrees which they seek to have conferred upon them—all those are regulations of the domus: they are regulations clearly in my mind coming within the jurisdiction, and the exclusive jurisdiction, of the Visitor.'

c Diplock LJ's comment on the words of Kindersley V-C was this³:

The High Court does not act as a Court of Appeal from university examiners; and, speaking for my own part, I am very glad that it declines this jurisdiction. Clearly it does decline the jurisdiction.'

d In the action with which I am concerned, the plaintiff's case is that he did not have a hearing before the academic board, that he did not have a fair hearing before the governing body and that the procedure of his dismissal was defective. In my judgment, these are essentially matters which touch the internal affairs or government of the college and are therefore matters confined by law to the exclusive province of the visitor. The dismissal of a student teacher for failing, in the opinion of those charged with the task of forming an opinion, to match up to the standard required of a teacher is the inevitable duty of an educational establishment which holds examinations and passes out students whom it considers fit to be teachers. The training of a student teacher and the assessment of his competence is the main and indeed the only object of a teacher-training college. The construction of the regulations of the college and the carrying into effect of those regulations in relation to persons who subject themselves to those regulations are, in my view, matters e which the decided authorities have committed to the exclusive jurisdiction of the visitor. This is, of course, subject to the jurisdiction conferred on the Secretary of State under s 68 of the 1944 Act where the subject-matter is appropriate to that section. As Diplock LJ said³, the High Court does not act as a Court of Appeal from educational examiners; likewise the court will not interfere with a decision taken by the governing body of an educational charity, such as Christ Church College, Canterbury, as to the fitness of a student to continue his academic studies at that establishment, and will not conduct a critical inquiry into the manner in which that decision f was reached; that is for the visitor or, where appropriate, the Secretary of State.

g For the reasons which I have given, I propose to strike out the statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action.

h Judgment accordingly.

Criminal law – Costs – Acquittal – Discretion – Costs of successful defendant – Costs out of central funds unless positive reasons for making different order – Reasons for making different order.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. I have a practice direction to make on the subject of costs of successful defendants. This direction is given after consultation with the judges of the Queen's Bench and Family Divisions.

Although the award of costs must always remain a matter for the court's discretion, in the light of the circumstances of the particular case, it should be accepted as normal practice that when the court has power to award costs out of central funds it should do so in favour of a successful defendant, unless there are positive reasons for making a different order. Examples of such reasons are: (a) Where the prosecution has acted spitefully or without reasonable cause. Here the defendant's costs should be paid by the prosecutor. (b) Where the defendant's own conduct has brought suspicion on himself and has misled the prosecution into thinking that the case against him is stronger than it really is. In such circumstances the defendant can properly be left to pay his own costs. (c) Where there is ample evidence to support a verdict of guilty but the defendant is entitled to an acquittal on account of some procedural irregularity. Here again, the defendant can properly be left to pay his own costs. (d) Where the defendant is acquitted on one charge but convicted on another. Here the court should make whatever order seems just having regard to the relative importance of the two charges, and to the defendant's conduct generally Divorce – Financial provision – Matters to be considered by court when making order – Duty to place parties in financial position in which they would have been in absence of breakdown – Allocation of family assets – Matrimonial home only asset – Home owned by husband – Ascertainment of wife's beneficial interest in asset – Estimate of value of beneficial interest – Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, s 5 (1).

Divorce – Financial provision – Conduct of parties – Duty of court to have regard to conduct – Circumstances in which regard should be had to conduct – Conduct obvious and gross – Substantial disparity in conduct of parties to be shown – Meaning of 'obvious and gross' – Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, s 5 (1).

Husband and wife – Property – Improvement – Contribution by spouse in money or money's worth to improvement of property – Contribution of substantial nature – Acquisition of beneficial interest by virtue of contribution – Need for contribution to be identifiable with relevant improvement – More general contributions not sufficient – Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, s 37.

The husband and wife were married in 1954, each of them then being 25 years old. They had two daughters, one born in 1961 and the other in 1964. The husband was a builder and, apart from short periods in employment, carried on business on his own account; the highest net profit was about £1,250; there were some fringe benefits. In the course of his business the husband acquired successively five houses each of which became the matrimonial home. The first was built by himself with the help of outside contractors. There was evidence that the wife had helped in the physical work of building although her contribution was no more than any wife might give. The wife was a trained school teacher but gave up teaching in 1958 to start a family. In 1967 the husband suffered a serious illness and, although he resumed light building work in the late summer of 1968, he was not fully fit for work until June 1969. During his illness he received sickness benefit of £10 a week. In consequence of the illness the husband's father advanced him sums amounting to £5,000, repayment of which was secured by a mortgage of the matrimonial home. During the marriage all the profits and earnings of each spouse were applied for the benefit of the family. Except for the asset represented by the matrimonial home, neither spouse had any savings; each had debts. Each had made full contribution to the welfare of the family according to their respective capabilities. In June 1969 the husband discovered the wife committing adultery with a youth half her age. The husband reacted violently ordering the wife out of the home; she left with the children. Her association with the youth did not survive. The husband thereafter treated the marriage as at an end because of the wife's disloyalty. In October 1969 he instituted proceedings for divorce. In May 1970 he obtained a decree nisi on the ground of the wife's adultery, the wife not proceeding with a cross-petition alleging cruelty. The husband was granted custody of the children with care and control to the wife. From January 1970 until January 1971 the husband worked as a salesman at a salary of £1,600 per annum and since September 1972 he had been employed as a sales representative earning £1,880 per annum. Following the separation the wife worked as a clerk at £900 per annum. In January 1970 she obtained full-time employment as a teacher, her salary being £2,124. The husband paid the wife £5 a week for the children. In November 1971 the registrar ordered the husband to pay £4 a week to each of the children and to settle a sum of £8,000 to be invested in the purchase of a home for the benefit and occupation of the children until the younger attained 25 or they both married or left home under that age, the wife being responsible for the outgoings, other than structural repairs whilst in occupation. The wife subsequently bought a house for £10,850, which was subject to a building society mortgage for £6,150 and a second mortgage to her bank for £3,500. She had to borrow from friends in order to maintain the mortgage payments. The wife appealed against the registrar's orders and applied, inter alia, for (i) a declaration under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 that she was beneficially entitled to a half share in the matrimonial home; (ii) a declaration that she had acquired a share in the matrimonial home by reason of her contribution to the building of the first home, by virtue of s 37^a of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970; (iii) orders under ss 2 and 4 of the 1970 Act for lump sum or transfer of property orders to her or the settlement of property for her benefit. The agreed value of the matrimonial home was £27,000 subject to the mortgage of £5,000. In addition to the periodical payment for the children, the husband was making certain other payments for them, e.g. school fees, his total outgoings for the children being about £1,000 per annum.

Held – (i) In order to establish that the wife had contributed in money or money's worth to the improvement of real property owned by the husband, within s 37 of the 1970 Act, the contribution had to be identifiable with the relevant improvement, as well as substantial; mere general contributions, that would be taken into account by the court under s 5 (1) (f)^b for the purpose of exercising its powers to make orders for financial provision, were not sufficient. On the evidence the wife had failed to establish anything which amounted to a substantial contribution under s 37 (see p 603 j and p 604 a to c, post).

(ii) In considering whether the conduct of one of the parties was so 'obvious and gross' that it would be just to take it into account under s 5 (1) of the 1970 Act for the purpose of determining the appropriate orders for financial provision, the conduct of both parties had to be considered. If the conduct of one was substantially as bad as that of

^a Section 37 provides: 'It is hereby declared that where a husband or wife contributes in money or money's worth to the improvement of real or personal property in which or in the proceeds of sale of which either or both of them has or have a beneficial interest, the husband or wife so contributing shall, if the contribution is of a substantial nature and subject to any agreement between them to the contrary express or implied, be treated as having then acquired by virtue of his or her contribution a share or an enlarged share, as the case may be, in that beneficial interest of such an extent as may have been then agreed or, in default of such agreement, as may seem in all the circumstances just to any court before which the question of the existence or extent of the beneficial interest of the husband or wife arises (whether in proceedings between them or in any other proceedings).'

^b Section 5 (1) provides: 'It shall be the duty of the court in deciding whether to exercise its powers under section 2 or 4 of this Act in relation to a party to the marriage and, if so, in what manner, to have regard to all the circumstances of the case including the following matters, that is to say—(a) the income, earning capacity, property and other financial resources which each of the parties to the marriage has or is likely to have in the foreseeable future; (b) the financial needs, obligations and responsibilities which each of the parties to the marriage has or is likely to have in the foreseeable future; (c) the standard of living enjoyed by the family before the breakdown of the marriage; (d) the age of each party to the marriage and the duration of the marriage; (e) any physical or mental disability of either of the parties to the marriage; (f) the contributions made by each of the parties to the welfare of the family, including any contribution made by looking after the home or caring for the family; (g) in the case of proceedings for divorce or nullity of marriage, the value to either of the parties to the marriage of any benefit (for example, a pension) which by reason of the dissolution or annulment of the marriage, that party will lose the chance of acquiring; and so to exercise those powers as to place the parties, so far as it is practicable and, having regard to their conduct, just to do so, in the financial position in which they would have been if the marriage had not broken down and each had properly discharged his or her financial obligations and responsibilities towards the other.'

a the other then it mattered not how gross that conduct was; they would weigh evenly in the balance. In the circumstances the conduct of the wife fell far short of being 'obvious and gross', at least in comparison with that of the husband, and accordingly it would not be just to have regard to the conduct of the parties (see p 601 g, and p 603 h, post).

b (iii) It followed therefore that it was the duty of the court under s 5 (1) of the 1970 Act so to exercise its powers as to place the parties, so far as practicable, in the financial position in which they would have been had the marriage not broken down. For that purpose the financial position of a wife had to be treated as being more than a right to live in a house; she was to be treated as potentially entitled to benefit at some time from her husband's capital assets; where the time and nature of that benefit could not be predicated some estimate had to be made; for that purpose, at least where the husband's capital was comparatively small in value, a reasonable starting point was to regard the wife as entitled at some time to about a third of that value, although the time at which she would receive free spendable capital would often depend on whether there were young children to be cared for (see p 601 c to f, post).

d (iv) In the circumstances a capital payment to the wife immediately of £12,500, for which she had asked, would be to put her in a far better financial position, and the husband in a far worse position, than they would have been had the marriage not broken down. The proper course would be to discharge the registrar's orders, to order the wife to convey her new house to trustees, to order the husband to pay to the wife £12,500 out of the proceeds of the sale of the matrimonial home on terms that the payment of sufficient sums to the wife's bankers and the building society to discharge her indebtedness to them would be a good discharge pro tanto of the husband's liability. The wife's house should be held by the trustees on trust for sale, with her consent or at her request, and on beneficial trusts of income for her and such of the children as were living during the trust period, which should end on her death or earlier so soon as neither of the children was under 25 and unmarried; thereafter the capital should be held on trust for the husband and wife in equal shares. The wife should be allowed to live in the house or any substituted house during the trust period, she paying all outgoings other than structural repairs (see p 605 b to g, post).

g Per Bagnall J. To be taken into account under s 5 (1) of the 1970 Act conduct must be 'obvious and gross' in the sense that the party concerned must be plainly seen to have wilfully persisted in conduct, or a course of conduct, calculated to destroy the marriage in circumstances in which the other party is substantially blameless (see p 601 h, post).

Appeal and summons

The wife, Aileen Patricia Harnett, appealed against the order of Mr Registrar Compton-Miller made on 8th November 1971 under s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 whereby he ordered the husband, John Michael Dominic Harnett, to settle £8,000 to be invested in the purchase of property for the benefit and occupation of the two children of the family on certain declared trusts and to pay £4 a week to each of them. By a summons dated 15th May 1972 the wife further applied, inter alia, for (a) a declaration under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 that she was beneficially entitled to an equitable half share in the former matrimonial home in Butts Hill Road, Woodley, Berkshire, and (b) a declaration that, by virtue of s 37 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, she be treated as having acquired a share in the matrimonial home by reason of her contributions for the improvement thereof. The proceedings were heard in chambers but judgment was given in open court. b

5th March. BAGNALL J read the following judgment. The parties in this case were married on 31st July 1954, each of them being then 25 years old. They have had two children, Siobhan born on 4th August 1961 and Rebecca born on 20th April 1964. On 20th October 1969 the husband filed a petition for divorce under the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, on the ground of the wife's adultery with a Mr Atton. By her answer the wife admitted the alleged adultery, alleged conduct conducing and sought a divorce on the ground of cruelty; she also sought ancillary relief by way of maintenance for herself and the children and secured provision and payment of a lump sum. The suit was heard on 26th May 1970 when Faulks J granted a decree nisi to the husband on the ground of the wife's admitted adultery. The wife did not defend and did not proceed with her allegations of cruelty and there was no adjudication on those allegations. Custody of the two daughters was given to the husband and care and control to the wife with directions for access. The marriage was dissolved by decree absolute on 3rd September 1970. e

I now have to deal with the wife's applications for ancillary relief partly on original jurisdiction and partly on appeal from two orders made by the learned Senior Registrar on 8th November 1971. The wife's claim as finally formulated (leave having been given where necessary) is as follows. 1. A declaration under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 that she is beneficially entitled to an equitable half share in the final matrimonial home. Counsel on her behalf conceded that on the principles established by the House of Lords in *Pettitt v Pettitt*¹ and *Gissing v Gissing*², as applied in *Cowcher v Cowcher*³, he could not establish this claim but reserved the right to submit in the Court of Appeal that the last mentioned case was wrongly decided. I need say no more on this claim. 2. A claim to be treated as having acquired a share in certain real property finally represented by the matrimonial home by reason of contributions made by her to the improvement of that real property. 3. An order for periodical payments which, however, was eventually abandoned. 4. Orders for the payment of a lump sum or transfer of property to her or the settlement of property for her benefit. 5. An order for periodical payments to or for the benefit of each of her daughters. f a The husband opposes all those claims except that he supports the very limited order for a settlement of property and periodical payments to the children made by the learned registrar. In particular he submits that the provision to be made for the wife should be very substantially reduced having regard to her conduct.

b It is established that these claims have to be determined under the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970 which, with the Divorce Reform Act 1969, came into force on 1st January 1971. A number of difficult questions arise on the construction and application of the 1970 Act. On some of them guidance has been given by three recent decisions of the Court of Appeal to which I shall have to refer. I propose first to seek to construe the relevant sections and then, with the guidance afforded by the Court of Appeal, to apply them to the facts of this case.

c Since conduct is here in issue I must first refer to the 1969 Act which, adopting a compromise between two extreme philosophies, radically changed the basis of the court's jurisdiction to grant a divorce. Previously divorce could only be obtained on the ground of what was called a matrimonial offence. By the 1969 Act the only ground for divorce is the irretrievable breakdown of the marriage. But that breakdown can only be established if the court is satisfied of one or more of five facts or combinations of facts set out in paras (a) to (e) of s 2 (1) of the 1969 Act.

d Paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) preserve the concept of the matrimonial offence; paras (d) and (e) respectively introduce for the first time divorce by consent on a condition and divorce against the will, or without the consent, of a spouse who has or may have committed no matrimonial offence. By s 2 (3) all the former absolute or discretionary bars to a decree, which depended on conduct of the petitioner or to which the petitioner was a party, are, in effect, abolished and replaced by a single discretionary bar if, in spite of proof of facts set out in s 2 (1), the court is nevertheless satisfied that the marriage has not broken down irretrievably.

e Thus if irretrievable breakdown is established by proof of facts under paras (a), (b) or (c) the respondent's conduct will have been investigated; if it is established by proof of facts under paras (b) or (c) the conduct of the petitioner also may, but not necessarily will, have been investigated. Under paras (d) and (e) there will have been no investigation of the conduct of either party. In these circumstances it has frequently been stated judicially, and is generally accepted, that it is now unimportant, or much less important than it was previously, who obtains a decree. Questions of conduct are appropriately left to be determined on applications for ancillary relief where either party may ventilate any relevant matter subject only to the principles of res judicata or issue estoppel.

g Under the old law the basis of ancillary provision was the maintenance, usually by periodical payments, of the former wife, and broadly speaking a so-called guilty wife forfeited her right to be maintained unless a sympathetic order was made in her favour or provision for the children also involved provision for her. The extreme example of this Draconian view was a section of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1857 which remained in force until 1925 and enabled the court to order an adulterous wife, but not a husband, to settle her property for the benefit of her husband and children.

h A power to vary settlements was introduced in 1859 and to order a lump sum payment to a wife in 1963. There was no power to compel a husband to make a transfer of property, other than a payment of money, or to make a settlement. Apart from the provision of the 1857 Act that I have noted and the power to vary settlements there was no power to make permanent provision for a husband or children at the expense of a wife. In all these matters conduct, and particularly the conduct of the wife, was crucial.

i It is against that background, I think, that the construction of the 1970 Act must be approached. The relevant sections are 2, 4 and 5. Section 37 stands by itself and may be considered separately. By s 2 either party may be ordered to pay or secure periodical payments or to pay a lump sum to the other. By s 4 provision may be made under paras (a) and (b) for either party or for children by ordering either party to transfer or settle property or under paras (c) and (d) by varying, or extinguishing or reducing interests under, a nuptial settlement. a

In my view ss 2 and 4 (a) and (b) contemplate a payment or disposition by a person of money or property of which he or she is the beneficial owner. They do not contemplate a sharing of assets and I think recognise, as the House of Lords has more than once decided, that the somewhat clumsy continental concept of community of goods has no place in English property law, no doubt because for centuries the peculiarly English doctrine of trusts has enabled provision to be made for spouses and children by the more sophisticated weapon of the marriage settlement. This is, I think, confirmed by s 4 (c) and (d) which enable property in which two or more persons have beneficial interests, interests which in English law can only subsist under a trust, to be dealt with by varying, or disposing of, interests under a settlement. That said, it can no doubt also be said, using non-technical language, that when all appropriate orders have been made the result, though not the method, has been to distribute all the property owned by either of the parties among them and their children. b

Section 5 (1) governs the manner in which the powers conferred by ss 2 and 4 are to be exercised. First the court is to have regard to all the circumstances of the case including specific matters set out in paras (a) to (g), many of which by virtue of decisions of the court were taken into account under the old law, but which do not expressly include conduct, except insofar as conduct is inherent in the duration of the marriage (para (d)) and in para (f). c

At that stage the legislature might well have directed the court in quite general terms to exercise its power so as to achieve a fair, or equitable, or just (or any other synonymous epithet) division of the capital and income resources of the parties. It did not do so; it set up a specific target. The court is— d

‘so to exercise those powers as to place the parties, so far as it is practicable and, having regard to their conduct, just to do so, in the financial position in which they would have been if the marriage had not broken down and each had properly discharged his or her financial obligations and responsibilities towards the other.’ e

The same form of words is used, mutatis mutandis, in sub-s (2) dealing with orders in relation to a child, though in the vast majority of cases the financial position of a child of a subsisting marriage is simply to be afforded shelter, food and education, according to the means of his parents. f

This is indeed an elusive concept based on a difficult hypothesis. It poses three questions to be answered in relation to each party. First, what would that party's financial position have been if the marriage had not broken down, on the stated assumption? Secondly, how far is it practicable to place that party in that financial position? Thirdly, how far is it just to do so? g

In seeking to answer those questions, several considerations arise. The first two must, I think, be answered not only as at the date of decision, but looking into the foreseeable future. In almost every case it will not be practicable to place both parties in the hypothetical financial position. But it may be practicable to place one party in that position if the other is placed in an inferior position and it may be just to achieve that result. h

Some of the matters in the lettered paragraphs appear to relate to practicability, some to justice, some to both. One at least may operate both ways. A large contribution to the welfare of the family may operate favourably as a matter of conduct. But if during the marriage a wife enjoyed a beneficial financial position only by making large contributions from her own capital and/or income, the benefits she could expect, under the section, from her husband would be reduced. Conduct is mentioned, eo nomine, only in relation to the last question; but there are elements of conduct in paras (d) and (f) of the section. During the hearing a superficially attractive argument was canvassed that ‘conduct’ in its context was restricted to those elements, and did i a not embrace other aspects of matrimonial behaviour. In the end, neither counsel pressed me to adopt that view; I think rightly. But in my judgment, simply as a matter of construction, the section must mean that if a wife's conduct was found to a given extent to be worse than her husband's she would be placed in a financial position, compared with the hypothetical position, to that extent lower than his position, similarly compared. Similarly with a husband, and in such a case the husband might in the end be left worse off, in absolute terms, than his wife.

b I now turn to the three authorities. In *Wachtel v Wachtel*¹ Ormrod J, after cross-decrees under s 2 (1) (b) of the 1969 Act, had ordered a husband to pay to his wife (i) £10,000 or half the value of the matrimonial home whichever should be the less; (ii) £1,500 per annum; (iii) £500 per annum for their child. The case in the Court of Appeal² was hailed in the press as a triumph for the cause of divorced wives. By the decision of that court the husband's appeal was allowed and the wife emerged with c £6,000, £1,500 per annum and £300 per annum for the child. If, therefore, it was a triumph, it was at least tinged with Pyrrhic characteristics.

Ormrod J¹ had found as a fact that responsibility for the breakdown of the marriage rested equally on both parties and that finding was not, I think, challenged on appeal. The issues in the appeal were: (1) should the amounts ordered to be paid d to the wife, notwithstanding the finding of equal responsibility, be reduced below what would have been paid to a blameless wife because she had not been free from blame? (2) even if the order should not be so reduced, had Ormrod J¹ in all the circumstances given the wife and child too much? The Court of Appeal² answered the first question in the negative, holding that where there was equal responsibility no regard should be paid to conduct, and the second question in the affirmative e with the result that I have stated.

f 'It has been suggested that there should be a "discount" or "reduction" in what the wife is to receive because of her supposed misconduct, guilt or blame (whatever word is used). We cannot accept this argument. In the vast majority of cases it is repugnant to the principles underlying the new legislation, and in particular the 1969 Act. There will be many cases in which a wife (although once considered guilty or blameworthy) will have cared for the home and looked after the family for very many years. Is she to be deprived of the benefit otherwise to be accorded to her by s 5 (1) (f) because she may share responsibility for the breakdown with her husband? There will no doubt be a residue of cases where the conduct of one of the parties is in the judge's words⁴ "both obvious and gross", so much so that to order one party to support another whose conduct g falls into this category is repugnant to anyone's sense of justice. In such a case the court remains free to decline to afford financial support or to reduce the support which it would otherwise have ordered. But, short of cases falling into this category, the court should not reduce its order for financial provision merely because of what was formerly regarded as guilt or blame.'

h On the second question Lord Denning MR said⁵:

i 'If we were only concerned with the capital assets of the family, and particularly with the matrimonial home, it would be tempting to divide them half and half, as the judge did. That would be fair enough if the wife afterwards went her own way, making no further demands on the husband. It would be simply a division of the assets of the partnership. That may come in the future. But at present few wives are content with a share of the capital assets. Most wives want their former husband to make periodical payments as well to support them; because, after the divorce, he will be earning far more than she; and she can only keep up her standard of living with his help. He also has to make payments for the children out of his earnings, even if they are with her. In view of these calls on his future earnings, we do not think she can have both—half the capital assets, and half the earnings. Under the new dispensation, she will usually get a share of each...

‘... when the husband has available capital assets sufficient for the purpose, the court should not hesitate to order a lump sum. The wife will then be able to invest it and use the income to live on. This will reduce any periodical payments, or make them unnecessary. It will also help to remove the bitterness which is so often attendant on periodical payments. Once made, the parties can regard the book as closed. The third thing is that, if a lump sum is awarded, it should be made outright. It should not be made subject to conditions except when there are children. Then it may be desirable to let it be the subject of a settlement. In case she remarries, the children will be assured of some part of the family assets which were built up for them.’

Finally, in a paragraph headed ‘Looking at it broadly’ and summarising the effect of the court’s decision, Lord Denning MR said¹:

‘It will mean that each will have to cut down their standard of living: but it is as much as can be done in the circumstances.’

The Court of Appeal did not expressly compare the financial position of each with his and her hypothetical position had the marriage not broken down, though some such comparison may have been implicit in the reference to their standard of living in the last sentence that I have quoted.

In *Mesher v Mesher*² the Court of Appeal reversed a decision whereby Latey J had ordered the husband to transfer the matrimonial home, which was owned beneficially in equal shares, to the wife, and ordered that it should be held on trust for sale to hold the proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale for the husband and wife in equal shares with provisions designed to enable the wife to live in the house with the daughter until the latter should be 17. This, it seems to me, reproduced as nearly as possible the respective financial positions before the marriage ended. The husband owned half of the house subject to the right of the wife and daughter to live in it; the wife had the right to live in a house of which she owned a half share. The income positions were evenly balanced. The court rejected an argument that regard should be paid to the fact that it was the husband who broke up the marriage.

In *Trippas v Trippas*³ the matrimonial home had been owned beneficially in equal shares and effect had been given to those rights of property by the husband buying the wife’s share at a valuation. The furniture was divided between them by agreement; I do not know on what terms. The husband had received a lump sum and shares on the purchase under a take-over of his shares in the family business. He was ordered to pay £10,000 to his wife. The basis of the decision was that, if the marriage had not broken down, as a matter of probability the husband would have given his wife an amount of that order, and particular reference was made to s 5(1)(g) of the 1970 Act. Lord Denning MR⁴ held that a lump sum should be provided for her benefit having regard to the sale of the business. Scarman LJ⁵ said that if the parties had been living together the wife could have expected in cash or kind some sort of benefit a from the sale. The husband was stated by Lord Denning MR to have clear capital of £35,000 apart, I think, from his house, furniture and motor car. The £10,000 was just below one-third of that, but I think that it must have been substantially below one-third of his total capital assets. Further, if there had been no take-over the husband would still have had capital of very substantial value, but tied up in shares in the family company. It may be a fair inference that, but for the take-over and the £80,000 in cash that it made available to the husband, a lump sum payment would not have been ordered. But I am conscious of the danger of drawing such inferences. In that case there was nothing to choose between the conduct of the parties which, therefore, did not affect the financial disposition made.

c 1. Where the property rights of the parties are clearly ascertainable effect is to be given to them as they would have existed had there been no breakdown of the marriage.

d 2. The financial position of a wife, assuming no breakdown of the marriage, referred to in s 5 (1) of the 1970 Act, must be treated as being more than a right to live in a house, in which as a matter of property she had a limited share or even no share at all and to be maintained out of her husband's income supplemented by her own income if she has any. She must be treated as potentially entitled to benefit at some time from her husband's capital assets. Where, as a matter of probability, the time and nature of that benefit can be predicated, as in *Trippas v Trippas*¹, effect will be given to it. Where it cannot be so predicated some estimate must be made, and where the wife has no capital assets and the husband's capital is of comparatively small value, a reasonable starting point is to regard the wife as entitled at some time to about a third of that value—though as the total value increases the proportion is likely to be lower. Where the wife has some capital, that must be taken into account in determining what she should be given by the husband. It would be unlikely that she would be required to transfer capital to the husband unless her assets were substantially greater than his. On that approach the final decision on time and amount must depend on all the circumstances prescribed by the 1970 Act, in particular the time at which a wife is to receive free spendable capital will often depend on whether there are young children to be cared for.

3. Income and capital provision must be interrelated and interdependent.

g 4. It will not be just to have regard to conduct unless there is a very substantial disparity between the parties on that score. Ormrod J and the Court of Appeal in *Wachtel v Wachtel*² used the phrase 'obvious and gross'. In this phrase I think that 'gross' describes the conduct; 'obvious' describes the clarity or certainty with which it is seen to be gross. But the conduct of both parties must be considered. If the conduct of one is substantially as bad as that of the other then it matters not how gross that conduct is; they will weigh equally in the balance. In my view to satisfy the test the conduct must be obvious and gross in the sense that the party concerned must be plainly seen to have wilfully persisted in conduct, or a course of conduct, calculated to destroy the marriage in circumstances in which the other party is substantially blameless. I think that there will be very few cases in which these conditions will be satisfied.

j In the present case the husband was basically a builder, following his father's trade, though for two short periods he was employed as a schoolmaster and from September 1963 to October 1967 he was employed by Grateheat Ltd. He had a substantial claim against that company for damages for wrongful dismissal which unfortunately has proved worthless owing to the company's insolvency. Apart from that he carried on his business as a builder sometimes in his spare time and sometimes as his only occupation. I have seen the accounts of this business: the highest net profit was about £1,250; there were some fringe benefits.

In the course of his business between December 1955 and the present time the husband acquired successively five houses, the first being Queen's Ryde, Marlow, Buckinghamshire, and the last being 4 Butts Hill Road, Woodley, Berkshire, each of which became the matrimonial home. In the case of four of them, including the first and the last, he bought the land and himself, with some work done by outside contractors, built the house. Sometimes there were mortgages: each one, except 4 Butts Hill Road, of which the husband retains the freehold, was sold at a profit. 4 Butts Hill Road, the last matrimonial home, was finally completed as recently as August 1972. It is subject to a mortgage in favour of the husband's father for £5,000; its value, free from incumbrances, has been agreed at £27,000.

In November 1967 the husband was admitted to hospital to be operated on for a serious spinal complaint. He was discharged in January 1968, and for a long time afterwards was encased in plaster, which severely restricted his movements and was only gradually removed. He resumed light building work on the house in the late summer of 1968 but was not announced to be available for work until June 1969. During that period and until January 1970 he received sickness benefit of £10 per week. He was also entitled to £10 per week under an insurance policy, but there was a dispute as to the duration of his entitlement which was eventually compromised by a payment of £534.

While the husband was unfit, and also because the claim against Grateheat failed to materialise, his father paid moneys to him and on his behalf which, he said and I accept, amounted to £5,000. It is the repayment of this amount which is secured by the mortgage on 4 Butts Hill Road. It carries interest at $7\frac{1}{4}$ per cent per annum but no interest has been paid.

From January 1970 to January 1971 the husband worked as a freelance salesman at a salary of £1,600 per annum. Since September 1972 he has been employed as a sales representative and his present earnings are £1,800 per annum.

The wife is a fully trained schoolteacher. She was employed as such until 1958, when she left to start a family. For six months in 1963 she did part-time work; after the separation, from September 1969 to January 1970 she earned £900 per annum as a clerk and since then she has been in full-time employment as a teacher. Her present salary is £2,124 per annum. During the marriage she compounded her pension rights for a lump sum. These rights could be reinstated by the payment of a sum of about £600. She would then, if she continues to work until she is 60, be entitled to a pension and a lump sum payment both calculated by reference to her average salary. It is not possible to compute either the present or future value of these benefits.

During the marriage all the profits and earnings of each of the spouses were applied for the benefit of the family. Except for the asset represented by 4 Butts Hill Road neither has any savings: each of them has debts. Each of them made full contribution to the welfare of the family according to their respective resources and capabilities. I do not accept the wife's criticism that at times the husband failed to work when he was able to do so.

The final separation was sudden and tempestuous. For some eight months before June 1969 the wife (as she later admitted) had been having a ridiculous affair with a youth half her age to whom the parties had given occasional hospitality when he was a schoolboy and his parents were abroad, and who was then staying with them because his work was near. In the late evening of 27th June 1969 they were caught virtually in the act by the husband returning home unexpectedly early. He reacted understandably. He threw the boy out of the house and, after some violence, the wife also. She managed to return and stayed uneasily until 30th June 1969 when she left with the children and went to her parents. She never returned, and apart from the last five months of 1969, the children have been with her. Her association with the boy did not survive. The husband also criticised the wife for getting drunk and making herself look cheap at a new year's eve party in 1968 and as an afterthought made some unspecified criticism (which I reject) of her housekeeping. He told me that he a had some doubts as to the stability of the marriage in early 1969 but did not suspect his wife of infidelity. After the episode in June 1969 he treated the marriage as at an end because his wife had been disloyal and he could not tolerate disloyalty. Those are the husband's complaints relating to conduct.

b By her answer in the suit the wife alleged cruelty including a number of incidents of physical violence as well as the incident (admitted by the husband) of 27th June 1969. She relied on those allegations and the husband's neglect of her as conduct conducting to her adultery and in support of her cross-prayer for divorce. She gave evidence in support of those allegations before me and was cross-examined on them. Before adjudicating on this I must say a few words about the character of the parties and the impression they made on me.

c The husband has a dominant and dominating personality; yet in contrast I think that he had periods of depression and moodiness which his illness and operation intensified and which he inflicted on others. He is a perfectionist and expected high standards; but he undoubtedly lacked the gentle touch. He saw situations in clear terms of black or white with no grey. Clearly he was capable of violence, at any rate under provocation. My impression was that, quite apart from the incident of June 1969, he would be easily provoked. With some reservations I thought him a witness of truth.

d The wife is a softer personality but not lacking in determination. She knew what she wanted and how to adopt effective means of getting it. She is a master of the quietly biting retort and I have no doubt that in argument, or even in discussion, she would be exasperating. Though I have some sympathy with her, having regard to the character that I have painted of the husband, I am satisfied that her allegations against him are substantially exaggerated. I am confirmed in this because I thought e that as a witness she was generally less than frank, prone to prevarication and, as the saying goes, to swear by the book. I have great hesitation in accepting her evidence, except where it is admitted or corroborated.

f In deciding the question of conduct I do not think it necessary to make findings on the specific allegations made by the wife. I think that before 1969 the marriage was foundering, and, if any serious crisis occurred, liable to break. This was due partly to misfortune in the husband's illness, mainly to the temperaments of the parties, partly even to the passage of time. The husband conceded that he was in part responsible for the breakdown. The wife clearly behaved foolishly and reprehensibly; I think that the need she sought to satisfy was solely physical, with no intention of destroying the marriage; she simply thought—if she thought at all—that she would not be found out. This behaviour was, in my view, susceptible of forgiveness by a reasonable and loving husband, who thought his marriage worth preserving and who wanted to maintain the unity of his family. This husband did not preserve and maintain them because, in the circumstances I have mentioned, he did not think them worth it and because of his wounded pride and self esteem. I am satisfied that the conduct of the wife fell far short of being gross and obvious, certainly in comparison with that of the husband, and probably also absolutely.

g I turn to the wife's claim under s 37 of the 1970 Act. As applicable to this case, s 37 requires it to be established that the wife contributed in money or money's worth to the improvement of real property owned by the husband and that the contribution was of a substantial nature; if so, she is to be treated as having then, that is at the time of the contribution, acquired a share in the property of such an extent as seems in all the circumstances just to this court in these proceedings. In my judgment, i to satisfy the test, the contribution must be identifiable with the relevant improvement as well as substantial; mere general contributions that are brought into the reckoning under s 5 (1) (f) do not suffice; and care must be taken that the same contributions are not counted twice, once under s 5 (1) (f) and once under s 37.

The wife's case is that the relevant improvement was the building of the first house, Queen's Ryde, on freehold property and that she worked physically on the building, that she drove the builder's van, dealt with contractors, and contributed to office work connected with the building business generally. A neighbour and one of the sub-contractors gave evidence of having seen her give assistance on occasions. The husband said that she helped occasionally 'as any wife would'. On this aspect, insofar as the versions differ, I prefer that of the husband. The wife once paid £100 for building materials, but it must be remembered that all the resources of each were devoted to general family purposes; and she prayed in aid a loan of £400 from her friend, which, however, was clearly a loan to, and repaid by, the husband. The husband's cousin corrected the first version of her affidavit by deleting a reference to the wife's assistance in building. The cost of Queen's Ryde was over £2,000. I am not satisfied that the wife made a substantial contribution. I anticipate by adding that even had I taken a different view, having regard to the present financial situation, my ultimate conclusion would have been the same.

The present position is as follows. The husband owns 4 Butts Hill Road, valued at £27,000 subject to the mortgage for £5,000. It was submitted for the wife that that incumbrance should be set aside under s 16 (1) (b) of the 1970 Act; alternatively that such part of the debt as represented payments by the husband's father after the separation should be disregarded. I reject both submissions. I think that the transaction was perfectly genuine; and that if the father had not paid, in order to live the husband would have had to incur indebtedness from other sources, probably the bank, which would properly have been taken into account on a final assessment. His other debt is an overdraft of about £900. It is agreed that the house must be sold but the costs of that must be taken into account. The husband has his present salary of £1,880 per annum. He has some idea of acquiring and running a shop selling, principally, children's shoes which he thinks would bring in a larger income, but would require a substantial capital outlay even taking account of any loan he could negotiate. This scheme is very embryonic.

The wife has recently bought the house in which she is living with the children. The purchase price was £10,850. There is a first mortgage to a building society for £6,150 and a second mortgage to the bank for £3,500. The wife's mother contributed £1,000 probably as a gift. The mortgage payments are about £90 per month. The wife's salary of £2,124 per annum, even with the aid of some part-time teaching, has not been sufficient to pay those payments and keep her going and she has had to borrow from friends.

Until the date of the registrar's order the husband paid £5 per week for the children (except when they were with him); since then he has paid £8 per week. He has also paid school fees and for school clothes. His present outgoings for the children, comprising all those items, are about £1,000 per annum.

On 8th November 1971 the learned registrar ordered the husband to pay £4 a week to each of the children and also ordered the husband to settle a sum of up to £8,000 to be invested in the purchase of a suitable property to be agreed between the parties for the benefit and occupation of the children until the younger child attains 25 or both children shall have married or left home under that age, the wife to be responsible for all outgoings other than structural repairs during any period when she is occupying the property and looking after the children. Those orders were made before the wife bought her present house.

The husband submits that those orders should be affirmed, save that he offers and has always offered to increase the capital sum to the actual cost of the wife's house and, on that footing, to increase the payments to the children to £1,200 per annum, so as to include all fees and payments essential to their schooling. There would be some tax advantage in that course. The wife asks for a capital sum of £12,500 to be paid to her unconditionally. Each party submits, in the alternative, that a capital sum should be settled on the wife so that part of that sum becomes payable to her at a future date.

If the marriage had not broken down the wife would have had the right to live in a the house with no beneficial interest therein save such inchoate right to a future capital sum as is inherent in the principle established in the Court of Appeal cases I have cited and the right to be maintained, making such contribution as she could from her own earnings. The husband would own the house, subject to the wife's inchoate right, and would have been responsible for the maintenance of the wife and children with the aid of any contribution made by the wife.

b In my judgment a capital payment to the wife immediately, certainly of any sum approaching that for which she asks, would put her in a far better position, and the husband in a far worse position, than those hypothetical positions. Taking, as seems to me reasonable, £21,000 as the net value of the only capital asset, she would have nearly 60 per cent thereof and he less than 40 per cent. On the other hand, simply to give her one-third, £7,000, would leave her with a substantial mortgage to service after payment of her debts and might not safeguard the position of the children.

c In my judgment the proper course to take is to discharge both the existing orders; to order the wife to convey her new house to two trustees, one to be selected by each party, to be held on trusts hereafter mentioned; to order the husband to pay to the wife a sum of £12,500 on terms that the payment to the wife's bankers of £3,500 in discharge, or part discharge, of her indebtedness to them and to the building society of such an amount as shall be required to redeem that society's mortgage on the wife's house shall be a good discharge pro tanto of the husband's liability; and to order the husband to pay a sum of £10 per week to each child so long as all school expenses are defrayed either out of those sums or by the wife. The capital sums should be paid on a sale of 4 Butts Hill Road, and I make no order on the s 17 summons except that the house be sold by and at the expense of the husband.

e The wife's house should be held on trust for sale, with the consent or at the request of the wife, and on beneficial trusts of income for the wife and such of the children as are living during a trust period which should end on the death of the wife or earlier so soon as neither of the children shall be under 25 and unmarried; at the end of the trust period the capital should be held in trust for the husband and wife in equal shares. The trustees should be directed to permit the wife to live in the house or any substituted house during the trust period, she paying all outgoings other than structural repairs or improvements with unrestricted power of investment including power, with the consent or at the request of the wife, to buy another house as a residence for her and power to raise money on mortgage for or towards the purchase of such a substituted house or for repairs or improvements. The settlement should be in terms agreed by the respective solicitors or settled by conveyancing counsel to the court. The costs of the settlement should be paid by the wife.

f This arrangement will preserve a home for the wife and the children and will give both the husband and the wife an interest in any capital appreciation of its value. Its fairness may be tested by assuming an almost immediate end of the trust period and distribution of say £11,000 on a sale of the house: the wife would receive £5,500 which with the £1,500 she will now receive as free money would be £7,000, or one-third of the present value of the equity in 4 Butts Hill Road.

P Ltd was a wholly-owned subsidiary of C Ltd. Both companies carried on business in Brighton. Until 1966 both businesses were prosperous but thereafter profits declined; C Ltd began to incur losses. In May 1967 the companies' bank increased their overdraft facilities, and each company gave the bank an all-moneys debenture, under which the money was repayable on demand. By April 1968 C Ltd was again in need of ready money and borrowed a sum from a firm in which S was a partner; the firm took a second debenture. S became chairman of C Ltd but was not a director of P Ltd. The board of P Ltd only met for the purpose of transacting formal business; policy decisions affecting P Ltd were taken by the board of C Ltd of which all P Ltd's directors were members. On 1st August 1969 the companies' draft accounts to 2nd May 1969 were received by the bank. They revealed a serious worsening of the position. On 7th August the bank's Brighton district manager decided that, in view of the critical situation of the companies, a receiver must be appointed. For that purpose he required the authority of the bank's head office in London. On the same day, therefore, he sent a note to the head office recommending that W be appointed receiver for each of the companies. He also stated in the note that S was coming to see him the following morning when he would make formal demand on each of the companies and that he had arranged with W for the two deeds of appointment to be collected from head office the following morning. Two instruments, each dated 7th August and stamped but not sealed, were approved and signed by the assistant general manager of the bank who also approved the necessary overdraft facility for the receiver. W's assistant collected the documents from the head office early on 8th August and then proceeded to Brighton to meet W. On the same day the assistant general manager wrote to the district manager confirming that the appointment of a receiver had been sanctioned and stating that 'The Deeds of Appointment have been handed to [W's assistant] this morning in accordance with your request . . .' Meanwhile, at about 10.45 a.m. on the same morning S, together with the bank's branch manager, went to the office of the district manager who informed S of his decision to appoint a receiver. The branch manager then handed S the written demands for payment and they then left. S went to the office of the two companies and handed the demands to the company secretary some time before midday. Meanwhile W's assistant had arrived in Brighton by train and he and W reached the bank's district office at about 12.30 p.m. They saw the district manager who asked them whether they had the documents collected from the bank's head office. W's assistant then produced the envelope and handed it to the district manager^d a who passed it on to W without looking at the contents. W and his assistant then went to the bank's branch office and saw the branch manager some time between 2.15 and 2.30 p.m. There W opened a receivership account and inspected the companies' cheques which had arrived for payment; he decided that they should all be returned marked 'Receiver appointed—Refer to Drawer'. They then proceeded to the companies' office and took possession of the premises. By W's order the business was closed on 12th August. W also gave instructions for a statement of affairs to be prepared and he accepted liability for all goods received from 8th August. Subsequently C Ltd and P Ltd brought actions against W and the bank claiming that W's appointment as receiver was invalid in that it had been made before the bank had made demand for payment or, alternatively, before the companies had had an opportunity to comply with the demand.

(i) An appointment under hand took effect when the document of appointment was handed to the receiver by a person having the necessary authority in circumstances from which it might fairly be said that he was appointing a receiver, and the receiver accepted the proffered appointment, although the acceptance might be tacit. The date of the instrument was irrelevant except as a piece of evidence if the actual date of handing over was not known (see p 614 e and f and p 615 a f and g, post); Windsor Refrigerator Co Ltd v Branch Nominees Ltd [1961] 1 All ER 277 applied.

(ii) On the evidence, the instruments of appointment had been given to W's assistant in London as agent for the bank to bring them to the district office where the matter was to be finalised. They did not come to be held by W until the district manager informed W and his assistant that the demands had been made and not satisfied and released the documents by asking W's assistant for them and handing them over to W. Accordingly the appointment of W as receiver had not been effected until that moment (see p 615 j to p 616 b, post).

(iii) The appointment could not be impugned on the ground that insufficient time had been allowed to S after the demands had been made for, where money was repayable on demand, all a creditor had to do was to give the debtor time to get the money from some convenient place; he was not obliged to give the debtor time to negotiate a deal which might produce the money; in the circumstances it was clear that the companies had neither the money nor any convenient place to which they might go to get it. Accordingly the companies could not object on the ground that they were not given time to find the money or that the interval between 11 a.m. when the demand was made and midday or later when the receiver was appointed was too short (see p 616 d and p 617 a and c, post); dicta of Blackburn J in Brightly v Norton (1862) 3 B & S at 312, of Lord Cockburn CJ in Toms v Wilson (1863) 4 B & S at 453 and of Sir Barnes Peacock in Moore v Shelley (1883) 8 App Cas at 293 applied.

(iv) Furthermore it was not open to P Ltd to object to the appointment on the ground that S was not a director of that company since on the evidence it was clear that he was held out as authorised to act for both companies. In any event, any defect would have been remedied when S handed the demand to the company secretary about midday, for in the absence of certainty about the sequence of events it was to be presumed that that event had taken place before W had been received at the district office of the bank (see p 617 d and h j, post); dictum of Lord Cross of Chelsea in Eaglehill Ltd v J Needham Builders Ltd [1972] 3 All ER at 905 applied.

Actions

By writs issued on 16th February 1970 the plaintiffs, R A Cripps and Son Ltd and Cripps (Pharmaceuticals) Ltd, a wholly-owned subsidiary of R A Cripps and Son Ltd, brought separate actions against the defendants (1) Keith David Wickenden ('Mr Wickenden') and (2) National Westminster Bank Ltd ('the bank'). The plaintiff company in each action claimed, inter alia, (1) against both defendants: (i) a declaration that the purported appointment on 7th August 1969 by the bank of Mr Wickenden to be receiver and manager of the plaintiff company allegedly pursuant to a debenture dated 31st May 1967 was invalid and of no effect; (ii) a declaration that the purported appointment on 8th September 1969 by the bank of Mr Wickenden to be receiver and manager of the plaintiff company allegedly pursuant to the debenture was invalid and of no effect; (2) against Mr Wickenden: (iii) an injunction to restrain him from acting as receiver and manager of the plaintiff company pursuant to such purported appointments or either of them or at all; (iv) an order for delivery of possession of all assets and property of the plaintiff company in his possession; (v) an account of all moneys of the plaintiff company which had been received by Mr Wickenden, or any persons on his behalf, whilst purporting to act as receiver and manager of the plaintiff company under the purported appointments or either of them and of the manner in which he had applied those moneys. Both actions were heard together. The facts are set out in the judgment. f

20th November. GOFF J read the following judgment. In this case two actions were tried together. The plaintiffs in the first were R A Cripps and Son Ltd, which j a I will call 'Cripps'. The plaintiffs in the other action were Cripps (Pharmaceuticals) Ltd, a wholly-owned subsidiary which I will call 'Pharmaceuticals'. In the actions they challenge the appointment of the first defendant, Keith David Wickenden, as receiver and his conduct, which they say was done without authority, in closing down Cripps' business and selling their stock and leasehold premises and fixtures.

b Cripps were incorporated on 2nd March 1935 to take over the business of a partnership which then existed. Pharmaceuticals were incorporated much later in May 1962. Cripps were wholesalers dealing in various drugs and chemical sundries. Pharmaceuticals were manufacturers and their business was on a much smaller scale.

c Until 1966 the businesses were prosperous but their profit margin then declined and Cripps began to incur losses. Indeed they found themselves with insufficient working capital and their liquidity position was often very serious, although there was generally a credit balance, comparatively small, on Pharmaceuticals' bank account. In May 1967 when the overdraft limit allowed on the account of the two companies taken together was £55,000, a further £25,000 was required. To meet this, the second defendants, National Westminster Bank Ltd ('the bank'), increased the facility to £70,000, and the principal shareholders found £10,000 for which they took up cumulative preference shares of £1 each. The two companies gave cross-guarantees to the bank dated 26th October 1966, and each company also gave the bank an all-moneys debenture dated 31st May 1967. Clause 5 of the debentures made the money payable on the happening of any one of certain events, none of which had occurred when Mr Wickenden was appointed receiver or purported so to be. By cl 6, however, the money was made repayable on demand, which must, of course, be made before a receiver could be appointed. The relevant obligation e in the guarantee given by Pharmaceuticals was as follows: 'we guarantee, on demand in writing being made to us, the discharge of all liabilities of the Principal to the Bank'. It is agreed that under that guarantee the bank could serve a demand on Cripps and Pharmaceuticals at the same time.

f This injection of capital effected temporary relief only and Cripps was again in need of ready money in April 1968. Four of the directors borrowed an aggregate sum of £5,000 from the company's bank on a special account on their joint and several guarantees, and one of them, Mr Stapleton, also provided collateral security. A further £7,000 came from Mr Stapleton's firm, which took a second debenture, and Mr Stapleton became chairman as required by his partners. Mr Stapleton said in evidence:

g 'We borrowed from my firm because we had exhausted all resources available to the company and the directors as individuals. I hoped the business would turn round. In fact it got worse.'

h In these circumstances negotiations were opened with one of Cripps' competitors, Herbert Ferryman Ltd, a family company owned by some people named Cox, for the sale not of the undertaking but of a controlling interest in Cripps. These were conducted by Mr Stapleton, who was not a director of Pharmaceuticals although he was, of course, of Cripps, and by a Mr Yarnell, a director of both. The bank knew this was going on. On 6th June 1969 Ferrymans made an offer for 75 per cent of the preferred ordinary and ordinary £1 shares and all the shilling ordinary shares in Cripps at prices aggregating only £9,300. This offer did not include the cumulative preference shares, and was subject to certain conditions, one of which was that the loss for the year ended 30th April 1969 did not exceed £12,000. In fact it was slightly j in excess of £17,000, of which the Coxes were duly notified, and it seems they agreed to treat the £12,000 limit as if it were £18,000. I will assume that all the conditions were satisfied though I am not absolutely clear that they were. On 9th July 1969 Sangers, another competitor of Cripps, made enquiries but the directors stalled because they thought the sale to the Ferryman company would be effected. It is a significant commentary on the state of Cripps' finances that the directors were prepared to sell so much of the company's capital for only £9,300. By letter dated 30th June 1969 Mr Yarnell purported to accept the Ferryman offer on behalf of the shareholders of Cripps, although they had not been circularised. Virtually all the shareholders that mattered were directors, and they were prepared to find the 75 per cent out of their own holdings if necessary. The board regarded this letter as making a concluded contract, but even if that be right it is irrelevant because the Coxes refused to go on with the deal and so it produced no money at the crucial time. a

Events now moved very rapidly indeed. On 1st August 1969 the companies' draft accounts to 2nd May 1969 were sent to the bank and these revealed a serious worsening of the position. They showed the loss of about £17,000 and it was estimated at this time that the company was losing £2,000 a month. As a result, on 5th August the Coxes had a meeting with Mr Stokoe, the Brighton district manager of the bank, at which he required Ferrymans to give guarantees for the whole overdraft if the facilities were to be continued. This they refused to do nor were they now prepared to give personal guarantees for £25,000 which had been discussed earlier and they said that they would withdraw from the negotiations. b

Mr Stokoe wrote that same day to Mr Ellis, the Hove, Palmeira branch bank manager instructing him to write to Cripps in terms which appear in Mr Ellis's letter of 6th August 1969: c

'Dear Mr. Stapleton, R. A. Cripps & Son Ltd. With reference to our telephone conversation of yesterday, as it would now seem that Herbert Ferryman Ltd. are to break off their negotiations to take control of the Cripps companies, I write to ask for your proposals for dealing with the borrowing. In view of the disastrous results shown in the Accounts for the year ended 2nd May last and the illiquid position revealed by the Balance Sheet as at that date, it is quite apparent that the Companies must take immediate steps to put their house in order and I should like to know what action they intend to take in this direction. You will recall that when he saw Mr. Stokoe on the 16th April 1968, Mr. Yarnell indicated that, in the absence of additional finance, the only alternative would be to ask the Bank to appoint a Receiver. If this is still his view it is also that of Mr. Stokoe. The position of the Companies is extremely critical and for this reason the Bank must have their proposals as soon as possible, for they cannot be allowed to continue to lose money at the present rate. In view of the position, excesses over £70,000 must cease.' d

At or about the same time the Coxes reported to Mr Stapleton that the bank required a full guarantee which they were not prepared to give. In these circumstances Mr Stapleton got Mr Yarnell to arrange a meeting with Mr Stokoe which was appointed for 10.30 a.m. on 8th August. e

Meanwhile, as a result of the Coxes saying they would not go on, Mr Stokoe had by 7th August definitely made up his mind that a receiver must be appointed but for that purpose he needed the authority of head office. He therefore instructed his assistant, a Mr Cosson, to make the necessary arrangements and it is clear that Mr Cosson telephoned the assistant general manager's office and also sent by hand a written memorandum dated 7th August 1969. This was prepared by Mr Cosson but signed it seems by Mr Stokoe. I read two passages from this: f

'It is quite apparent that the present management are unable to solve the Companies' problems and although the Directors of Ferrymans are without doubt able men, I would not wish to look to this source for a solution bearing in mind the points mentioned above. I accordingly recommend that a Receiver be appointed for each of the Companies and in this connection that the services of Mr. K. D. Wickenden of Messrs. Thornton, Baker & Company, be utilised.' g a 'As mentioned in our telephone conversation the Chairman of the Cripps' Companies is calling on me to-morrow morning and at that time it is my intention to make formal demand on each of the Companies. I have also arranged with Mr. Wickenden for the two Deeds of Appointment to be collected from your Office to-morrow morning, following which he will call on me before going into the Companies.'

c 'Mr. Tuck telephoned on behalf of Mr. Wickenden and confirmed that he would be able to act and asked me when we would like to see him. I informed Mr. Tuck that the Deeds of Appointment would be available at Lothbury to-morrow morning and it would perhaps be more convenient if these could be collected from there, following which Mr. Wickenden and Mr. Tuck could come down to Brighton to see Mr. Stokoe before going into the Companies. This he agreed to do and said that they would be here at 11.30 a.m.-12 noon to-morrow.'

d Mr Cosson's evidence is that this was all preparation so that there would be no delay on 8th August if the company did not pay or produce acceptable proposals, and he says he asked Mr Tuck to bring the documents down to Brighton as a matter of convenience, because he was in London and had to travel down. This written memorandum was accompanied by a request for a six months' overdraft facility up to £5,000 for the receiver, the validity date being expressed to be '6.2.70.'. Much reliance was placed on the 'validity date: 6.2.70' as showing that the facility was to run from e 7th August, but I do not feel that is particularly significant. Quite apart from the fact that it should run from 8th August and not 7th August, 7th August was after all the date of the application, and I do not think I should regard it as consciously geared to the appointment taking effect on 7th August. However the general remarks on that form contain observations which do tend to support the view that the appointment was to be made at once without waiting to see if any proposals f were forthcoming. They include:

g 'It is estimated that the Companies are currently incurring losses at a rate of £2,000 per month and during the past three years the management have been unable to take steps to place the Companies' affairs on a profitable basis. It has, therefore, been decided to appoint a Receiver. Mr. K. D. Wickenden is being appointed, and to continue the business pending sale or ultimate liquidation a limit is sought for current needs on the Receiver's accounts.'

h The assistant general manager approved two instruments, one for Cripps and one for Pharmaceuticals, which he signed. They were dated 7th August and stamped on that day with a 10s deed stamp but they were not sealed, and therefore were not deeds but writings under hand only, although often referred to as deeds in the correspondence, evidence and the argument. He also approved the overdraft facility and wrote to Mr Stokoe on 8th August 1969 in these terms:

i 'Your White Form of the 7th August requesting the appointment of a Receiver and an overdraft limit of £5,000 on the Receiver's accounts has been sanctioned and is now returned. The Deeds of Appointment have been handed to Mr. K. D. Wickenden's Assistant, Mr. Tuck this morning in accordance with your request, and I understand that he is arranging to meet Mr. Wickenden in Brighton to-day. Registration of the appointment will be dealt with by Messrs. Waltons Bright & Co. and no doubt the matter will be passed to Securities & Recoveries Section of National Westminster Bank when the South-East Region commences operations shortly.'

It will be noticed that this says, 'The deeds of appointment have been handed to Mr. Wickenden's assistant this morning', not 'we are sending you the deeds'.

Mr Tuck, the defendant Wickenden's assistant, in fact collected an envelope containing these two documents from head office on the morning of 8th August and I am satisfied and find as a fact that a letter from the assistant general manager addressed to the defendant Wickenden (to the effect that, as arranged with the Brighton district office, the bank had appointed him receiver under the bank's debentures; and that the deeds of appointment were enclosed, Mr Wickenden's formal acceptance being invited) was enclosed in that envelope. Mr Tuck proceeded to Brighton by the 11 a m train from Victoria, the defendant Wickenden met him at Brighton station and they went on by car to Mr Stokoe's office.

Meanwhile, Mr Stapleton went to Mr Stokoe's office where he met Mr Ellis downstairs and they were both shortly shown in to see Mr Stokoe. There is some uncertainty as to the precise time they reached Mr Stokoe but it was not before 10.30 a m and probably about 10.45 a m. Mr Cosson, Mr Stokoe's assistant, was already present. On the instructions of Mr Cosson Mr Ellis brought with him two formal demands for payment, one for each company, already signed by Mr Ellis and addressed to the secretary in each case. It is clear that Mr Stokoe conducted the proceedings with great despatch. Mr Stapleton tried to say that the bank had previously agreed to take a limited guarantee from the Coxes and should not change its mind, but he made no impression with that. Then he says he told Mr Stokoe that he would ask the board to close the Farnham depot, and also at once open up negotiations with Sangers. Mr Stokoe cannot remember Sangers being mentioned at all. In any case he would have none of all this, and he told Mr Stapleton of the decision to appoint a receiver. I put it in that neutral way until I have reviewed the evidence on this point as there was some measure of difference in the versions given by the several witnesses. [His Lordship then considered the evidence as to what had taken place at the meeting and continued:] On this evidence I do not feel it safe to conclude that Mr Stokoe said that the receiver had already been appointed. I must look further.

At the end of this brief meeting Mr Ellis produced the written demands which were handed to Mr Stapleton. Mr Stokoe offered him a drink and after he had it, he and Mr Ellis left. They went to the place where Mr Stapleton had parked his car. He then drove Mr Ellis to the Palmeira branch of the bank, then went straight on to Portslade where he handed the demands to the company secretary, Mr Tuppen. He says that he arrived there between midday and 1 p m. He further said it had taken 20 minutes to half an hour to pick up his car and take Mr Ellis to the bank and get on to Portslade. Mr Stapleton was at first rather uncertain in his timing, which is not surprising, but at the conclusion of his evidence, in answer to a question put by me, he said that the interview including the drink lasted about half an hour in all. Mr Ellis said that the meeting lasted 15 minutes or 20 at the outside. He thought they reached his bank before 11.30 a m, he would say 11.20 a m, and that it would take five to ten minutes to get on to Portslade. Mr Stokoe said that he thought Mr Stapleton and Mr Ellis left before 11 a m. It is therefore clear, and I find, that the demands were made after 10.30 a m, probably about 10.50 a m and I am satisfied that they were handed to the company secretary before midday.

Mr Wickenden and Mr Tuck arrived at the district office at Brighton around 12.30 p m. There are considerable discrepancies in the evidence of the four witnesses as to what occurred there. Counsel for the plaintiffs stressed the conflict of evidence between Mr Wickenden and Mr Tuck on the one hand, whose evidence, though there were certain differences, largely corresponded, and Mr Cosson and Mr Stokoe on the other, and he invited me to prefer the bank's witnesses. I do not think it is really a question of preferring witnesses but of trying to reconstruct what did in fact happen from the naturally imperfect recollections of four perfectly honest witnesses. I have no doubt that Mr Cosson went to meet Mr Wickenden and Mr

a Tuck at reception, and that he asked Mr Tuck if he had got the deeds, to which Mr Tuck replied, 'Yes', and handed the envelope to Mr Cosson or possibly the documents themselves, and that Mr Cosson handed them back. Probably he looked at the documents at this stage. This seems natural as Mr Cosson would want to satisfy himself that Mr Tuck had got the documents before he took the two gentlemen in to see Mr Stokoe. I find, however, that the question of the documents was again raised by b Mr Stokoe, who asked across the table if they had got them. Mr Tuck said they had. Thereupon the envelope was produced and handed to Mr Stokoe, who passed it on to Mr Wickenden without looking at the contents. It is impossible to say whether the envelope was sealed or merely had the flap tucked in, and one cannot be certain who actually opened it; but I am satisfied that it was not opened before Mr Wickenden and Mr Tuck were received by Mr Cosson. Mr Wickenden and Mr Tuck then c went on to see Mr Ellis, and they reached him after he had returned from lunch, which he did some time between 2.15 p.m. and 2.30 p.m. There Mr Wickenden opened a receivership account and inspected cheques which had arrived for payment including one for £10,000 payable to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise. He decided that they should all be returned marked 'Receiver appointed—Refer to Drawer'.

d They then went on to Portslade and took possession of Cripps' premises, and by their orders the business was closed on 12th August. The receiver gave instructions for the statement of affairs required by s 372 (1) (b) of the Companies Act 1948 to be prepared as of 7th August and he accepted liability for all goods received from 8th August onwards. The secretary, Mr Tuppen, says he is not aware whether Mr Wickenden paid for all goods which arrived from 8th August onwards, but they were extracted and recorded separately.

e On 19th August Sangers made Mr Wickenden an offer to buy the lease for £10,000, the fixtures at book value not exceeding £11,000, and stock at valuation and in this offer they said:

f 'Should you be prepared to accept the above offer, we will immediately pay to you £70,000 as part purchase consideration which will enable you to eliminate the overdraft which you have at present with the Westminster Bank Limited.'

g Mr Wickenden accepted this offer on 21st August subject to certain modifications which were agreed by Sangers on 25th August. The stock was counted on or about 27th August and Sangers took possession of it straightaway and it was arranged that they could start selling immediately, although there was considerable argument before the price was finally settled. On or about 26th August Mr Folkes, the managing director of Sangers, attended the premises and handed a cheque for £70,000 to Mr Goodall, the managing director of Cripps, saying, 'I understand this is the amount the company owes to the bank. Perhaps this will help you.' Although the cheque was thus physically handed over by Mr Folkes, Sangers also wrote this on 27th August:

h 'Further to my letter of the 25th. August, I now enclose our company's cheque for £70,000, being part purchase consideration of the assets of R. A. Cripps & Son Limited.'

In consequence and as a result of certain receipts by Mr Wickenden the receivership account was on 8th September in credit to an amount in excess of the net overdraft, though it would not have been but for this cheque.

i Meantime Mr Stapleton had queried the validity of Mr Wickenden's appointments because the documents were dated 7th August whereas the demands were not made until 8th August. In those circumstances on 8th September the bank made or purported to make fresh appointments and in sending these to Mr Stokoe the head office said they were made 'to rectify this unfortunate error'. The plaintiffs say that because the receivership account was in credit to an amount in excess of the overdraft, these later appointments must be bad, since the bank had been paid off or must be treated as if it had. I should add that Mr Wickenden repeatedly asserted that he had been appointed on 7th August but there is no plea of estoppel, even if there could have been, and therefore this is material only as a piece of evidence relevant to the crucial question with what intention the documents were handed to Mr Tuck on 8th August. It was urged that although the accounts showed that on 7th and 8th August Cripps were short of liquid resources, the debentures were in fact amply covered, and despite the then very high rate of loss there would have been no jeopardy for possibly a year, or at least several months, so that panic measures were not necessary. The bank, it was argued, could and should have given time to Mr Stapleton to see what he could do to negotiate a sale to Sangers on a going concern basis or to sell the assets as Mr Wickenden ultimately did. On the other hand, things had for some years been going from bad to worse, and even in 1968 Mr Yarnell had visualised that in the absence of additional finance the only alternative would be to ask the bank to appoint a receiver; Ferrymans had cried off; the negotiations with Sangers had scarcely started, even if they could be said to have started at all; it is clear from the evidence that none of the directors or shareholders was prepared to put up further money. The bank may well therefore be right in saying, as it does, that it took the only possible realistic attitude, but in any case that is not the point as I see it. All I have to determine is whether what it did it did lawfully and regularly.

The first question which arises is whether the first appointments were made before the demands. Despite the date of the documents and of the stamp I am satisfied that they could not have been made on 7th August because *Windsor Refrigerator Co Ltd v Branch Nominees Ltd*¹ shows that the appointment must be communicated to the proposed receiver before it can be effective. Here the bank had taken the precaution beforehand of asking Mr Wickenden if he was prepared to act, and he said that he was, but that in my judgment is not enough. The receiver must know that he has been appointed and when, and until he is told that an appointment has actually been made he does not know this. In the present case the bank might have been persuaded to change its mind or, for all Mr Wickenden knew, the money might have been forthcoming.

The defendants' primary submission is that the true date of an appointment is the date when the receiver takes possession. They rely on Donovan LJ in the Windsor case² where he says, 'Clearly the contents of that document must be communicated at least to the receiver'. They ask who else could he have had in mind but the company itself. They also crave in aid the analogy of *Tradax SA v Volkswagenwerk AG*³, where it was held that an arbitrator is not appointed until the other party to the reference has been informed. That however on my view is not in pari materia. The appointment of a receiver is an adverse step taken against the will of the company and I do not think its time of taking effect, and possibly its very validity, can depend on the accident at what time the receiver embarks on his duties. He goes to the company not to perfect his appointment but to take possession by virtue of it. I prefer to rely on the statement of Harman LJ in the Windsor case⁴ where he said:

'Nor do I see why, if you so produce them, they should not have effect at the moment when you do produce them to the proper person, here to the receiver,' although it is fair to observe that he was not directing his mind to the question at which precise time the appointment was completed.

Alternatively, the defendants say that the appointment takes effect when the receiver accepts the office and that, they submit in this case, was at Mr Stokoe's office a when Mr Wickenden was informed that demands had been made and not met, and for the first time learnt the names of the companies involved.

I am satisfied by the Windsor case¹ that an appointment under hand takes effect when the document of appointment is handed to the receiver by a person having authority to do that and in circumstances from which it may fairly be said that he is appointing a receiver, and the receiver accepts the proffered appointment: see per Lord Evershed MR in the Windsor case²:

b 'The words are quite simple words: "appoint by writing"; and in construing them it is fair to note that the condition also empowers the debenture holders by writing to remove. For myself I should have thought that those words would be satisfied if something was done—if the person acting for the debenture holders so conducted himself that one could say that he was appointing someone to be a receiver, and if he accompanied that by handing a writing which was the company's writing to the receiver.'

d 'As to the second question, the argument is that the receiver was appointed the moment the document was signed, and so before the debt became payable. I agree that in a context where precision is not required, one might speak of the document loosely as appointing a receiver. But in this context precision is required. What the debenture holder wants to do is to levy equitable execution, and for that purpose to have some person in being clothed with the necessary authority to take possession of the company's property, to carry on its business, e to act in its name, and pay the debt; and the company has to submit to the exercise of these powers by the person having such authority. This state of affairs is not achieved simply by the debenture holder signing a document in privacy, and keeping the contents to himself for as long as he wishes. Clearly the contents of that document must be communicated at least to the receiver before his appointment can be said to be effective.'

f As to the necessity of acceptance, which is perhaps self-evident, see Kerr on Receivers⁴. The delivery of the document gives the receiver knowledge, or means of knowledge who the debtor is if he does not know already, and acceptance may, of course, be tacit. The date of the instrument is irrelevant except as a piece of evidence if the actual date of handing over is not known, because as Lord Evershed MR and Harman LJ both observed in the Windsor case⁵ it may be prepared and left until it is required.

g Then, in the present case, when were the appointments communicated and accepted? The plaintiffs answer that question, 'When Mr Tuck received the documents' which they say were handed to him as agent for Mr Wickenden. The defendants say, 'No, Mr Tuck received and held them as agent for the bank until they were released by Mr Cosson or Mr Stokoe and then the character of his holding changed'; h and they rely on *Bailey v Bodenham*⁶. There are a number of indications in favour of the plaintiffs' case but there are also a number which tell the other way and I have to decide which is the correct inference. [His Lordship then considered the evidence and continued:] Weighing all these considerations I have come to the conclusion that the proper inference is, and I hold as a fact, that the instruments were given to Mr Tuck as agent for the bank to bring them down to Mr Stokoe's office where the matter was to be finalised, and that they did not come to be held by Mr Wickenden or alternatively by Mr Tuck as his representative until Mr Stokoe informed them that the demand had been made and not satisfied and released the documents by asking for them and handing them over, and that the appointment was not complete until then. It is conceivable, though I do not think so, that one ought to take the earlier moment when Mr Cosson took the instruments and returned them in the vestibule, but that would make no difference. In my judgment therefore the appointments dated 7th August and made at Mr Stokoe's office on 8th August are prima facie valid, but two other points have to be considered. First, was sufficient time allowed after the demand had been made? and, secondly, were the demands not properly made because Mr Stapleton was not a director of Pharmaceuticals, which latter point could only avail that company?

It was argued by the plaintiffs that even where money is payable on demand, still a reasonable time must be given to enable the payment to be made: see *Brighty v Norton*¹, *Toms v Wilson*², and *Upjohn J in Lloyds Bank Ltd v Margolis*³. Much was made of the speed with which Mr Stokoe acted, and it was said that he never really gave the company any chance to put up proposals in answer to the letter of 6th August; but in my judgment, that is not the point. The question is whether he gave such time as the law requires where money is payable on demand; and the cases show that all the creditor has to do is to give the debtor time to get it from some convenient place, not to negotiate a deal which he hopes will produce the money. I quote from *Blackburn J in Brighty v Norton*⁴:

'I agree that a debtor who is required to pay money on demand, or at a stated time, must have it ready, and is not entitled to further time in order to look for it.'

Then he went on to deal with the question of the true construction of the proviso in the particular deed in that case which enabled the creditor to curtail a period loan. The significant words for present purposes are in the opening sentence of his judgment which I have just read. The principle is well stated by Lord Cockburn CJ in *Toms v Wilson*⁵ in a passage adopted by the Privy Council in *Moore v Shelley*⁶. Sir Barnes Peacock delivering the opinion of the Board said⁷:

'The case of *Toms v. Wilson*², which was cited in the Court below (there is a similar case in the 3rd Best and Smith⁸), is an authority to shew that there was no default to justify the seizure. It may, therefore, be well to refer to what Lord Chief Justice Cockburn⁴ says in that case: "We are all of opinion," he says, "that by the terms of the bill of sale the plaintiff was under an obligation to pay immediately upon demand in writing, and if he did not, then the defendants were entitled to take possession of and sell the goods. Here such a demand was made. The deed must receive a reasonable construction, and it could not have meant that the plaintiff was bound to pay the money in the very next instant of time after the demand, but he must have a reasonable time to get it from some convenient place. For instance, he might require time to get it from his desk, or to go across the street or to his bankers for it . . ."

a It is abundantly plain that Cripps had not got the money and had no convenient place to which they could go to get it. Two passages in the evidence will suffice here. First, Mr Stapleton in chief said:

b 'At one time Mr Stokoe asked if there was any more money likely to be coming from me or anyone else. He asked, "from me". Can't really say if he said, "or others". There were others who helped put up the earlier money. I replied as far as I was concerned I was not prepared to do anything. I did not say I thought someone else would. In fairness I could not have led him to think any likelihood of money coming from anywhere else.'

c Secondly, Mr Yarnell in cross-examination was asked this question: 'Apart from a sale to someone who might put in money, what other sources of further capital were available?' and he answered: 'No immediate sources.'

In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiffs cannot object on the ground that they were not given time to find the money or that the interval of time between 11 a.m., or shortly before, when the demands were made and midday, or later, when the receiver was appointed was too short.

d In my judgment the objection by Pharmaceuticals on the ground of want of authority in Mr Stapleton also fails since it is clear in my view that he was held out as authorised to act for both companies. In the first place the directors of Pharmaceuticals actually passed a resolution as follows:

e 'It was agreed that Resolutions affecting the conduct of the business of Cripps (Pharmaceuticals) Ltd. recorded in the Minutes of the Directors' Meeting of R.A. Cripps & Sons Ltd. shall as appropriate be deemed to be resolutions of Board Meetings of Cripps (Pharmaceuticals) Ltd.'

f Secondly, apart from a formal meeting once a year to deal with purely formal business immediately before the annual general meeting and possibility one or two meetings on other occasions for routine administrative acts, the board of Pharmaceuticals never met at all. All its directors were also directors of Cripps, though Cripps had other directors as well, and the policy and management of Pharmaceuticals was left to that board. Thirdly, in all the exchanges with the bank it was never once suggested that Mr Stapleton had no authority from Pharmaceuticals and the basis on which he approached the bank and in particular at the critical interview with Mr Stokoe on 8th August appears very clearly from this passage in his evidence:

g 'The question whether I had any authority from Pharmaceuticals did not enter my head. I was chairman of the board of Cripps. Borrowing was lump sum, i.e. limits for both companies, and Pharmaceuticals were a wholly-owned subsidiary.'

h Even if that be wrong, however, the defect was remedied when Mr Stapleton handed the demand to Mr Tuppen round about midday and the appointment was also round about midday when Mr Wickenden and Mr Tuck called on Mr Stokoe. The time interval here is short but I find that this letter reached the secretary before Mr Tuck and Mr Wickenden were received at Mr Stokoe's office even by Mr Cosson. In any case at best for the plaintiffs the timing cannot really be determined with any certainty, and that being so I ought to hold that the demand came first on the authority of *Eaglehill Ltd v J Needham Builders Ltd*¹, where Lord Cross of Chelsea said:

i 'The presumption for which the appellants contend may be expressed as follows: "If two acts have been done one of which ought to have been done after the other if it was to be valid and the evidence which could reasonably be expected to be available does not show which was done first they will be presumed to have been done in the proper order." Such a presumption would not be—as was suggested in argument—an application of the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta for it is abundantly clear that the posting of the notice on 30th December was wholly irregular. It would be an extension into another field of the maxim that a document which is reasonably capable of two constructions should be construed ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Such an extension appears to me to be justified—at all events in the case of commercial documents such as those with which we are here concerned.

On this basis the interval between demand and appointment is still shorter but not, I think, unreasonable having regard to the passages in the evidence to which I have drawn attention. In my judgment therefore both actions fail and must be dismissed.

In these circumstances it is not really necessary to say anything about the appointments of 8th September as they would only be material if the earlier ones had been bad, but in case the matter should go further, and as the subject was much canvassed, I think I should add a few words on this aspect of the case. In my judgment the plaintiffs cannot claim the first appointments were bad and at the same time say the second were bad also on the ground that the bank had by sale under the first raised enough to pay off the overdraft. The two are inconsistent and mutually exclusive. Therefore in my view it matters not whether the deposit was returnable or whether Sangers got no title against the company. The contract might indeed be good as between Sangers and the company by estoppel if on no other grounds. As it seems to me, if I had held the first appointments bad I would have had to have found the second appointments to be bad also, because no person can take advantage of his own wrong. In my judgment the bank could not appoint a receiver until it had restored the company to possession of its assets and renewed its demands.

If it could not do that because it had sold the assets, then there might be a serious question whether it had forfeited its right altogether, or would be entitled to appoint a receiver after restoring the proceeds, the company having an action for damages for conversion for any loss not recouped by return of the proceeds, but the bank never affected to do anything of the sort and I need not pursue that further. Even if that were wrong and the second appointments were good still the bank would be liable for damages down to 8th September for the first wrongful appointments, and that would include damages for loss of the opportunity to avoid the second appointments occasioned by the wrongful freezing of the assets under the first. This might or might not produce the same result. As I have said, however, on my findings as to the first appointments these questions do not arise.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

b 26th FEBRUARY 1973

Practice – Reference to referee – Power to order trial before official referee – Exercise of power – Absence of appeal from referee on questions of fact – Pleadings raising allegations of importance to party – Trial before judge providing opportunity for Court of Appeal to review findings of fact – Party entitled to trial before judge.

c The plaintiffs were manufacturers and suppliers on a large scale of a special type of tubing for use in gas central heating systems. They brought an action against the defendants for goods sold and delivered. The defendants put in a defence and counter-claim alleging that the tubing was not suitable for its purpose. The case was ordered to be heard by an official referee against whose decision there was, by virtue of RSC
d Ord 58, r 5 (1), no appeal on the questions of fact raised by the action. The plaintiffs appealed.

Held – The question raised by the proceedings affected the plaintiffs' standing as a supply company; it was of such importance to them that they were entitled to trial by a judge so that the facts could be reviewed on appeal by the Court of Appeal. Accordingly the appeal would be allowed.

Interlocutory appeal

g This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, Simplicity Products Co (a firm), against the order of Forbes J made on 24th November 1972 dismissing the plaintiffs' appeal against the order of Master Harwood whereby, on an application by the defendants, Domestic Installations Co Ltd, it was ordered that the plaintiffs' action against the defendants should be transferred to the official referee. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

P Sheridan for the defendants.

LORD DENNING MR. In 1969 the Gas Council initiated a plan for installing central heating on a large scale in houses. It was called the 'Guaranteed Warmth Fixed Price System'. In order to implement it, it was necessary to have supplies of tubing and so forth. Copper tubing was very expensive. So a company called Simplicity Products Co produced a tubing which was made of mild steel and was zinc-plated. They also produced tins of solder paint. They supplied these materials to contractors who did the installation in the various houses. One such contractor was Domestic Installations Co Ltd who installed the system in many houses.

This is an action by Simplicity Products for £1,868 for goods sold and delivered. Domestic Installations defend the claim and put in a counterclaim. They say that the tubing and the paint was not suitable for the purpose; that it gave rise to a great deal of trouble in many of the homes in which they were fitted. They say that there were 2,300 houses and flats in which the installation turned out to be defective. They further say that the plaintiffs made representations which were not fulfilled. The plaintiffs have put in a reply in which they claim to be protected by the terms of a guarantee. Furthermore the plaintiffs say the trouble was caused by the bad workmanship of the workmen who actually did the installations.

The question here today is how the case should be tried. The master and the judge have decided that it should go to an official referee. The plaintiffs, Simplicity Products, appeal to this court. They object to an official referee because from his decision there is no appeal on a question of fact; there is only an appeal on a point of law. RSC Ord 58, r 5 (1), provides:

'An appeal shall lie to the Court of Appeal—(a) from a decision of an official referee on a point of law; and (b) from a decision of an official referee on a question of fact relevant to a charge of fraud or breach of professional duty.'

This case is not within para (b). So from an official referee there would be no appeal on a question of fact. The plaintiffs say that the allegation against them raises matters of the highest importance for them. They would wish, if the findings of fact went against them, for them to be reviewed in the Court of Appeal.

The question of trial by a judge or by an official referee was considered by the House of Lords in *Charles Oseinton & Co v Johnston*¹. In that particular case, estate agents were charged with negligence and their reputation was involved. The House of Lords ordered the case to be tried by a judge and not by an official referee. The considerations which influenced the House of Lords in that case apply to this case also. Here the question is as to the suitability of a product which was manufactured and supplied by the plaintiffs on a large scale. It affects their standing as a supply company. The issues are very proper to be tried by a judge alone and reviewed if need be by the Court of Appeal.

Counsel for the defendants stressed certain advantages before an official referee: such as that he himself holds the summons for directions; he has himself a control over the course of proceedings; he can have a view and so forth. But those advantages do not outweigh the serious disadvantage of there being no appeal on fact. The questions here are of such importance to the parties that they should be tried by a judge alone. They should not be remitted to an official referee. I therefore would allow the appeal.

STAMP LJ. I agree and have nothing to add.

JAMES LJ. I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

b Magistrates – Jurisdiction – Binding over – Natural justice – Acquitted defendant – Opportunity to make representations – Defendant bound over to keep the peace – Defendant neither warned of proposed binding-over order nor given opportunity to make representations – Whether order should be set aside as being made in breach of rules of natural justice.

The defendant was charged before justices with using insulting behaviour whereby a breach of the peace was likely to be occasioned. Having considered their verdict c the justices told the defendant that the charge against him was dismissed and the chairman of the Bench went on to inform the defendant that he was bound over to keep the peace for 24 months in his own recognisance of £100. On a motion to quash the binding-over order the defendant contended that it had been made in breach of the rules of natural justice in that he should have been given an opportunity to make representations against the proposed order before it was made.

d Held – Although justices were required to inform a person who was before them as a complainant or witness that it was proposed to make a binding-over order against him and to give him an opportunity of being heard, no such rule applied in the case of an acquitted defendant and accordingly the motion would be dismissed (see p 623 d e f and h, post).

Motion for certiorari

h By notice of motion dated 28th November 1972 Stephen Jeremy Gossage applied for an order of certiorari to quash an order of the justices for the petty sessional division of Woking made on 10th October 1972 that he be bound over to keep the peace for 24 months in his own recognisance of £100. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Widgery CJ.

Stephen Sedley for the applicant.

j The respondents did not appear and were not represented.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. In these proceedings counsel moves on behalf of the applicant, Stephen Jeremy Gossage, for an order of certiorari to remove into this court for the purpose of its being quashed an order made by justices for the petty sessional division of Woking on 10th October 1972, whereby it was ordered that the applicant be bound over to keep the peace for 24 months in his own recognisance of £100.

The facts are that on 10th October, before the Woking justices, this applicant and others were charged that at Woking on a Saturday in September 1972, the applicant used insulting behaviour whereby a breach of the peace was likely to be occasioned, contrary to s 5 of the Public Order Act 1936. The other defendants were charged in the same terms. The applicant was not legally represented at the hearing; the case was heard out in the ordinary way, and no complaint is made about the conduct of the trial or any deprivation of the appropriate rights and facilities for the applicant in the course of the trial. The justices retired to consider their decision, and when they came back they convicted one of the other defendants, a man called Bullock, and fined him £2. They told the applicant and the third defendant, Mr Larter, that the charges against them were dismissed, and then the chairman of the Bench went on to inform the applicant, amongst others, that he was to be bound over to keep the peace for two years in his own recognisance of £100, and he was asked if he understood what that meant. He understood what was meant, but asked what would happen if he did not acknowledge his obligation, and it was then explained to him that a prison sentence might result.

To put it briefly, that information having been given to him by the Bench, he entered into the recognisance and this court is moved today to set aside the decision of the Bench requiring the entry into the recognisance on the footing that there was a breach of natural justice.

The breach of natural justice is alleged to be that the justices when they returned to court to announce the acquittal of the applicant, should have told him that they were nevertheless minded to consider a binding-over, and then given him an opportunity of making any representations which he wished against that conclusion. The Bench did not give him that opportunity, and that is the substance of the complaint. We need not go back over the old authorities to establish the fact that the justices' ancient power to bind over applies to all persons who are before the court, whether as parties or as witnesses, and that the fact that a defendant is acquitted of the charge against him is no bar to the justices binding him over to keep the peace. There are many instances, where, although the offence is not adequately proved, the conduct of the defendant has, in the opinion of the Bench, justified that use of preventive justice. One can pick up the justices' power in the most recent authority of all, *Sheldon v Bromfield Justices*¹. In that case there was a charge brought by the police against a man called Marshall; the charge was that he had assaulted his mother-in-law and thereby occasioned her actual bodily harm. On the hearing of the charge, the mother-in-law and her husband gave evidence for the prosecution. It was one of those not unfamiliar domestic cases in which the son-in-law was blaming the mother-in-law and the father-in-law collectively for the disturbance which had occurred, and the mother-in-law and the father-in-law were blaming the son-in-law, and saying he was responsible.

At the end of the case, the justices dismissed the charge against the son-in-law, he being the only person who had been charged, and they then proceeded to bind over not only the defendant, the son-in-law, but the two appellants in that case, the father-in-law and the mother-in-law as well. It is interesting to note that Lord Parker CJ, giving the leading judgment, said²:

'At the end of the case, the justices dismissed the charge and bound over not only the defendant son-in-law, which they were fully entitled to do, but also the two appellants, Mr. and Mrs. Sheldon . . .'

In that case the son-in-law did not appeal; the prosecution witnesses, the father and mother-in-law, were the ones who did appeal and they appealed on the same basis as the applicant applying to the court today, because it was said they were not given any warning before being bound over that the justices had a binding-over in mind.

a Lord Parker CJ, having recited the arguments and the contention that there was no obligation on justices to give any such warning at all in the context of that case where the two persons bound over were witnesses only, said¹:

b 'I must say that I shudder at the idea that that can be done, although it is said that it is done quite generally. It seems to me to be elementary justice that particularly a mere witness before justices should at any rate be told what is passing through the justices' minds, and should have an opportunity of dealing with it.'

c That case is undoubtedly authority for the proposition that in regard to the complainant and the witnesses, if the justices are minded to bind over, they must give the intended recipient of the binding-over an opportunity of being heard. But what that case is not directly authority for is the position of justices who contemplate binding over an acquitted defendant. I have already drawn attention to the fact that Lord Parker CJ seems to have been of the opinion that no difficulty arose about binding over the son-in-law in that case. But, of course, he was not concerned with the point that arises before us, and we have to deal with it, one gathers, for the first time.

d It seems to me that a very clear distinction is drawn between, on the one part, persons who come before the justices as witnesses, and on the other, persons who come before the justices as defendants. Not only do the witnesses come with no expected prospect of being subjected to any kind of penalty, but also the witnesses as such, although they may speak in evidence, cannot represent themselves through counsel and cannot call evidence on their own behalf. By contrast, the defendant comes before the court knowing that allegations are to be made against him, knowing that he can be represented if appropriate, and knowing that he can call evidence if he wishes. It seems to me that a rule which requires a witness to be warned of the possibility of a binding-over should not necessarily apply to a defendant in that different position.

e I think from the extracts from Lord Parker CJ's judgment that I have read, Lord Parker CJ would have taken the same view; but, be that as it may, it seems to me to be putting it far too high in the case of an acquitted defendant to say that it is a breach of the rules of natural justice not to give him an indication of the prospective binding-over before the binding-over is imposed. That is not to say that it would not be wise, and indeed courteous in these cases for justices to give such a warning; there certainly would be absolutely no harm in a case like the present if the justices, returning to court, had announced they were going to acquit, but had immediately said 'We are however contemplating a binding-over; what have you got to say?' I think it would be at least courteous and perhaps wise that that should be done, but I am unable to elevate the principle to the height at which it can be said that a failure to give such a warning is a breach of the rules of natural justice. I would accordingly refuse the application.

Appeals

The appellants, Samuel Ian Chapman and Bernard James Baldwin, appealed against their convictions in the Crown Court at Winchester on 9th June 1972 before his Honour Judge McCreery and a jury. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Florence O'Donoghue for the appellants.

N R Blaker QC and M R Selfe for the Crown.

Cur adv vult

16th February. ROSKILL LJ read the following judgment of the court. These two appeals, brought by leave of the single judge, raise an important question of law in relation to the proper direction to be given to a jury regarding corroboration of evidence from an accomplice. We use the word 'corroboration' for convenience, though we have well in mind the observation of Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC, in the recent case of *Director of Public Prosecutions v Kilbourne*¹, that the word is not a term of art and is slightly unusual in common speech and that it might be better not to use it.

The appellant Chapman was convicted at Winchester Crown Court after a long trial before Judge McCreery on three counts of theft, counts 1, 2 and 4. The appellant a Baldwin was similarly convicted on 15 counts of dishonest handling, counts 8–22. The learned judge sentenced Chapman to a total of 30 months' imprisonment and Baldwin to a total of three years' imprisonment.

b All the charges arose out of alleged theft and dishonest handling of large quantities of clothing belonging to the Portland branch of a firm called Greenburgh Bros Ltd, of which Chapman was the manager. The main evidence against these two men was given by a man named Thatcher, who was plainly an accomplice, but it is important to observe that Thatcher's evidence only related directly to counts 1 and 2 in the case of Chapman and to counts 8–12 inclusive in the case of Baldwin.

c The prosecution case was that in September 1971 it had been decided to close the Portland branch and Chapman was instructed to transfer property from the Portland branch to the Plymouth branch. On 21st September he reported that the company's van, loaded with goods ready to be taken to Plymouth, had disappeared from outside his house. When the van was later found most of the clothing had disappeared from it. He gave the police statements specifying in detail certain items which had been stolen to a total value of £2,171.

d On 26th September a further stocktaking revealed that, taking into account all known transactions, there was a gross deficiency of £4,515 worth of stock. According to cash sale returns which Chapman had made, there had only been £258 worth of cash sales between the stocktaking in January 1971 and the second stocktaking in September 1971: and Chapman had sent in no weekly cash summaries after 31st August. Various customers gave evidence that, when they had bought goods from Chapman over the counter, he provided change out of his own pocket, gave no receipts, and did not put the money in the till. Chapman's explanation was that he did not give receipts because his predecessor had done the same thing, and he did not put the cash into the till because it was not convenient to do so.

e Chapman was very friendly with Baldwin. These two men would gamble together and Baldwin admitted that he had sold various items of clothing which resembled those sold by Greenburgh's shop. The prosecution case was that Chapman had stolen various items and passed them on to Baldwin, who disposed of them dishonestly and that Chapman arranged the stealing of items from his van in order to cover up the deficiency which he had created.

f It is only necessary to add to that brief summary of the facts that count 4 was what might be called a general deficiency count. It alleged theft of the balance of the stock of clothing beyond those specified items covered by count 1.

g The defence was, inter alia, that Thatcher was lying and, according to Chapman, must himself have stolen the contents of the van. Thatcher had two previous convictions for theft, but it is only fair to point out that the second was as long ago as 1964. Clearly the case was one which required a warning from the judge as to the dangers of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice. The Crown had suggested that some corroboration in relation to count 1 was to be found in the evidence of Mrs Jesty, a prosecution witness, but the learned judge, rightly in the view of this court, suggested in the summing up that the jury should ignore Mrs Jesty's evidence.

h The judge warned the jury that they should look for corroboration and he used this phrase, 'because it is dangerous to act on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice'. Thus, the usual warning was properly given. But the learned judge, having advised the jury to reject Mrs Jesty's evidence, then went on to direct the jury in these terms:

j 'But corroboration can come not only from witnesses for the prosecution, but from witnesses for the defence—or from the accused themselves, and I direct you as a matter of law, if you think it right, there is abundant evidence here from the defence which is capable of corroborating Thatcher. You have got to decide, in due course, what weight you attach to the evidence of each of the accused. If you think that Chapman's story about the disappearance of the van and its contents is so obviously untrue that you do not attach any weight to it at all—in other words, you think Chapman is lying to you—then I direct you that that is capable of corroborating Thatcher, because, members of the jury, if Chapman is lying about the van, can there be any explanation except that Thatcher is telling the truth about how it came to disappear? Whether you regard that as corroboration is a matter for you. My direction is that it is capable in law of corroborating Thatcher. Similarly, in the case of Baldwin, if you think that Baldwin's story about going up to London and buying these goods in Petticoat Lane is untrue—in other words he has told you lies about that—then, members of the jury, that I direct you, so far as he is concerned, is capable of amounting to corroboration of Thatcher. So, members of the jury, I repeat: in each case I direct you, as a matter of law, there is evidence capable of corroborating Thatcher. Whether you think so, is entirely a matter for you.'

Later in his summing up the learned judge repeated the direction which I have just read in these terms:

'Members of the jury, I say it for the third time [in fact I think it was the second] Thatcher is a very important witness. He is an accomplice. Approach his evidence with great care and look for corroboration. If you find that Chapman's story is a pack of lies, that, so far as the case against him is concerned, is capable of amounting to corroboration. It is for you to decide whether it does or not. Similarly, if you find that Baldwin's story about Petticoat Lane is a pack of lies, then that is capable of corroborating the case against him, so far as he is concerned. That is the approach, members of the jury, and that is the task you have to resolve.'

Counsel for the Crown told us that there had been no previous indication from the learned judge that he proposed to give this direction, nor had he invited help from counsel what the direction was which he ought properly to give. After the judge had concluded his summing up he asked counsel in the presence of the jury if any of them wished to raise any point on the summing up. Leading counsel for Baldwin in the court below (J H Inskip QC) at once challenged the direction I have just read, but the learned judge said that he had given his ruling and if it was wrong it could be put right.

This court feels bound to observe that it is a pity that if the judge were minded to give this direction he did not first inform counsel of that fact and then allow them to seek to challenge it before it was given. It was difficult for counsel effectively to challenge the direction after it had been given in such emphatic terms. Had he done so the judge might have avoided falling into the serious error which he made.

No member of this court has ever heard of a direction on corroboration in the terms in which the learned judge gave it. Indeed, if the learned judge were right, on a charge of alleged rape the jury could properly be told that if they rejected a defendant's evidence that the prosecutrix consented, that rejection was capable of constituting corroboration of her evidence that there was no consent and that they need go no further.

In the view of this court the learned judge's direction was wrong, both on principle and on authority, to none of which was his attention drawn. It was wrong in principle for this reason: if the question is whether A's evidence or B's evidence is true, the mere rejection of B's evidence does not of itself mean that A's evidence must be accepted as true. B might have a separate and independent reason for lying or otherwise giving unreliable evidence or evidence which is for some reason incapable of belief. Mere rejection of evidence is not affirmative proof of the contrary of the evidence which has been rejected.

a The most recent decision on this question is *Tumahole Bereng v R*¹, a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which included both Lord MacDermott and Lord Reid. It is not necessary to relate the complex facts of that case. Lord MacDermott, delivering the opinion of the Board, said²:

b 'The circumstances that the appellants (other than No. 2) elected not to give evidence is equally incapable of constituting corroboration, though on more general grounds. Silence on the part of an accused person which is tantamount to an admission by conduct may, on occasion, amount to corroboration. But an accused admits nothing by exercising at his trial the right which the law gives him of electing not to deny the charge on oath. Silence of that kind—and it is the only kind relevant to this appeal—affords no corroboration to satisfy the rule of practice under consideration. Nor does an accused corroborate an accomplice merely by giving evidence which is not accepted and must therefore be regarded as false. Corroboration may well be found in the evidence of an accused person; but that is a different matter, for there confirmation comes, if at all, from what is said, and not from the falsity of what is said. It is, of course, correct to say that these circumstances—the failure to give evidence or the giving of false evidence—may bear against an accused and assist in his conviction if there is other material sufficient to sustain a verdict against him. But if the other material is insufficient either in its quality or extent they cannot be used as a make-weight. To hold otherwise would be to undermine the presumption of innocence in a manner as repugnant to the Proclamation of 1938 as to the common law of England.'

e That passage is, of course, not strictly binding on this court, but this is the highest persuasive authority. For some reason that decision is not cited in Archbold³.

Two years later in *Credland v Knowler*⁴ Lord Goddard CJ, delivering the judgment of the Divisional Court, treated as axiomatic the proposition that the fact that a defendant's evidence ought to be rejected did not of itself amount to corroboration. The learned Lord Chief Justice went on to refer to a judgment of the Lord President (Lord Dunedin) in the First Division of the Inner House in *Dawson v M'Kenzie*⁵, later approved by the Divisional Court in *Jones v Thomas*⁶.

f Reference to the report of *Dawson v M'Kenzie*⁵ shows that the learned Lord President was himself founding on an earlier decision of the Second Division of the Inner House in *Macpherson v Largue*⁷. This, like *Dawson v M'Kenzie*⁵ and *Jones v Thomas*⁶, was a bastardy case. Corroboration was required by statute. The putative father's evidence had been rejected both by the sheriff-substitute and by the sheriff. There was other evidence capable of being corroboration. When the appeal came before the Second Division of the Inner House the learned Lord Justice-Clerk said⁸:

g 'I agree that no corroboration can be derived from evidence of the defender which shews he is not speaking the truth. If his evidence is not to be believed it must be taken out of the case altogether, and the case must be treated as if he had not been examined.'

h Lord Trayner said⁹:

'On the other hand, the denial by the defender of material facts or circumstances

(although not believed) does not corroborate the pursuer's statement. A false statement, or a statement not believed, by whomsoever made, is not corroboration of anything else. But if the pursuer is corroborated as to material statements made by her, and as to which she is contradicted by the defender, his denial, if proved false, or not believed, may give a complexion to the whole evidence, adverse to the defender, different from what it would have borne had his denial not been disbelieved or shewn to be false.'

Lord Moncrieff agreed. This is a clear Scottish decision that mere rejection of a defendant's evidence is not corroboration of the otherwise uncorroborated evidence against him. In the learned Lord Justice-Clerk's words¹: 'If [the] evidence is not to be believed it must be taken out of the case altogether'. Once so taken out it plainly cannot be used as corroboration.

'The modern doctrine [that is plainly, in the context, the modern doctrine relating to corroboration]—and the modern doctrine owed its introduction to the alteration of the old law under which the parties were not competent witnesses—was first laid down in the case of *M'Bayne*³, and perhaps the best expression of it was that given in a more recent decision by the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner in the case of *Macpherson*⁴, with which I entirely concur. The outcome of it is this, that there must be something more than the pursuer's own statement, and that that something must amount to corroboration. Now, the mistake which the learned Sheriff had made here is in taking the mere proof of opportunity as amounting to corroboration. Mere opportunity alone does not amount to corroboration, but two things may be said about it. One is, that the opportunity may be of such a character as to bring in the element of suspicion. That is, that the circumstances and locality of the opportunity may be such as in themselves to amount to corroboration. The other is, that the opportunity may have a complexion put upon it by statements made by the defender which are proved to be false. It is not that a false statement made by the defender proves that the pursuer's statements are true, but it may give to a proved opportunity a different complexion from what it would have borne had no such false statement been made. I am really only repeating in other words what was said by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of *Macpherson*⁵.'

The learned Lord President went on to quote the words that the learned Lord Justice-Clerk had used. Lord M'Laren, whose opinion followed, said⁶:

'I concur in your Lordship's opinion, and it is hardly necessary to add anything. It is a very common state of the evidence in such cases as this that the pursuer's case depends only upon her own evidence, with a certain amount of corroboration as to opportunities, and then the question of fact arises whether these opportunities were such as to raise legal grounds of suspicion, or were merely of the nature of innocent meetings between man and woman. I think that in this class of cases the law laid down by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of *Macpherson*⁴ comes to be of importance, because I agree with his Lordship that it is not sufficient corroboration if you merely displace the evidence of the defender and show that he has made false statements. There must be corroboration of the pursuer's evidence; yet when the effect of the defender's false evidence, i.e., his denial of circumstances which are otherwise proved, is to show that there is something of which he is ashamed, or something the

- a admission of which he conceived would throw suspicion upon himself, this will put a different complexion on what the Court might otherwise be disposed to regard as innocent intimacy between the parties.'

Lord Kinnear agreed. As already stated, Lord Dunedin's opinion was expressly approved by the Divisional Court in *Jones v Thomas*¹.

- b Those two decisions of the Inner House are in precise accord with the passages from the opinion of the Board in *Tumahole*², though neither decision nor *Jones v Thomas*¹ appears to have been cited in argument before the Judicial Committee and *Tumahole*² does not appear to have been cited to the Divisional Court in *Credland v Knowler*³. Curiously enough this point seems never to have arisen for direct decision by the Court of Appeal in this country either in a civil or criminal case. But this court has no doubt both on principle and authority that the statements quoted are
- c correct and respectfully adopts them all.

As already mentioned, *Tumahole*² finds no place in Archbold⁴, but it is mentioned by Professor Cross in his book on Evidence⁵. The learned author, after citing the passage already quoted from *Tumahole*⁶, goes on to say:

- d 'There is nothing in the context which suggests that this dictum is only applicable to the testimony of an accomplice, and there can be no doubt that it is generally true of all cases in which corroboration must be sought.'

This court respectfully agrees with and adopts that passage. Professor Cross then continues⁵:

- e 'There is, however, room for some debate whether it is universally valid. We shall see that demonstrable lies out of court may amount to corroboration of the case against the person who tells them, and there is no obvious reason why lies of a certain type told in the evidence of the defendant or accused should not have a similar effect. The contrivance of a falsehood can sometimes only be explained on the footing that its contriver is anxious to conceal his guilt, but this is not always so.'

- f The learned author does not there mention the two Scottish decisions to which we have referred which, as we think, state the position with precise accuracy though he does cite *Dawson v M'Kenzie*⁷ lower down on the same page⁵ in a different connection. There is no doubt that a lie told out of court is capable in some circumstances of constituting corroboration, though it may not necessarily do so. There may be an explanation of the lie which will clearly prevent it being corroboration: see, for example, *R v Clynes*⁸.
- g

- h But, in the view of this court, there is a clear distinction in principle between a lie told out of court and evidence given in the witness box which the jury rejects as incapable of belief or as otherwise unreliable. Proof of a lie told out of court is capable of being direct evidence, admissible at the trial, amounting to affirmative proof of the untruth of the defendant's denial of guilt. This in turn may tend to confirm the evidence against him and to implicate him in the offence charged. But a denial in the witness box which is untruthful or otherwise incapable of belief is not positive proof of anything. It leads only to the rejection of the evidence given, which then has to be treated as if it had not been given. Mere rejection of evidence is not of itself affirmative or confirmatory proof of the truth of other evidence to the contrary. a

For these reasons we are clearly of the view that the learned judge's direction on corroboration was wrong and cannot be supported. It is, of course, always open to a jury to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice, provided they are fully warned of the dangers of so doing and are convinced, whilst always bearing that warning in mind, that the uncorroborated evidence is true. The Judicial Committee b observed in the passage quoted¹ that failure to give evidence or the giving of false evidence may bear against an accused and assist in his conviction if there is other material sufficient to sustain a verdict against him.

The relevant other material in the present case (so far as concerns the counts depending on Thatcher's evidence) was the uncorroborated evidence of Thatcher. It was for the jury to decide whether or not, in the light of the judge's warning, that c uncorroborated evidence was sufficient to justify conviction. If they took the view that, having rejected as they plainly did the evidence of the appellants on all the counts, including those counts in which Thatcher was not involved, they had disbelieved the two persons best qualified to give the lie to Thatcher's evidence on the counts to which his evidence was directed, and that this disbelief led them irresistibly to accept Thatcher's evidence directed to those counts, though uncorroborated, d as clearly true, no one could have challenged their reasoning or their verdicts.

If the defence is an alibi and the alibi breaks down the jury must not be told that they may convict merely because the alibi has broken down, but they are entitled to ask themselves the single question, 'Why has a false alibi been tendered?' If there is only one possible answer to that question they are entitled to give their answer by their verdict. Similarly in a case such as the present if the accused are found to have given evidence which is incapable of belief or otherwise unreliable, the jury are e entitled to ask the single question, 'Why has this evidence which we have rejected been tendered to us?' If there is only one possible answer—that the accomplice, though uncorroborated, was telling the truth—once again they are entitled to give their answer in their verdict, provided, of course, that the trial judge has properly warned them of the dangers of acting on the accomplice's uncorroborated evidence. f

The question, therefore, arises whether this court should now apply the proviso. The fact that there was a misdirection on corroboration does not oblige this court to quash the convictions: see for example *R v Jackson*².

Counsel for the appellants sought to argue that the present misdirection vitiated all the convictions, including those on counts on which Thatcher was not involved. He contended that the misdirection on the Thatcher counts 'corroded', to use a word g employed during the argument, the convictions on the other counts. We do not think that this is right. The learned judge delivered a full, careful and accurate summing up on the facts and no challenge has been, or could be, made as to its accuracy in any respect. Both the appellants manifestly cut poor figures in the witness box, to use no harsher language. Counsel for the Crown described Chapman's evidence as having been pathetic in his attempts to challenge the force of the case h against him, especially on count 4. If the jury, as they may well have done, considered count 4 first and rejected Chapman's defence out of hand, they may very well have thought that conviction on count 4, where Thatcher was not directly involved, led irresistibly to a conviction on count 1 where Thatcher was involved and then on count 2 where Thatcher was also involved.

Similarly, Baldwin's denial of ever buying clothing from Chapman and his defence i that he had bought certain clothing in Petticoat Lane and that it was sheer coincidence that 29 articles said to have been bought in Petticoat Lane so closely resembled the comparable stolen stock, must indeed have struck the jury as quite incredible.

a The evidence on the non-Thatcher counts was in truth overwhelming. On the Thatcher counts the ultimate question for the jury was this: have we got the truth from Thatcher? The jury thought that they had and this court sees no reason to disagree with that conclusion in spite of the misdirection, for it is of the opinion that in coming to the overall conclusion which they reached they must have accepted Thatcher as truthful in the witness box irrespective of the absence of corroboration.

b Accordingly this court is convinced that there is no miscarriage of justice caused by the misdirection. It proposes to apply the proviso and to dismiss the appeal on all counts. There are no applications for leave to appeal against sentence.

c Counsel for the appellants also sought to make a point arising from the number of statements Thatcher had made to the police. He complained that the learned judge had not told the jury to disregard Thatcher's evidence in toto. He contended that the judge ought to have directed the jury as was suggested in R v Golder, R v Jones, *R v Porritt*¹. But in that case the relevant witness was a hostile witness. Thatcher was not a hostile witness. There is nothing in this point and it is only mentioned for the sake of completion.

The appeals are dismissed.

j Negligence – Defence – Exclusion of liability – Statutory board – Duty to have regard to safety of operations in provision of services and facilities – Power to make use of services and facilities subject to such terms and conditions as board think fit – Power to exclude liability for negligence in providing services and facilities – Power to exclude liability in absence of contract – British Waterways Board – Plaintiff employed as lighterman on barge – Barge being brought into dock by means of capstan rope provided by board – Notice excluding liability for board's negligence – Plaintiff injured by reason of board's negligence – Whether board protected by notice – Transport Act 1962, ss 10 (1), 43 (3). a

The plaintiff was a lighterman on the River Thames and a freeman of the river. He was employed by C Ltd on a barge which was one of a train of five barges being slowly moved forward into the lock of the Regents Canal dock. The dock was in the occupation of the British Waterways Board ('the board'). The barges were moved forward under the direction of the board's servants by a capstan rope attached to the shore which was wound round a button on the dock quay and from there on to each barge. The plaintiff's barge was still in tidal waters, a little distance from the lock gates, when the rope which was pulling it forward snapped, because it was defective, and hit the plaintiff injuring him. He brought an action against the board for damages for personal injuries on the grounds of the board's negligence and/or breach of statutory duty. The board admitted that the defect in the rope was due to the negligence of one of its servants but contended that the board's liability was excluded by a notice outside the docks office which was in the following terms: 'Lightermen and others availing themselves of the facilities and assistance of the servants of the [board] in bringing their craft into and through the entrance of the dock must do so at their own risk and upon the understanding that no liability . . . shall attach to the [board] or its servants for any loss, damage or injury from whatever cause arising to . . . any person . . . on board thereof.' The notice could not be read from where the plaintiff was working on his barge but he had read the notice when, as a young apprentice, he had been to the docks office. b

Held – The board was not protected by the notice from liability for breach of its common law duty to use reasonable care towards the plaintiff as a person affected by its activities because—

(i) although the notice was apt to cover the circumstances of the accident, as the plaintiff was 'availing [himself] of the facilities and assistance' of the board's servants, the plaintiff had no choice whether to enter the dock on the terms of the notice or not to enter it, as he was an employee on the barge in a train of barges; accordingly, no agreement to be bound by the terms of the notice could be implied or imputed to him (see p 634 h, p 635 f and g and p 636 c d and j post); Buckpitt v Oats [1968] 1 All ER 1145, Bennett v Tugwell (an infant) [1971] 2 All ER 248 and Birch v Thomas [1972] 1 All ER 905 distinguished; f

(ii) the doctrine of volenti non fit injuria could not afford a defence to the claim because that defence was available only when the plaintiff freely and voluntarily, with full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk, impliedly agreed to incur it and to waive any claim for injury; no such agreement could be implied on the part of the plaintiff since he had no choice in the matter of entering the dock (see p 635 g and h and p 636 c d and j, post); dictum of Wills J in Osborne v London and North Western Railway Co (1888) 21 QBD at 223, 224, as approved in Letang v Ottawa Electric Railway Co [1926] All ER Rep at 549, and dictum of Lord Denning MR in Nettleship v Weston [1971] 3 All ER at 587 applied. h

Per Curiam. The board was in breach of its statutory duty under s 10 (1)^a of the Transport Act 1962 but s 10 (4)^b precluded an action for damages for breach of that duty (see p 636 a b e and j, post). j

Per Phillimore LJ. If the notice could be justified at all under s 43 (3)^c of the Transport Act 1962 it could only be justified in the case of those with whom the board had

^a Section 10 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 636 a, post

- a entered into contracts for the use of its services and facilities. Accordingly, in relation to the plaintiff's claim, the notice was to be treated as repugnant to s 10 (1) and of no effect in dealing with his claim in negligence since he had not entered into a contract with the board (see p 636 g and h, post).

Decision of Waller J [1972] 2 All ER 1353 affirmed.

Appeal

- This was an appeal by the defendants, the British Waterways Board, against the judgment of Waller J¹ given on 11th May 1972 in favour of the plaintiff, James Patrick Burnett, a lighterman, on his claim for damages for personal injuries arising out of the defendants' negligence and breach of statutory duty. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

- i D P O'Brien for the defendants.
- David Turner-Samuels QC* and T J C Goudie for the plaintiff.

LORD DENNING MR. The plaintiff, Mr Burnett, is a lighterman on the River Thames. He is a freeman of the the river. On 12th September 1968 he was employed by Charrington Lighterage Co Ltd. He was on the barge 'Durley', which was one of five barges which were being towed to the Limehouse Cut. It was being warped in towards the entrance of the lock. It was still in the tidal way, a little distance from the lock gates. The warping in was being done by means of ropes from the shore. The ropes were attached to the shore, then round a button on the quay, thence on to the barges. Mr Burnett was looking to the ropes on his barge. Suddenly the rope which was pulling his barge forward snapped. It snapped because it was defective. It is admitted now by the defendants, the British Waterways Board, that the defect was due to the negligence of some one of their staff, for which at common law they would be liable. a

The rope snapped and part of it hit Mr Burnett. He was rendered unconscious. Fortunately he was not seriously injured. He was only in hospital for three days; but he was an out-patient for some time and suffered from depression which lasted for some months. The judge¹ assessed the general damages at £350 and the special damages at £135.52. It seems a high figure for such a small accident. There was an appeal about it. But it is not the sort of figure which was so wholly unreasonable that this court would interfere with it. b

The serious issue is on liability. The board say that they are protected by a notice which was put out outside the docks office. It was some distance away from the barges. It could not be read at the distance where Mr Burnett was. In any case, he would not dream of reading it from the place where he was working on the barge. But he admitted that as an apprentice, when he was young, he had been to the docks office and had seen and read this notice: but he said that he thought that it did not apply at the time he had his accident. The notice was in these words: c

'BRITISH WATERWAYS BOARD

TO LIGHTERMEN & OTHERS e

'Lightermen and others availing themselves of the facilities and assistance of the servants of the [board] in bringing their craft into and through the entrance of the dock must do so at their own risk and upon the understanding that no liability whatever shall attach to the [board] or its servants for any loss, damage or injury from whatever cause arising to or by the craft or to or by any person or goods on board thereof. f

BY ORDER'. g

The first question is whether the wording was strong enough to cover this accident. Mr Burnett argued that it did not, because he had not availed himself of the facilities or assistance of the servants of the board. It was his employers, Charrington Lighterage, who had done so. The judge rejected this argument. He said² that the words were apt to cover this situation. I am inclined to agree with him. h

The second question is what was the duty owing by the board to Mr Burnett? I doubt whether the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 applies to this case, because the board were not in occupation of the barge on which the accident occurred. They were in occupation of the quay alongside and of the equipment there. I should have thought their duty was at common law to use reasonable care towards the men on the barge who would be affected by their activities. That is virtually the same i a duty as an occupier owes to a visitor. So it does not matter under which head it is put. In any case it was a duty to use reasonable care. It was broken. They are liable for negligence unless the notice is a defence.

The third question is whether the notice affords a defence. If the board had made a contract with Mr Burnett, in which this notice was incorporated, of course, the board could rely on it. But there is no shadow of ground for saying that there was a contract between the board and Mr Burnett. He was just one of the men working on the barge coming in. His only contract was with the barge owners.

Irrespective of whether there was a contract properly so called, there are cases which show that if Mr Burnett agreed, expressly or impliedly, to be bound by the terms of the notice, he could not claim. Thus there are several cases where the driver of a vehicle gives a passenger a lift and, at the same time, gives him reasonable notice that he rides at his own risk. The passenger is bound by the notice. He cannot claim: see *Buckpitt v Oates*¹, *Bennett v Tugwell (an infant)*² and *Birch v Thomas*³. Likewise when a man is given a free pass to go on a vehicle, he is bound by the conditions on it, if reasonable notice is given of them: see *Wilkie v London Passenger Transport Board*⁴. Similarly when dangerous operations are in progress on land and apparent, and the owner gives a licensee permission to go on it, but at the same time gives him reasonable notice that he comes at his own risk, again he cannot claim: see *Ashdown v Samuel Williams & Sons Ltd*⁵ and *White v Blackmore*⁶. In some of these cases, there may not be a contract properly so called; but the passenger who accepts the lift, or the licensee who takes advantage of the permission, is bound by the notice. He has a choice either to go on the premises on the terms of the notice, or not to go to them. If he goes, he is taken to have impliedly agreed to take the risk. Just as in the 'ticket' cases, a man, by accepting the ticket with the conditions, is taken to have agreed to them: see *Parker v South Eastern Railway Co*⁷. The 'ticket' cases are, of course, based on contract, whereas the licensee cases are not. But in each the basis is implied agreement.

In the present case the plaintiff had no choice. No agreement can be implied or imputed to him. The judge put it well⁸:

f 'The plaintiff was not somebody arriving on his own at the entrance to the dock and saying: "Well, I will not go in because of this notice." He was an employee on a barge, part of a train of barges, and by the time he had got to the dock it was certainly beyond his ability to make a choice and not go in.'

On this ground—that there was no choice to the plaintiff—the judge held that the plaintiff was not bound by the notice. I agree entirely.

g The other ground on which it was sought to deprive the plaintiff of his claim was the doctrine of volenti non fit injuria. This defence too must be based on implied agreement. It is only available when the plaintiff freely and voluntarily, with full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk, impliedly agreed to incur it: see *Letang v Ottawa Electric Railway Co*⁹; and to waive any claim for injury (*Nettleship v Weston*¹⁰). No such agreement could possibly be implied here. In my opinion therefore the board cannot rely on the notice as a defence to this action.

I ought perhaps to say a word about s 10 (1) of the Transport Act 1962. It says that it is the duty of the board 'to have due regard to efficiency, economy and safety of operation as respects the services and facilities provided by them'. It was suggested that that was a statutory duty which would carry a right to damages if it was broken. But the answer is given by s 10 (4) which says that s 10 (1)— a

'shall not be construed as imposing, either directly or indirectly, any form of duty or liability enforceable by proceedings before any court to which the Board would not otherwise be subject.' b

So no reliance can be placed on breach of that statutory duty.

I think the case is properly to be considered as one where the board was under a duty at common law to use reasonable care: that this duty was broken: and that the board are not protected by the notice because Mr Burnett never agreed to it. He had seen it and read it, but he had no choice in the matter. c

I think the learned judge was right and I would dismiss the appeal.

PHILLIMORE LJ. I entirely agree, and I would only add a word or two on the points raised on the provisions of the Transport Act 1962. It seems to me clear that s 10 (1) imposes a statutory duty. It is a duty, inter alia, to have due regard to the safety of operations, as to services and facilities provided by them. Now, what happened here? A rope was used which had previously broken, which had been spliced and which broke again at the very same place where it had broken before. It is not disputed that there was negligence. Counsel agreed that as a result of the provisions of s 10 (4) it was not open to the plaintiff here to found his action on a breach of statutory duty; but that there was a breach of statutory duty seems to me to be very clear. What is said is that the defendants notwithstanding their breach of statutory duty were entitled to rely on this notice to relieve them of this claim in negligence by reason of the provisions of s 43 (3), which provides: d

'Subject to this Act and to any such enactment as is mentioned in the last foregoing subsection, the Boards shall have power to demand, take and recover such charges for their services and facilities, and to make the use of those services and facilities subject to such terms and conditions as they think fit.' e

And it is said by counsel for the defendants that this notice was put up as a term and condition under that subsection. Now, as I see it, if this notice is intended—and it clearly is—to excuse the defendants from any liability in negligence, then it hardly fits with their statutory duty under s 10 (1). If it is permissible at all, it can only, as I see it, under s 43 (3), be justified in the case of those with whom they enter into contracts for the use of their services and facilities. I can see no possible ground for extending their freedom to disregard their statutory duty beyond what is permitted by the strict wording of the Act; and it seems to me accordingly that, at any rate in relation to the present claim by this plaintiff, who entered into no contract with the defendants, this notice must be treated as repugnant to s 10 (1) and of no effect in dealing with the claim which he makes. f

For the reasons given by Lord Denning MR and for this reason also, I would dismiss this appeal. g

SCARMAN LJ. I agree and have nothing to add. h

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords. i

Income tax – Persons chargeable – Profits and interest of money – Person ‘receiving’ income chargeable – Interest of money – Agent receiving interest belonging to principal – Estate agent collecting rents on behalf of clients – Agent depositing clients’ money in bank deposit account in own name – Interest arising on deposit account – Whether interest to be charged on taxpayer as interest of money received by him – Income Tax Act 1952, ss 123 (1) (Sch D, Case III), 148.

Income tax – Income – Total income – Total income exceeding stated amount – Higher rate of tax – Income received by taxpayer on behalf of third party – Taxpayer assessed to tax at standard rate as person ‘receiving’ income – Assessment final and conclusive for purposes of tax at standard rate – Assessment also final and conclusive in estimating total income – Whether income to be included in total income of taxpayer although not belonging to taxpayer beneficially – Income Tax Act 1952, ss 148, 524 (4).

The taxpayer carried on business as an estate agent. In the course of his business he collected rents on behalf of his clients. He placed part of the money so collected in a deposit account which was in the name of his firm and which was not marked as a clients’ deposit account. Only the clients’ moneys were placed in the deposit account. As it would have been a complicated matter to divide the interest arising on the deposit account between the various clients the taxpayer had not accounted to them for it. The taxpayer was assessed under Sch D, Case III, in s 123 (1)^a of the Income Tax Act 1952 in respect of the interest for the year 1967-68. He appealed, contending, inter alia, that the interest was really the property of his clients; alternatively that it was part of the profit of the business and therefore assessable under Sch D, Case II.

Held – The taxpayer had been properly assessed under Sch D, Case III. The interest arising from the deposit account fell clearly within the words ‘interest of money’ in Case III and did not fall within the other heads of Sch D. The fact that the taxpayer was not beneficially entitled to the interest was of no consequence, for he was the person who had ‘received’ it and who was, therefore, chargeable in respect of it by virtue of s 148^b of the 1952 Act (see p 641 h and p 643 b to d, post).

Per Megarry J. Where, by virtue of s 148 of the 1952 Act, a taxpayer has been assessed in respect of income which is not his beneficially and the assessment has become final and conclusive for the purposes of tax at the standard rate, it cannot, however conclusive as to amount, be used in ‘estimating total income’ for the purposes of surtax, under s 524 (4)^c of the 1952 Act, for, lacking the beneficial quality

‘Case I—tax in respect of any trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere;
‘Case II—tax in respect of any profession or vocation not contained in any other Schedule;
‘Case III—tax in respect of—(a) any interest of money, whether yearly or otherwise, or any annuity, or other annual payment . . .
‘Case VI—tax in respect of any annual profits or gains not falling under any other Case of Schedule D and not charged by virtue of Schedule B, Schedule C or Schedule E . . .’

requisite for 'total income', it is incapable of performing any function in estimating 'total income' (see p 642 j to p 643 a, post). a

Case stated

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax for the Division of West Brixton in the county of Greater London held on 29th September 1970 and the adjourned hearing on 14th January 1971, Geoffrey Weston Aplin ('the taxpayer') of Beech Avenue, Sanderstead, Surrey, appealed against assessments for the year 1967-68 made on him under Case II of Sch D in the sum of £6,000 as an estate agent and under Case III of Sch D in the sum of £150 for interest. i

2. The questions for determination by the commissioners were: (a) whether a interest arising on a bank deposit account was income of the taxpayer; and (b) whether such interest should be included as part of his profits as estate agent assessable under the rules applicable to Case II of Sch D or separately under the rules applicable to Case III.

3. The following facts were proved or admitted. (a) The taxpayer conducted a business of estate agency from 968 Garratt Lane, Tooting, under the name of James Fisher & Son. (b) He succeeded to the practice in 1946. (c) Rents were collected for clients out of which expenses including commission were deducted and the balance of the funds sent to the respective clients each month or yearly. Substantial sums were held and a percentage of the moneys was placed on deposit. (d) The practice of putting that money on deposit ceased at one time (following discussions with the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors) but was resumed in 1963. (e) The deposit account was in the name of the firm; it was not marked as a clients' deposit account. (f) The moneys deposited were entirely from clients' moneys. (g) As regards the interest arising on the deposit account, in order to divide the interest between the various clients regard would have to be had to the daily collection of rents (bankings being made daily). (h) There was no form of contract between the taxpayer and his clients. There was only a written document setting out the services to be provided and the charges to be made. In some cases there had been exchanges of letters, usually amplified by verbal statements, but often nothing more than verbal instructions. Where there were any written instructions, those might well have been altered from time to time either by written or verbal amendments, and some of the collections went back to before the war and some to even before the 1914-18 war. (i) The firm (i.e. James Fisher & Son) was instructed and authorised to collect rents on behalf of the persons entitled thereto. In some cases they were instructed to pay rates, water rates, repairs, insurance and other outgoings (or some of them) and for the most part had a general mandate to manage the property on the owners' behalf, though, of course, the services required varied from case to case. (j) There was no condition or contract or obligation by or on the taxpayer to put his clients' moneys on deposit.

f 4. It was contended on behalf of the taxpayer: (i) The interest was really the property of the persons entitled to rents, but the cost of apportioning the interest between the various clients would have outweighed the total interest received and at the end of the day the clients would then have received less out of their rents than they did under the existing arrangement. (ii) Following the decision of the House of Lords in *Brown v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹ the interest fell to be regarded as interest belonging to the taxpayer's individual clients, and not as the income of the taxpayer. g Alternatively, the income should be regarded as part of the profit of the business and assessable under Case II of Sch D.

h 5. It was contended on behalf of the Crown: (a) (i) The interest fell to be assessed under Case III of Sch D. (ii) The taxpayer was the person to be assessed. (iii) In the event of alternative cases of Sch D being equally applicable the Revenue had the right to choose the Case. (b) Interest on a bank deposit account was assessable under Case III of Sch D in accordance with ss 122 (1) (b) and 123 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952. The immediate source of the interest was the deposit of money on the terms of the contract between the taxpayer and the bank. It followed that the interest was not immediately derived by the taxpayer from the carrying on of his profession. (c) The taxpayer was correctly assessed under s 148 of the 1952 Act.

7. The commissioners gave their decision as follows:

'We, the Commissioners who heard the appeal held that the [taxpayer] was the person chargeable under Section 148 of the Income Tax Act 1952 as the person who received the interest and is chargeable under Case III Schedule D although the Income was derived from his business, and we found that the income received was that of the [taxpayer].'

8. At the adjourned meeting on 14th January 1971 the commissioners determined the 1967-68 assessment in the following figures:

CASE II PROFIT	£4,786	Less capital allowances	£53.
CASE III INTEREST	£314	Less exempt	£2.

9. Immediately after the determination of the appeal the taxpayer expressed his dissatisfaction with the decision as being erroneous in point of law and in due course required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.

10. The question for the decision of the court was whether on the facts as found by the commissioners their decision was correct in law.

M P Nolan QC and Patrick Medd for the Crown.

MEGARRY J. This is an appeal by the taxpayer from the General Commissioners for the West Brixton Division of Greater London. The only subject of appeal is an assessment for 1967-68 under Case III of Sch D. I am not concerned with the figures, but with whether the taxpayer is assessable at all in respect of the type of income in question.

The taxpayer conducts an estate agency business, and as part of his business he collects rents for clients of his, in some cases paying outgoings and also managing the properties. He deducts expenses and a commission, and periodically accounts to his clients. He carries on this work without any formal contracts with his clients, though in some cases there have been exchanges of letters, while in others there are merely oral instructions. Out of the rents thus collected, from time to time the taxpayer places on deposit at a bank in his firm name, and not in the name of his clients, a percentage of what he has collected; and the deposit account contains nothing save clients' money and the interest earned on it. The taxpayer succeeded to the business in question in 1946, but the collection of rents has gone on for a long while, reaching back to before the last war, and in a few cases even to before the war of 1914-18. The practice of putting clients' money on deposit at one time ceased, but in 1963 it was resumed. There is no obligation on the taxpayer to place the money on deposit. The deposit account yields interest, and to divide that interest between the various clients would be a complicated matter, since rents are banked daily. The taxpayer has therefore not accounted to his clients for any of the interest. It is on the interest yielded to the taxpayer by the deposit account that he has been assessed under Case III of Sch D.

Before the General Commissioners the taxpayer contended that the interest was really the property of his clients, but that the cost of apportioning it would outweigh the total interest received, and that the interest that he received and did not account for enabled him to make lower charges for collecting the rents. In the alternative, he contended that the income was part of the profits of his business and so was assessable under Case II of Sch D. The inspector, on the other hand, contended that the interest from the deposit account was interest which fell to be assessed on the taxpayer under Case III of Sch D as being interest on the deposit of money, and that the taxpayer was correctly assessed under s 148 of the Income Tax Act 1952. The commissioners gave their decision in the following words. They held that—

- a 'the [taxpayer] was the person chargeable under Section 148 of the Income Tax Act 1952 as the person who received the interest and is chargeable under Case III Schedule D although the Income was derived from his business, and we found that the income received was that of the [taxpayer].'

The question as stated by the commissioners for this court is whether on the facts found by the commissioners their decision was correct in law.

- b At an early stage before me, counsel for the Crown rejected the concluding words of the commissioners' decision to the effect that the income was the income of the taxpayer. He did this on the ground that these words were unsupported by any evidence; and he joined counsel for the taxpayer in saying that the income was truly the income of the various clients. This made it unnecessary for counsel for the taxpayer to develop fully his contention that this indeed was the case. The words
- c in question, I may say, are in effect added on at the end of the decision of the commissioners, and no conclusion appears to have been drawn from those words as part of the decision. The immediately preceding words, stating 'although the Income was derived from his business', were found puzzling by counsel for the Crown, but, he said, harmless. In other respects, counsel for the Crown said that the decision of the commissioners was right. There was indeed a further point in the determination
- d of the figures which played a small part in the case, namely, that the figure for the Case III interest was stated to be subject to a deduction of £2, the words used being 'Less Exempt'. This may have been a slip on the part of the commissioners or it may have been sound, but I do not think that it is in any way decisive of any point that is before me for decision.

- e The analysis of the situation which counsel for the Crown advanced in the face of the onslaught by counsel for the taxpayer was as follows. First, he said that the interest fell squarely within Case III of Sch D as being within the words 'any interest of money, whether yearly or otherwise' in the Income Tax Act 1952, s 123 (1). It was, he said, plainly within the concept of 'pure profit income', within *Re Hanbury, Comiskey v Hanbury*¹. The source of that income was the deposit of the money with the bank coupled with the taxpayer's contract with the bank whereunder the bank
- f paid interest. This accorded with *Hart (Inspector of Taxes) v Sangster*².

Second, counsel for the Crown relied on s 148 of the Income Tax Act 1952, as indeed the commissioners had relied. For a section in an income tax Act, s 148 is a paragon of brevity and clarity. It runs as follows:

- g 'Tax under Schedule D shall be charged on and paid by the persons receiving or entitled to the income in respect of which tax under that Schedule is in this Act directed to be charged.'

These words, said counsel for the Crown, with the expression of 'receiving or entitled to' in the alternative, enabled an assessment under Sch D to be made on a person who either received the income or was entitled to it. If he received some income to which he was entitled and also some income to which he was not entitled, in the sense

h that he was a trustee or other person who received it in a fiduciary capacity for others, it mattered not: he could be assessed under Sch D on it all. This, said counsel for the Crown, was supported by what Lord Clyde, the Lord President, said in *Reid's Trustees v Inland Revenue Comrs*³; and see *Dreyfus v Inland Revenue Comrs*⁴. This view is reinforced by *Brown v Inland Revenue Comrs*⁵, which is in many respects indistinguishable in principle from the present case: and in affirming the decision in that case I do not think that the House of Lords¹ in any way indicated disapproval of what had been said in the First Division. a

The result, said counsel for the Crown, was thus that a trustee or agent could be assessed under s 148 on income which he had received on behalf of many beneficiaries or clients. What was left after suffering tax and expenses and so on should then be paid to the various beneficiaries or clients. It might then be that some of the beneficiaries or clients, having thus in effect suffered deduction of income tax at the standard rate, would want to claim reliefs: and one of the complaints of counsel for the taxpayer was that the process of assessment on the taxpayer in this case meant that his clients, if any part of this interest ever reached them despite the cost of apportioning it, might not be able to claim any reliefs. The answer, said counsel for the Crown, was that the Acts provided machinery for reliefs to be claimed by a process which was in substance separate and independent from the process of assessment. Section 208 of the Income Tax Act 1952 allowed a claim for relief to be made in the prescribed manner, and provisions which are now consolidated as the Taxes Management Act 1970, s 42 and Sch 2, provided for the claim to be made to an inspector with an appeal to the General Commissioners. The process of assessing the taxpayer under s 148 in respect of income to which he was not beneficially entitled thus worked no injury to his clients in respect of reliefs. Counsel for the taxpayer's contention that if an agent was to be assessed under s 148 in respect of income which he received for two or more clients there must be a separate assessment for each client seems to me to be wholly unsupported by any statutory provision to which I was referred, as well as being likely to be impracticable. b c d

There was a further contention in relation to surtax. For surtax, the concept of 'total income' within the Income Tax Act 1952, s 524 (1), is important in determining whether the income is large enough to be drawn up into surtax regions, and also in determining the amount of surtax: see s 2 of the Act. This concept has some relevance, though not much, to income tax itself: see s 226 (1) of the Act. This concept of 'total income' led to some argument on the effect of s 524 (4) of the Act. This reads: e

'Where an assessment has become final and conclusive for the purposes of tax at the standard rate for any year of assessment, that assessment shall also be final and conclusive in estimating total income, and no allowance or adjustment of liability, on the ground of diminution of income or loss, shall be taken into account in estimating total income unless that allowance or adjustment has previously been made on an application under the special provisions of this Act relating thereto.' f g

This provision might be read as laying down that when an assessment on the taxpayer has become final and conclusive, the 'total income' of a client of his might be finally and conclusively determined by the assessment on the taxpayer under s 148, without the client having had any hearing. The answer of counsel for the Crown was, first, that it appeared from s 2 and from the judgment of Finlay J in *Rigden v Inland Revenue Comrs*² that 'total income' is necessarily beneficial income, and so sums received in a fiduciary capacity could not be included; and, second, that the assessment only became final and conclusive 'in estimating total income', that is, in the process of estimating what constituted the beneficial 'total income'. Despite the restrictive interpretation of Finlay J's judgment which counsel for the taxpayer put forward in his reply, I think that the proper construction of the subsection is essentially in accordance with the submission of counsel for the Crown. If three assessments on X, for example, had become final and conclusive, those assessments could not be challenged as to amount in the process of computing X's total income: h i a but if one of them was an assessment in respect of income that was not X's beneficially, that, however conclusive as to amount, could not be used in 'estimating total income' for, lacking the beneficial quality requisite for 'total income', it was incapable of performing any function in estimating 'total income'. I may add that a case cited by counsel for the taxpayer in reply, *Farthing v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹, provides something of an illustration of assessments not being questionable on quantum, though I may mention that it does not seem to me that the headnote is justified in attributing to Roxburgh J the decision that it does.

b As I have indicated, it appears to me that in their essentials the contentions of counsel for the Crown are sound, that they sufficiently meet the contentions of counsel for the taxpayer, and that they are not invalidated by the criticisms of counsel for the taxpayer in reply. Counsel for the taxpayer's complaint that the assessment was in the wrong form because it would cover both beneficial and fiduciary income is c fully met by the answer that s 148 permits such an assessment. His complaint that neither the taxpayer, as agent, nor his clients had had any hearing in relation to the incidence of taxation on profits of the clients is met by the fact that the taxpayer has in fact had a hearing, and the clients can have a hearing if they wish. The argument that the clients are not assessable in respect of 'interest of money' under Case III of d Sch D, but ought to be assessed under Cases I, II or VI, or perhaps in respect of 'annual payments' under Case III, is met by the fact that in my judgment the payments clearly fall within the meaning of 'interest of money' in Case III and do not fall within the other heads. That being so, and the taxpayer being assessed in that way, I do not accept counsel for the taxpayer's contention that each client (or the taxpayer on behalf of each client) ought to be assessed on 'annual payments' under Case III of e Sch D, with the source of income being the contract between the taxpayer and each client.

There is a further point. Counsel for the taxpayer contended that the Crown was estopped from contending or accepting that the commissioners were wrong in law in holding that the assessment covered profits to which the taxpayer was beneficially entitled. I have already mentioned the quality of this finding as being something of f an addendum to the decision. The inspector, said counsel, was instrumental in getting the commissioners to decide that the taxpayer did not receive the income as agent, and the inspector had acted on the decision of the commissioners by asking them to assess the taxpayer on this footing, and, he said, by collecting the income tax from the taxpayer on this basis: and counsel for the taxpayer relied on Andrew v Taylor (Inspector of Taxes)². If one accepts to the full that on an appeal one of the parties cannot submit a case that is wholly inconsistent with the case that he submitted below, g at least one of the answers to the contention of the taxpayer on this point is that it does not appear in the least clear from the case stated that the inspector did in fact advance the argument that the taxpayer received the income beneficially. I need not repeat the summary of this argument that I have already given. The factual foundation for any form of estoppel of this type (if such it be) is therefore lacking. h There were a number of other contentions put forward by counsel for the taxpayer, some of them rather theoretical and unreal, and I do not propose to explore them.

There remain three other matters that I should mention. First, the taxpayer apparently lost the assessment in question, and through his solicitors orally requested the Crown for a copy. This, on advice, was refused, apparently because the Revenue authorities suspected that the taxpayer wanted the copy so that he could use it on the appeal even though it had not been made part of the case stated or i attached to it, and the taxpayer had made no request for it to be included or attached. I find it difficult to think of circumstances in which it could be right for the Revenue authorities to refuse to supply a taxpayer with a copy of the assessment on him against which he is appealing if he says that he has lost the original. It is perfectly possible to supply him with a copy and at the same time, if suspicious that an attempt will be made to bring the assessment into the argument of the appeal, to warn the taxpayer that such an attempt would be opposed. I can well see that it may be very burdensome to be faced on an appeal by a last-minute transformation when the appellant attempts to take some point based on a document which, when the case stated was settled, was not made part of the case: yet that seems to me to be no justification for refusing to supply a copy of an assessment for the appellant's use, making a charge for it, if need be. In fact, the Crown's suspicions in this case proved to be justified, in that counsel for the taxpayer, without a word to counsel for the Crown beforehand (even though the case had been kept waiting for a time while I gave judgment in the previous case), did indeed attempt to persuade me to call for a copy of the assessment for use in the appeal. The attempt failed, and later counsel for the taxpayer withdrew his request on the ground that he had been able to make all the points that he wanted to without using the assessment. Yet even though the suspicions of the Revenue authorities were well-founded, they provided no justification for withholding the copy; and at an appropriate moment a very proper expression of regret was made on the part of the Revenue authorities, coupled with the proffer, belated though it was, of a copy of the assessment. That is therefore that; doubtless there will be no recurrence of such a refusal.

The other points are smaller. One is that the formal notice of an additional point which the taxpayer gave the Crown under RSC Ord 91, r 7, bears no date. Under the rule notice must be given not less than ten days before the hearing, and it is at least convenient, if no more, that such a document should be dated. I hope not to see any such undated documents in the future. The other point is that the copy of the case stated which the taxpayer provided for the court consisted of five pages of four different sizes, one page being less than half the size of another, but more than half the size of the others. I can see no justification for supplying so wretched a copy, hindering the easy turning over of the right number of pages: and if the taxpayer had succeeded, I would have considered depriving him of part of his costs. As it is, for the reasons I have given, the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
STEPHENSON, ORR LJJ AND CAULFIELD J
15th, 23rd FEBRUARY 1973

Arrest – Arrest without warrant – What constitutes arrest – Suspect voluntarily visiting police station to assist police with enquiries into theft – Suspect informed after questioning that he would be charged – Police proceeding with appropriate formalities – Suspect deciding to leave police station – Police officers restraining suspect – Suspect charged with assaulting officers in execution of their duty – Issue whether suspect under arrest – Duty of police to make clear to suspect that he has been arrested – Issue whether made clear to him one of fact for jury.

The appellant went voluntarily to a police station to help the police with their enquiries into certain thefts which had taken place. After some questioning a police officer said to the appellant, 'I propose to charge you with theft . . . and dishonest handling . . .' The police then began the appropriate formalities, such as taking fingerprints and preparing documents. After some time the appellant decided to leave. He was prevented from so doing by two police officers and in the resulting struggle the police officers were injured. The appellant was charged with assaulting a police officer in the execution of his duty. The trial judge directed the jury as a matter of law that the words of the police officer and the commencement of formalities meant that the appellant was no longer merely a suspect, free to leave the police station at any time, but had been adequately placed under arrest and that the police officers were therefore acting in execution of their duty in preventing him from leaving. The appellant was convicted and appealed.

Held – In order to establish that the police were entitled to use force to restrain the appellant from leaving the police station it was necessary to show that it had been made clear to the appellant that he was under arrest. The question whether it had been made clear to him was a question of fact for the jury; on the facts of the case it was impossible to conclude as a matter of law that it had been made clear to the appellant that he had been arrested. Accordingly the question had been wrongly withdrawn from the jury and the appeal would be allowed (see p 649 f to p 650 c, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Derek Inwood against his conviction in the Crown Court at Croydon on 11th October 1972 before his Honour Judge Granville Slack and a jury on two counts of assaulting a police constable in the execution of his duty. The appellant was found guilty by a majority of ten to two, a previous jury having failed to agree, and was fined £50 on each count. He appealed by certificate of the trial judge. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. c

23rd February. STEPHENSON LJ read the following judgment of the court. Caulfield J, who is not able to be here today, agrees with the judgment we are about to give. On 11th October 1972, at Croydon Crown Court, the appellant was convicted on two counts of assaulting a police constable in the execution of his duty. The verdicts were by majorities of ten to two, the jury having failed to agree at an earlier trial. He was fined £50 on each. The appellant now appeals against conviction on a certificate from the learned judge. The certificate is in these terms: d

'I certify that the case is a fit case for appeal on the ground that the convictions of the defendant on counts 10 and 11 raise the following question of general importance:—It being accepted (a) on the one hand, that a person at a police station who has been arrested (whether arrested outside and brought to the police station or arrested whilst at the police station) is not free to leave the police station, and if he attempts to do so may be restrained by the police, and if in attempting to leave he assaults a police officer, that is an assault on a police constable in the execution of his duty; and (b) on the other hand, that a person who attends at a police station voluntarily, e.g. to answer questions, is free to leave the police station at any time, and if he attempts to do so may not be restrained by the police, and if in attempting to assert that right to leave he assaults a police officer (using no more force than is necessary to assert his right), that is not an assault on a police officer in the execution of his duty; what is the position of a man who attends voluntarily at a police station, is questioned, is told by the police that they propose to charge him with specified offences (e.g. dishonest handling), is not told in specific words "You are being arrested", but the police start to carry out the steps leading up to charging him, i.e. type out the charge sheet, take his fingerprints, and ask him to empty his pockets (which he does) to make a list of his property, and then tries to leave the police station? Is he still free to leave as in paragraph (b) above, or is he then held at the police station under compulsion and no longer free to leave, as in paragraph (a) above? I directed the jury that in these circumstances he was acting under compulsion, was no longer free to leave, and that an assault committed in attempting to leave was an assault on the police constable in the execution of his duty. The question in law is whether I was right so to rule.' e

The case for the prosecution was this. In January 1971 police were investigating certain thefts and handling of stolen goods. On 31st January they called at the appellant's house in Hayes with a search warrant, and took away a television set and some copper tubing. The appellant, who had not then been home, called next morning f a at St Mary Cray Police Station, and had a lengthy interview with Det Con Crisp, after which it was left that the police should pursue their enquiries and make an appointment to see him again. The appellant in fact called again at the station at about 7 p m on 15th February and was interviewed in an upstairs room by Det Con Crisp and Det Sgt Gale.

b According to the police evidence, on 15th February, after Det Con Crisp had put some questions to the appellant, he said to him: 'I propose to charge you with theft of the copper and dishonestly handling the T.V. set', and cautioned him. The appellant replied, 'I understand. I don't want to be awkward'. Then, between 7.30 p m and 8.30 p m, Det Con Neville was engaged in taking fingerprints from the appellant, and also obtaining antecedents and completing forms in relation to offences with which he was to be charged. Det Con Crisp again saw the appellant with Det Sgt Gale and told him he would have to be searched. The detective sergeant c did search him, and came across the two purported insurance certificates, which were later the subject of two other counts in the indictment to which the appellant pleaded guilty at the first trial.

d Soon after 9 p m the appellant became excited and shouted 'Look, when are you going to finish with me, I want to get out of here', and held his head in his hands. He was told 'You will be released when we have completed our inquiries'. After some further questions, Det Con Crisp got up and went to the door. As he opened it, the appellant shouted, 'That's it, then' and got up. Det Sgt Gale got up too, whereupon, according to both officers, the appellant punched the sergeant in the chest. The sergeant caught hold of the appellant's coat, and they both fell to the floor struggling and fighting. The constable turned back and grabbed the appellant, but the appellant eluded his grasp and dashed out of the door. The constable called to another e detective constable, Neville, who came out of his office and tried to bar the appellant's way. The appellant punched Neville in the chest also and made off down the stairs with Neville hanging on to his coat, being dragged down after him. At the bottom they both fell to the ground. Neville said that in doing so he banged his head on the front door. According to the police, the appellant, as he fell, caught his face on the fire extinguisher. After that he really went berserk and kicked and punched Neville as he f lay dazed before other officers secured him and later put him in a cell.

There was medical evidence of Dr Comper who was called to the station. At 9.30 p m he said that he found Det Con Neville to have a swelling over his right eye, to be dazed and concussed and to be unfit for duty. A quarter of an hour later, he found Det Sgt Gale to have a bruised and swollen left thumb and a slightly swollen right kneecap. Ten minutes after that he found the appellant to have a deep laceration g over his right eyebrow which was bleeding and required suturing.

h The appellant gave evidence in his own defence that from about 7.30 p m until 9.10 p m at the police station, Det Sgt Gale was more or less continuously punching him, slapping him and calling him a liar; but towards the end the blows became harder; the cut over his eye and the subsequent bruising were caused in this way, and Det Con Crisp made no attempt to stop the sergeant, merely remarking 'Don't connect me with it'. The appellant said that he twice tried to get out of the room and run downstairs, once before 9 p m and then shortly after 9 p m on the occasion already recounted. He said further that at no time did he strike the sergeant, and there was no physical contact between him and Det Con Neville. Indeed he seems to have gone so far as to say that Det Con Neville never came out of his room on to the landing, did not attempt to stop him leaving, did not chase him down the stairs, and j was not at the bottom of the stairs in the hallway when the appellant was collared.

It should be noted that at the time of these incidents the appellant was a man of good character with no previous convictions apart from minor motoring offences, and that he called medical evidence that he was at the time under stress from sources quite independent of these police enquiries.

Now the judge directed the jury in this way. He said:

'The question we have to consider in this case, as I see it, is this: had the police the right to keep this man, or was he free to go? That raises a question of law which you must take from me. Now, the law is quite clear. If a man is arrested either before he comes to the police station or whilst he is at the police station, and then he is in custody, and then tries to leave the station, the police are entitled to restrain him. If he assaults the police in the course of trying to leave the station, when he is in custody, or tries to leave the room where he is being detained—if he assaults the police in those circumstances—then that is an assault on a constable in the execution of his duty. That is quite clear. That is one side of the picture. The other extreme is this: if a man goes to a police station voluntarily and is being questioned—or to use this wonder phrase which we see in the papers or hear on television or radio, "a man is assisting police with their enquiries"—if he is there merely in a voluntary capacity, he is free at any time to leave whether they have finished their questioning or not. He can say "Right, I am going to leave". He can get up and walk out. If, in those circumstances, the police seek to detain him they have no right to do so unless they arrest him. They have no right to detain him. If, in those circumstances, he assaults the police in trying to assert his right to leave, that is not an assault in the execution of the constable's duty because the police are then exceeding their authority. They are acting beyond their duty in restraining a man they have no right to restrain. So, you have those two positions.'

The judge went on:

'It seems to me that this case raises the problem of what is the position in a case between those two? What is the position if a man goes voluntarily to the police station at seven o'clock, as this man did, and then is questioned for a time, and the position comes, and it is not disputed that this happened at half-past seven, where the police say to him "We are going to charge you", "We propose to charge you", and then take the necessary steps. They start on the formalities leading up to charging him. They ask him to produce the contents of his pockets because they have to make a list of his property, take his fingerprints and start to type out the charge sheet, the formal document which is used on these occasions. So it is clear that it was bona fide. They were going to charge him. In this case they said they were going to charge him with dishonestly handling the television set and the copper. Now, this case raises the question: if the police say that, does a man's position alter? Is he still a volunteer? Does he still have the right to leave freely of his own accord or is he then acting under compulsion and in the same position as the man who has been arrested?'

A little later he said:

'The view of the law put forward by [counsel for the appellant] yesterday, was that even in those circumstances if the man has never been formally arrested he is still free to leave, free to assert his right to leave, and if the police restrain him and had no right to restrain him, and if in the course of leaving—asserting his right to leave—he assaults them, that is not an assault in the execution of their duty. That was the view of the law which he put forward. Now, there is another possible view of the law, and that is this: when the stage is reached that the police say "We are charging you", and they start on the formalities, then his status changes and he is then ceasing to be there voluntarily. You then have a man who is under compulsion. Then if he seeks to leave, he is in the same position as a man who has been formally arrested, and the police have a right to restrain him. If he assaults them in the course of trying to leave, in those circumstances, that is an assault in the execution of their duty. Now, I am going to direct you, as a matter of law, that that is the law, and not as stated by [counsel for the appellant]. It may be that in certain circumstances this case might go to some other court, and some other court might say I am wrong or they might say a that [counsel] is wrong. I do not know. I am going to direct you that that is the state of the law, namely, that when the police said to this man "We are going to charge you", and then started on these formalities so that it was bona fide that they were going to charge him, then he was a man under compulsion and then he was no longer there voluntarily. Then if he tried to go either out of the room or out of the station, the police had a right to detain him just in the same way as if he had been arrested. They had a right to detain him, and if in trying to leave he then assaults them, that is an assault in the execution of their duty. I am going to ask you to consider the case on that basis. Accept that from me. It is my responsibility that that is the law.'

Counsel for the appellant submitted to us, as to the trial judge, that as the appellant had gone to the police station voluntarily as distinct from being arrested, then notwithstanding that he had been told he was to be charged with handling stolen goods and the procedure and formalities preliminary to such a charge were being followed, he was not under arrest and if he sought to leave the police station the police were not entitled to restrain him. In other words the police would not then be restraining him in the execution of their duty but would be unlawfully restraining his liberty. He supported his interesting argument that the police had no right or duty to hold or detain a suspect unless and until he was arrested and charged by numerous authorities, none of them, he concedes, directly in point. They were *Kenlin v Gardiner*¹; *Ludlow v Burgess*²; *Alderson v Booth*³; *Wheatley v Lodge*⁴; *Erskine v Hollin*⁵; *R v Wattam*⁶; *R v Bass*⁷; R v Waterfield, *R v Lynn*⁸; *Ghani v Jones*⁹; *R v Jones*¹⁰; *Squires v Botwright*¹¹.

Counsel for the Crown submitted that it is unsatisfactory to restrict the argument to the question of arrest. Detention, arrest and custody are all synonymous. Here on the admitted facts the officers had made up their minds to charge the appellant and therefore they then had to follow certain procedures preliminary to making the formal charge, such as taking his antecedent history, fingerprinting him, preparing the charge sheet and searching him. Counsel conceded that there was an obligation on the police officers to make it clear to the appellant that he had to remain until actually charged and then until bailed, but he submitted that on the facts which were not disputed the appellant must have known he was under compulsion to stay. As the court understands this argument, the Crown is saying that the obligation on the police to convey to the appellant that he was in custody had been discharged.

This court does not wish to say and cannot conclude as a matter of law that it had been made clear to the appellant that he had been arrested. We are of the opinion that, as counsel for the appellant submitted in reply, this is a question of fact. It all depends on the circumstances of any particular case whether in fact it has been shown that a man has been arrested, and the court considers it unwise to say that there should be any particular formula followed. No formula will suit every case and it may well be that different procedures might have to be followed with different persons depending on their age, ethnic origin, knowledge of English, intellectual qualities, physical or mental disabilities. There is no magic formula; only the obligation to make it plain to the suspect by what is said and done that he is no longer a free man. However, what we think is clear is that it is a question of fact, not of law, and it must be left to the jury to decide whether a person has been arrested or not, at least where there is a a real dispute as to the question whether the defendant understood that he was being arrested.

Here there was such a dispute. The appellant had been to this police station before in connection with the same enquiry and had been allowed to go free. He was told on the occasion of the assaults that he would be released when the police enquiries were completed, with nothing said about bail. He was a man of good character, who had never before been asked to go to a police station to help the police in their enquiries. Nevertheless, the jury might have concluded that the appellant must have understood perfectly well that he was under arrest and no longer at liberty, if they had been allowed to do so. They might well have reached this conclusion without the direction which the judge gave, but we cannot be sure. For this reason then there was, we think, a misdirection in withdrawing this question from the jury and the ruling which the judge gave was wrong. b

In our judgment, the Crown's concession, properly made, compels us so to decide and to quash these convictions, and makes it unnecessary to review, still less to comment on, the authorities cited to us or the important principle of law which counsel for the appellant extracted from them. c

If we had been asked to apply the proviso¹ we could not have done so. One jury had already failed to agree on these two charges of assault, and we cannot say that this jury would inevitably have taken the same view of the facts as the judge plainly took. Indeed if we said so we would be falling into the same error as the judge in stating our view of the facts as necessarily being the jury's view. d

Divorce – Separation – Living apart – Meaning – Parties 'living apart' unless living with each other in the same household – Parties living in same house – Parties living with each other otherwise than as husband and wife – Wife leaving husband to live with another man as his wife – Husband coming to live in other man's house as paying lodger – Parties treating marriage as at an end – Parties living apart – Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 2 (1) (e), (5). g

The husband and wife were married in 1942 and lived in the matrimonial home in Croydon until 1964 when the wife left the husband, taking the two children of the marriage with her, and went to live with P as his wife at his house in South Norwood. The husband remained in the matrimonial home. In 1968 the husband became ill with coronary thrombosis. His doctor told the wife that he must not live on his own and that he had only about a year to live; so, on his discharge from hospital in October 1968, the husband went to live at P's house. He lived there as a lodger paying a weekly sum. The wife and P slept together and the husband slept in a separate bedroom. The wife got his meals, which he ate with the family, and did his washing, but they clearly treated the marriage as at an end. The husband lived thus in h a P's house for four years. In April 1972 the wife petitioned for divorce under s 2 (1) (e)^a of the Divorce Reform Act 1969, on the basis that she and the husband had 'lived apart' for a continuous period of five years preceding the petition. The husband consented to a divorce. The judge dismissed the petition on the ground that the parties were not living apart during the period when the husband was living at P's house. On appeal, b Held – The husband and wife were 'living apart' within s 2 (1) (e) while the husband lived at P's house because they were not 'living with each other in the same household' within the meaning of s 2 (5)^b; the words 'with each other' meant living with each other as husband and wife; the parties were not living with each other in that sense since the wife was living with P as his wife and the husband was living in the house as lodger. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed and a decree nisi of divorce f This was an appeal by the wife, Irene Doris Fuller, against the order of his Honour Judge Granville Slack, made on 5th July 1972, dismissing her undefended petition for dissolution of her marriage to the husband, Henry Fred Fuller, under ss 1 and 2 (1) (e) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

g R G Marshall-Andrews for the wife.

The husband did not appear and was not represented.

LORD DENNING MR. This case raises the meaning of the words 'living apart' in the new Divorce Reform Act of 1969. Section 2 (1) (e) says that a marriage is to be held to have broken down irretrievably if 'the parties to the marriage have lived apart for a continuous period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition'. Section 2 (5) says:

h 'For the purposes of this Act a husband and wife shall be treated as living apart unless they are living with each other in the same household.'

The husband and wife were married on 25th May 1942, more than 30 years ago. He was 28 and she was 18. They have two daughters, born in 1943 and 1951. They lived at 388 King Henry's Drive, New Addington, Croydon. They separated in 1964. The wife left the husband, taking with her the two daughters. She went to live with another man, a Mr Penfold, at 164 South Norwood Hill, South Norwood. The husband remained in the matrimonial home. His wife lived with Mr Penfold as his wife. She slept with him and became known as Mrs Penfold.

i ^a Section 2 (1), so far as material, is set out at letter h, supra

^b Section 2 (5) is set out at letter h, supra

Four years later, in 1968, the husband fell ill. He had a coronary thrombosis and was in hospital. He went back for a little while to what had been the matrimonial home, living on his own. He was taken ill again and again he went to hospital. The doctor explained to the wife, who was now living as Mrs Penfold, that the husband could not live on his own again; the main valve of his heart had collapsed; he would only be able to do light office work if ever he worked again; he had only about a year to live.

So in October 1968 the husband was discharged from hospital. Then events took place which raise the problem. The husband went to live at 164 South Norwood Hill, where Mr Penfold was, with the wife now living as Mrs Penfold, and the daughter. The husband, if I may still use that word, went and became a lodger in the house. Mr Penfold and the wife still continued to live together in one bedroom. The husband just slept in the back bedroom. He got his own cup of tea in the morning himself. In the evening he came back to have a meal with the family. On Saturday he was out all day. The wife gave him food and he ate his meals with some of the others in the house. She did the washing. He paid like a lodger at first £5 a week, and later £7 a week. In spite of the doctor's gloomy forecast, he is still alive.

Four years passed in this way. Then in April 1972 the wife petitioned for a divorce on the ground of living apart for five years. The husband was only too willing to recognise this. He signed a form of consent. But at the hearing the judge held that he had no jurisdiction to grant a divorce because he thought that when the husband came back to the house, he and his wife were not living apart. The judge referred to the cases under the old law, such as *Hopes v Hopes*¹; and also the cases under the new Act: *Mouncer v Mouncer*² and *Santos v Santos*³.

In *Santos v Santos*³ this court stressed the need, under the new Act, to consider the state of mind of the parties and, in particular, whether they treated the marriage as subsisting or not. Clearly they treated it in this case as at an end.

In this case we have to consider the physical relationship of the parties. From 1964 to 1968 the parties were undoubtedly living apart. The wife was living with the other man as the other man's wife in that household, and the husband was separate in his household. From 1968 to 1972 the husband came back to live in the same house but not as a husband. He was to all intents and purposes a lodger in the house. Section 2 (5) says they are to be treated as living apart 'unless they are living with each other in the same household'. I think the words 'with each other' mean 'living with each other as husband and wife'. In this case the parties were not living with each other in that sense. The wife was living with Mr Penfold as his wife. The husband was living in the house as a lodger. It is impossible to say that husband and wife were or are living with each other in the same household. It is very different from *Mouncer v Mouncer*² where the husband and wife were living with the children in the same household—as husband and wife normally do—but were not having sexual intercourse together. That is not sufficient to constitute 'living apart'. I do not doubt the correctness of that decision. But the present case is very different. I think the judge put too narrow and limited a construction on the Act. I would allow the appeal and pronounce the decree nisi of divorce.

STAMP LJ. I agree. I can only say that to my mind the words 'living with each other in the same household' in the context of the Act relating to matrimonial proceedings are not apt to describe the situation where the wife is indisputably living with another man in the same household and her husband is there as a paying guest in the circumstances Lord Denning MR has described. 'Living with each other' connotes to my mind something more than living in the same household: indeed the words 'with each other' would otherwise be redundant.

JAMES LJ. I entirely agree with the reasons expressed in both judgments. I would only add this, that the decision of this court in this case is one which derives some support from *Bartram v Bartram*¹ and from *Santos v Santos*², which was a very different case, of course, but in which Sachs LJ reviewed the whole of the new 1969 Act, and there are passages in his judgment there which go to show very clearly the meaning that should be attached to the words in s 2 (5) 'living with each other in the same household'. Those words must be viewed in that sense.

Appeal allowed; decree nisi on ground that parties had lived apart for five years.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COURT

SIR JOHN BRIGHTMAN, MR R BOYFIELD AND MR H ROBERTS

8th FEBRUARY, 1ST MARCH 1973

Employment – Redundancy – Dismissal by reason of redundancy – Dismissal – Termination of contract by employer – Repudiation of contract by employer – Circumstances in which employee will be taken to have accepted repudiation – Employee informed that work being transferred to new premises – Employee not indicating whether prepared to work at new premises – Employee directed to work at new premises – No renewal of contract or offer of new contract by employer – Employee working at new premises for short time and then giving week's notice – Whether employee having accepted employer's repudiation of contract – Whether contract terminated by employer alone or by mutual agreement between employer and employee.

Two employees worked for some years at their employers' premises in Chelsea. On 5th May 1972 they were verbally informed by one of their employers' directors that the employers' company would be moving to premises in Fulham, though they were not told when the move would be made. The employees did not indicate whether they were prepared to work in Fulham, nor were they offered either a renewed or a new contract of employment by their employers. On 15th May the employees were directed to work at Fulham as from the following day. The employees worked at Fulham for three weeks although the working conditions there were unsatisfactory. They then went on holiday for two weeks. On their return they gave their employers one week's notice and left their employment when the notice expired. An industrial tribunal held that the employees were entitled to redundancy payments from their employers. On appeal it was contended by the employers (a) that although the employers had wrongfully repudiated the employees' contract of employment at Chelsea the employees had not accepted such repudiation and the contract had continued when they moved to Fulham; (b) that the contract had not been terminated by the employers alone but by mutual agreement between the employers and the employees; (c) that consequently the employees were not entitled to redundancy payments.

Held – The employers repudiated the existing contracts of employment when they directed the employees to work at Fulham; when the employees gave notice, they accepted such repudiation. The three weeks which the employees had worked in Fulham followed by the two weeks when they had been on holiday was not so long

a period of time that it could be assumed that there had been an agreed variation or replacement of the employees' previous contract. The employees had never been asked whether they wished to be dismissed from their employment in Chelsea or to start on new work in Fulham. They had been given no time in which to assess the position but had been directed by the employers to work in Fulham, which the employers had no contractual right to do. It followed that the employees were entitled to redundancy payments (see p 656 e to g, post).

This was an appeal by Shields Furniture Ltd ('the company') against the decision of an industrial tribunal (chairman Sir John Clayden) sitting in London, dated 1st November 1972, that the respondents, L H Goff and D Goff, were entitled to redundancy payments from the company. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Adrian Hamilton for the company.

Michel Kallipetis for the respondents.

1st March. SIR JOHN BRIGHTMAN read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from a decision of a London industrial tribunal that two employees are entitled to redundancy payments. The appellant is a company called Shields Furniture Ltd. The respondent employees are father and son, Mr L H Goff and Mr D Goff. They are upholsterers. The company in the course of its history has carried on business at a number of places in London. At one time the workshops were in Harriet Street. The respondents were employed there for about four years. The workshops were then moved to 30/35 Markham Street, Chelsea. The respondents worked there continuously until the middle of 1972. Mr Marriott was an executive director of the company. On 5th May 1972 he announced to the respondents that the company would be moving to Fulham, but he did not say when. The respondents lived in North London and travelled to work by car. Fulham was about 2½ miles further for them than Markham Street, and it involved another 15 minutes journey each way. On Monday, 15th May, Mr Marriott announced to Mr Goff junior that he was to go to Fulham the next day instead of Markham Street, and he was told to pass the message to his father. The respondents then worked at Fulham for three weeks.

a They did not like conditions there but thought they would give the place a fair try. They found it damp, noisy and dirty, with inadequate toilet accommodation. Mr Marriott in his evidence admitted that conditions at Fulham were not really good to begin with. They were old premises which had been gutted. At the end of three weeks the respondents went away for two weeks' holiday to which they were entitled. When they returned, they gave Mr Marriott a week's notice and left when the notice expired. Their employment accordingly came to an end on 23rd June.

b On 21st September they applied for redundancy payments.

The tribunal made the following findings of fact. Both the respondents were under contract to work at Markham Street and not elsewhere; at no stage were they asked if they were prepared to move to Fulham and at no stage did either of them indicate that he was prepared to move to Fulham; at the most there was an announcement that the company was moving, apparently on the basis that if the company

c moved, its employees automatically moved with it. The tribunal decided that the respondents were entitled to redundancy payments. The basis of the decision was that their contract of employment came to an end at Markham Street on Monday, 15th May. They were then impliedly dismissed by the company. The work at Fulham was not in pursuance of any written offer by the company. They were not employed

d under a new or renewed contract of employment falling within s 3 (2) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. In the result, they were entitled to redundancy payments.

Counsel for the company, in a forceful argument before us, submitted that redundancy payments were not due. He conceded and indeed asserted that the order to move to Fulham constituted a wrongful repudiation by the company of the existing contracts of employment. This did not bring the contract of employment to an end

e because, submitted counsel, though employment as a status can usually be ended unilaterally, a contract as a legal relationship cannot be determined unilaterally. The company's order to its employees placed each of them in a position where he might accept the wrongful repudiation, in which case the contract of employment terminated; or he might affirm the contract of employment, in which case it would continue until lawfully determined (see *Hill v CA Parsons & Co Ltd*¹). The position, therefore, when the respondents went to Fulham, was that the contract of employment

f still continued, because the respondents had not accepted the company's wrongful repudiation; but the company's repudiation was still capable of being accepted, in which case the contract would end, and it would be the company which ended it so as to entitle the respondents to redundancy payments. In fact, submitted counsel, the respondents never did accept the company's repudiation of the contracts.

g What they did was to accept the company's offer to work at Fulham. The logical result of the acceptance of that offer was that the contract to work at Markham Street was terminated. But it was not terminated by the employer: it was terminated by mutual agreement between employer and employee. So went the argument of counsel. Counsel relied on the words of Lord Denning MR in *Marriott v Oxford and District Co-operative Society Ltd*²:

'If the man accepts an offer by the employers to re-engage him without a break, I do not see why he should be entitled to redundancy payment . . . If the parties agree consensually to vary the terms of the contract of employment, or to rescind it and substitute a new contract of employment, the plain fact is that the contract is not terminated by the employers but by consent.'

j In the Marriott case³, the employee had been employed as an electrical supervisor or foreman for eight years, when he was suddenly informed that his salary and status would be reduced in six days' time. The employee protested but continued to work for some weeks before leaving. He then claimed a redundancy payment. The tribunal considered that there had been a consensual variation of the original contract and not a termination of the contract by the employer. The employee successfully appealed to the Court of Appeal. Lord Denning MR put his view in this way¹:

'He never agreed to the dictated terms. He protested against them. He submitted to them because he did not want to be out of employment. By insisting on new terms to which he never agreed, the [employer] did, I think, terminate the old contract of employment.'

In the case before us the respondents were never asked if they were willing to work at Fulham. They were simply told on Monday that on Tuesday their work was being moved 2½ miles away. What is an employee expected to do in those circumstances? He does not want to be out of a job. Nor, if he is a conscientious workman, does he want to let his employer down if this can be avoided. In most cases, therefore, he goes to the new job. He goes with an open mind. There is a period when he is uncommitted. During that period he makes up his mind whether he will accept the new employment, in which case he is not entitled to a redundancy payment; or whether he will leave or, in legal language, accept the employer's repudiation. So what we have to decide is whether, on the primary facts found by the tribunal, the proper inference is that the respondents accepted the new employment at Fulham and so lost any claim to redundancy payments, or whether they accepted the employer's repudiation and so became entitled to redundancy payments.

In our view the proper inference is that the respondents did not commit themselves to working at Fulham instead of Markham Street, but did, in lawyer's language, accept the company's repudiation of the Markham Street contract. We do not think that the three weeks that the respondents worked at Fulham and their two weeks' holiday was so long an elapsed period of time that one ought to assume an agreed variation or replacement of the previous contract. The company never asked them to consider whether they wished to be discharged at Markham Street or to take on new work at Fulham. They were given no period of time in which to assess the position. The company directed them to Fulham, which it had no contractual right to do. The respondents reacted to that direction in the way that most men would react: they went. They did not protest but went to work and waited to see to what extent conditions would be improved. In these circumstances the time they allowed to go by was not so long as to imply the agreed substitution of a different contract. The notice which the respondents gave was an acceptance of the company's repudiation.

For the reasons we have given we dismiss the appeal. We wish, however, to add this. The company would have saved itself and others a great deal of trouble if it had adopted the simple expedient, in line with the Industrial Relations Act 1971 and the Code of Practice², of making known in advance details of the job and working conditions at Fulham, and establishing in advance who was willing to work there and who was not willing to do so. Instead the company seems to have taken no steps to keep its workpeople informed. When rumours of a move were current, Mr Griggs, the union representative, wrote to the company. We understand that the company did not reply to that letter.

Appeal dismissed.

j Ransom (Inspector of Taxes) v Higgs
 Motley (Inspector of Taxes) v Higgs's Settlement Trustees

The taxpayer, Mr Higgs, and his wife controlled certain companies which carried on the trade of dealing in or developing land. Various companies under the Higgs's control agreed to sell land to a newly formed partnership for £87,135, which was much less than its market value. The partnership consisted of Mrs Higgs, who owned a 90 per cent interest in it, and two non-Higgs companies, which owned 5 per cent

each. Mrs Higgs then settled the whole of her interest in the partnership on discretionary trusts for herself, Mr Higgs and their issue. The trustees of the settlement promptly sold that 90 per cent interest in the partnership to a non-Higgs company for £170,000 whereupon Mrs Higgs was replaced in the partnership by the purchasing company. The partnership then contracted to sell the land to the purchasing company for £87,600, so that the purchasing company had vested in it the right to both the land and the 90 per cent interest in the partnership. It contracted to sell both to another non-Higgs company for £286,000. That company then sold the land to another non-Higgs company for £286,750 and the 90 per cent interest in the partnership, now greatly reduced in value as the partnership no longer owned the land, to another non-Higgs company for £275. Finally, a Higgs company contracted under an agency agreement to carry out the development of the land for the purchaser in such a way as to yield to the purchaser £287,135. In accordance with a prior understanding which was part of the overall scheme the Higgs company was put in funds for that purpose by the trustees of the settlement lending the company the £170,000 which they had received for the 90 per cent share in the partnership. For 1960-61 Mr Higgs was assessed to tax on £170,000 in respect of profits of 'the trade of land dealer and developer'. It was contended by Mr Higgs that he was not liable to tax on that sum since (i) the £170,000 did not represent the profit of any 'trade' within the meaning of the Income Tax Act 1952, ss 123^a (Sch D, Case I) and 526 (1)^b, in which he had been engaged, (ii) the £170,000 was not 'income' to which he was entitled within the Income Tax Act 1952, s 148^c, since it had been received as capital in the hands of the trustees. The commissioners upheld the assessment to tax in principle but reduced the assessment on Mr Higgs to nil on the basis that the trustees had received the £170,000 'on the understanding that they would pass it on for the purpose of the scheme; if the exploitation of the properties should not turn out as profitable as expected there is no knowing whether they would ever get it back in full'. Megarry J^d dismissed Mr Higgs's appeal holding that the scheme as a whole had the flavour of trade and Mr Higgs's activity fell within the statutory concept of trade. He upheld the assessment against Mr Higgs and allowed the Crown's cross-appeal against the reduction of the assessment on Mr Higgs to nil. He dismissed the Crown's appeal in respect of the assessment on the trustees as an alternative to assessment on Mr Higgs. Mr Higgs appealed against the assessment on him in the sum of £170,000, and the Crown appealed against the discharge of the alternative assessment on the trustees.

Held – (i) Looking at the transactions as a whole the sum of £170,000 received by the trustees from the sale of the 90 per cent interest in the partnership could not be regarded as the proceeds of sale of a capital asset. Taking into account the fact that everyone concerned was acting at Mr Higgs's behest and the fact that it was his personal action which enabled the assets of the companies, which he and Mrs Higgs controlled, to be exploited for the benefit of their own interests rather than for the profit of those companies, it was clear that the reality of the transactions, which shone through when regarded as a whole, was that the profit of £170,000 was taken at a particular point in the transactions where Mr Higgs wanted it to be taken. In the result, the part played by Mr Higgs in the series of transactions amounted to trade or an adventure in the nature of trade within the meaning of s 526 (1) of the

^b Section 526 (1), so far as material, provides: 'In this Act . . . "trade" includes every trade, manufacture, adventure or concern in the nature of trade . . .'

^c Section 148 provides: 'Tax under Schedule D shall be charged on and paid by the persons receiving or entitled to the income in respect of which tax under that Schedule is in this Act directed to be charged.'

a 1952 Act from which the profit of £170,000 accrued (see p 685 h to p 686 c, p 695 d to j, p 696 b to d and p 699 e, post).

(ii) Mr Higgs was not, however, liable to be assessed to tax on the profit of £170,000 under s 148 of the 1952 Act since he had not received that sum nor was he 'entitled' to it. The word 'entitled' in s 148 meant 'legally entitled'. It was the trustees and not Mr Higgs who were legally entitled to the sum. Accordingly the trustees were liable to be assessed to tax on the profit of £170,000 and the appeals of Mr Higgs and the Crown would be allowed (see p 686 d e and h, p 696 d to f and p 699 e, post).

b Per Roskill LJ. If it is desired to contend on the hearing of a case stated that there was no evidence to justify a particular conclusion of fact then a party must ask for the case to include the question whether there was any evidence to justify such a conclusion (see p 681 f, post).

d [The facts of these two cases (which also gave rise to the appeal in Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd v Dickinson, infra, on the issue of trading expenses) disclosed a scheme which, while differing in detail from that in Ransom v Higgs, Motley v Higgs's Settlement Trustees, was similar in scope and purpose; the issues of law raised in the two Downes cases are covered by the decision in the Higgs cases.]

e A company ('Downes'), controlled by a Mr and Mrs Downes, were entitled under a building agreement to develop an estate belonging to a company ('Roodhouse') not controlled by Mr and Mrs Downes, on terms as to payment by Downes of £67,500. Downes sold the benefit of the agreement to a third company for £2,250. Subsequently the benefit of that agreement was acquired by another company ('Opendy'), not controlled by Mr and Mrs Downes, which resold it to a company ('Kilmorie') which was controlled by them on terms under which Kilmorie was to undertake the obligations under the building agreement (including the payment of £67,500) and to pay Opendy £77,250 and interest over the period of development. As a result of intermediate transactions the difference between the original payment of £2,250 and the £77,250 came, as to £60,000, into the hands of trustees of a settlement made by Mrs Downes for the benefit of her family and, as to the balance, into the hands of certain companies participating in the scheme not controlled by Mr and Mrs Downes. In effect Kilmorie paid £77,250 for the benefit of an agreement which had been sold a few days previously for £2,250. In pursuance of their agreement with Opendy in the year ending 31st March 1964 Kilmorie paid Opendy an instalment of the £77,250 amounting to £19,240. In computing its gross profits for the year in question, Kilmorie sought to deduct the sum paid to Opendy as a disbursement 'wholly and exclusively laid out . . . for the purposes of' its trade within s 137 (a)^e of the 1952 Act. That deduction was disallowed. On appeal by Kilmorie the commissioners drew certain inferences of fact. They found, inter alia, that the transactions of which the Kilmorie/Opendy agreement formed part were planned with a view to enabling the development of the land in question 'to be carried out by a company or companies controlled by Mr. Downes and at the same time so arranging matters that if as a consequence of such development a substantial profit arose a large slice of that profit would not attract liability to income tax'. The commissioners concluded that the Opendy/Kilmorie agreement was entered into by Kilmorie with the object of enabling it to develop the land and 'of facilitating the scheme for avoiding liability to income tax'.

e Section 137, so far as material, provides: 'Subject to the provisions of this Act, in computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged under Case I or Case II of Schedule D, no sum shall be deducted in respect of—(a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade . . .'

The commissioners disallowed the deduction and Megarry J^f affirmed their decision. On appeal it was contended by Kilmore that if a trader entered into what, from his point of view, was a trading agreement which provided for the trader to make certain payments, those payments must of necessity be paid exclusively for the purposes of his trade.

Held – The mere fact that a payment was made under a trading contract did not necessarily mean that the payment was a trading expense. Where it was shown that a payment, which could be separated and quantified, had been made by the taxpayer, not for the purpose of making profits, but to acquire some advantage not identifiable as, or related to, the making of profits, that payment was not expenditure ‘wholly and exclusively laid out . . . for the purposes of trade’ within s 137 (a). The payment made by Kilmore to Opendy was not expenditure for the purpose of Kilmore making profits; it was expenditure that Kilmore was required to make reducing its own profits in order that others, parties to different individual transactions which were part of the main scheme, might gain. Accordingly the payment was not deductible and the appeal would be dismissed (see p 691 g, p 692 d and e and p 699 b to e post).

Appeals

(10) Ransom (Inspector of Taxes) v Higgs

The Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts (B James Esq and R A Furtado Esq) stated the following case for the opinion of the High Court. b

1. At a meeting of the commissioners held on 3rd December 1968 Alan Edward Higgs ('Mr Higgs') appealed against the following assessments to income tax: 1960-61, £170,000; 1961-62, £170,000, made on him under Case I of Sch D in respect of profits of the trade of land dealer and developer.

2. The question for decision (shortly stated) was whether a sum of £170,000, received in the circumstances set out below, by the trustees of the settlement referred to below, was assessable to income tax on Mr Higgs as a profit chargeable under Sch D in either of the years of assessment. c

5. The following facts were proved or admitted.

(1) At all material times Mr Higgs and Mrs Higgs were the main or sole shareholders and directors in a number of companies ('the Higgs companies'), which carried on trades of dealing in or developing land. d

(2) At all material times the following companies were either subsidiaries of Harlox Equities Ltd ('Harlox') or associated or connected with Harlox: Laurtpins Building Co Ltd ('Laurtpins'), Nuduch Building Co Ltd ('Nuduch'), Harley Street Securities Ltd ('Harley Street'), Downry Building Co Ltd ('Downry'), and The Palatine Investments Corporation Ltd ('Palatine'). Neither Mr Higgs nor Mrs Higgs held any interest, office or employment at any material time in Harlox or any of Harlox's subsidiaries or in any of the companies associated or connected with Harlox. e

(3) The assessments under appeal arose out of a series of transactions, which began with a deed of partnership dated 1st March 1961 and made between (1) Mrs Higgs (2) Laurtpins and (3) Nuduch, whereby the parties agreed to carry on the business of dealers in and/or developers of land property under the firm name of HLN Properties ('HLN') from 1st March 1961. The partnership was determinable by any partners on service of seven days' written notice, but not by death or retirement. The partners were entitled to capital and assets in the proportions of 90 per cent to Mrs Higgs, 5 per cent to Laurtpins and 5 per cent to Nuduch; and profits and losses were to be divided and borne in the same proportions. The initial capital was £100, £90 of which Mrs Higgs provided from her own money. All partners were required to give equally of their time and service. Any proposed transaction was to be fully discussed and entered into only if a majority of the partners (including Mrs Higgs) so agreed. f

(4) On 29th March 1961 a settlement was made between (1) Mrs Higgs and (2) Gwendoline Stella Pickersgill (who was Mr Higgs's sister) and Harold Josiah Jenkins ('the trustees'), whereby Mrs Higgs irrevocably settled all her right under the deed of partnership to receive a share of profits interest on her share of capital and all moneys due to her on capital account or otherwise in respect of the assets of the partnership but excluding any moneys advanced by her and interest accrued and profits earned before the date of the settlement ('the 90 per cent partnership interest') on discretionary trusts during the appointed period to pay, divide or apply the capital or income of such settled interest among the following beneficiaries: Mr Higgs, and the children or remoter issue of Mr Higgs, his daughter and his son. The settlement contained, inter alia, the usual powers of sale and conversion, maintenance, resettling of beneficiaries' interests' unrestricted power of investment. The trustees were authorised to exercise all powers and discretions notwithstanding any direct or other personal interest in the mode or result of exercise, but they were expressly prohibited from carrying on any trade or business. g a (5) From 1st March 1961 HLN purchased and sold a number of properties in the course of its trade and on 30th March 1961 HLN purchased 27 items of land and houses ('the properties') for the sum of £87,135. Mr Higgs was the vendor of one item, which comprised two small parcels of land at the price of £310, and which were needed to form a possible access to one of the main properties. The vendors of all the other 26 properties were various Higgs companies. The decision to sell the properties to HLN was taken by Mr and Mrs Higgs at informal meetings. The prices for the various parcels, aggregating £87,135, was a little over the cost price at which the properties stood in the books of the vendor companies.

b (6) By letter dated 1st April 1961 Harlox's solicitors (K Tompkins & Co) wrote to the trustees and to their solicitors (Pickering, Kenyon & Co) offering on behalf of unnamed clients, subject to contract, to purchase for £170,000 the 90 per cent partnership interest, the purchase to be by way of option exercisable orally. By letter dated 3rd April 1961 the trustees replied to Harlox's solicitors accepting the offer and its terms, and granted the option signed by the trustees over a 6d stamp on 4th April 1961. Harlox paid £10 for the grant of the option.

c (7) On 4th April 1961 Harlox verbally exercised the option to purchase the 90 per cent partnership interest from the trustees for £169,990, which (together with the £10 paid for the option) made up £170,000.

d (8) By letter dated 4th April 1961 to Mrs Higgs, Laurantpins and Nuduch suggested that Mrs Higgs might care to resign from the partnership. At the foot of the letter was an endorsement of resignation by Mrs Higgs signed over a 6d stamp and dated 4th April 1961.

e (9) On 4th April 1961 the retirement of Mrs Higgs from, and the admission of Harlox to, the partnership was recorded in a memorandum, stamped with a 10s stamp and executed on that date by the companies therein mentioned.

(10) By an agreement dated 4th April 1961 and made between (1) Harlox, Laurantpins and Nuduch (then the partners in HLN) and (2) Harlox, the partners agreed to sell the properties to Harlox at the price of £87,600.

f (11) The following transactions then took place between Harlox and certain of its subsidiaries or associates: (a) by an agreement dated 4th April 1961 Harlox sold the properties and the 90 per cent partnership interest to Harley Street for £286,000. (b) On 5th April 1961 Harley Street sold the 90 per cent partnership interest to Palatine for £275 and by an agreement of the same date sold the properties to Downry for £286,750. No copy of the agreement for sale to Palatine was produced to the commissioners but a copy of the agreement for sale to Downry was annexed thereto. The purpose of the two last-mentioned transactions was not explained to the commissioners; the effect (so far as concerns this case) was that Downry became the owner of the properties.

g (12) Coventry Homesteads Ltd ('Coventry') was an estate agency and a property dealing company controlled by Mr Higgs, and managed for some eight years by Mr Jenkins (one of the trustees of the settlement).

h (13) By an agreement dated 5th April 1961 ('the agency agreement') Downry appointed Coventry its sole agent to lay out, develop and sell or lease the properties; that appointment was to continue for three years. The financial arrangements set out in that agreement were involved and at some points difficult to understand. As the commissioners construed them they were (shortly stated) as follows: (a) Coventry was to produce for Downry, from sales and leases, and after meeting its own and Downry's expenses: first, £87,135 (the same amount as HLN paid for the properties); second, a net yield of £200,000 (i.e. £30,000 more than Harlox paid to the trustees for the 90 per cent partnership interest). (b) If the net yield should be less than £200,000 Coventry would pay Downry the deficiency; if it should be more, the excess should go to Coventry. (c) Coventry was to pay Downry £257,135 (the 'deposited sum'). (d) Downry was to repay Coventry the deposited sum in the manner provided in Part III to the agency agreement. (e) Coventry was to receive a fixed percentage as remuneration, in addition to any such excess as is mentioned in (b) above.

(14) Shortly stated, the financial effect of all those transactions was, broadly, as under:

The Higgs companies sold properties to HLN for	£87,135
The trustees sold the 90 per cent partnership for	£170,000
	£257,135
Coventry deposited with Downry	£257,135
The agency agreement contemplated that the realisation of the properties would produce for Downry (after expenses and Coventry's percentage remuneration) £87,135 plus £200,000	£287,135
When that happened, Coventry would have received back the deposited sum	£257,135

(15) By written authority dated 4th April 1961 the trustees had authorised their solicitors to apply the £170,000 receivable on their behalf from Harlox to the order of Coventry. By a memorandum of the same date the trustees had confirmed their willingness to advance to Coventry the sum of £170,000 on terms that it was to bear interest at 6 per cent and to be repayable on demand. The memorandum was endorsed on the same date by Mr Higgs (on behalf of Coventry), accepting the terms, and again on 5th April 1961 by Mr Higgs (on behalf of Coventry), acknowledging receipt of the £170,000. At the date of the hearing of the appeal the loan was outstanding in full.

(16) The witnesses who gave evidence concerning all those transactions were Mr Higgs, Mrs Higgs and Mr Jenkins. (a) The general idea of the transactions was first suggested to Mr Higgs by his brother-in-law's solicitors; he then consulted his own solicitors, who presented him with the detailed arrangements. He did not understand all the details but he relied on advice that the arrangements would be advantageous from a tax point of view and that the properties would be developed by Coventry. Down to the date of the hearing he had received nothing from the trustees. (b) Mrs Higgs stated that she knew a lot about the transactions at the time, and had discussed them with Mr Higgs and his solicitors. In consequence she went into the partnership, and on advice she made the settlement. She had implicit faith in the trustees and was aware that they could distribute everything to her husband. The commissioners obtained the impression that it was pre-arranged that she should enter into the partnership and make the settlement. Down to the date of the hearing she had derived no financial benefit from any of the transactions except the sum of £180, her share of partnership profits prior to the date of the settlement. (c) Mr Jenkins had been a friend of Mr and Mrs Higgs for 20 years. He stated that he knew his obligations when he became trustee of the settlement and fully understood what was involved. He was advised to accept the offer of £170,000 by his accountants and bank manager. The commissioners obtained the impression that it was prearranged that the trustees should sell the 90 per cent partnership interest to Harlox and lend the proceeds to Coventry.

(17) (a) Mr Higgs's background was as follows. For many years he was employed by the Co-operative Permanent Building Society. In October 1945 he left that employment and went into business on his own account as a mortgage broker, and joined with a builder in forming a building and development company. Since the year 1950-51 any property dealing or development with which he had been concerned was carried out through companies, and he had not personally engaged in any property deals, except to sell two out of some 20 houses which he had acquired and held for 15 years as investments. (b) Mrs Higgs had never dealt in land in her own name, except for selling two out of some 18 houses which she had acquired and held for about 16 years as investments, and except during her partnership venture.

a 6. It was contended on behalf of Mr Higgs; (a) that Mr Higgs had never carried on the trade of a dealer in land or a land developer at any material time; (b) that Mrs Higgs had never carried on such a trade during her life; (c) that the sum of £170,000 sought to be assessed was not a receipt of a trade carried on by either Mr Higgs or Mrs Higgs; (d) that the appeal should be allowed and the assessments discharged.

b 7. (1) It was contended on behalf of the Crown: (a) that all the transactions referred to in sub-paras (3) to (15) inclusive of para 5 above were carried out in pursuance of a single scheme and had to be considered as such; (b) that the operation of the scheme constituted a trading venture in land dealing and development by Mr Higgs; (c) that the profit made from that trading venture amounted to the £170,000 received by the trustees and was assessable on Mr Higgs; (d) that the assessment for whichever was the appropriate year of assessment should be confirmed and the other assessment discharged. (2) *Associated London Properties Ltd v Henriksen (Inspector of Taxes)*¹ was cited on behalf of the Crown.

c 8. The appeal was heard by agreement between the parties at the same time as an appeal² by the trustees against an assessment to income tax for the year 1960-61 in the amount of £170,000. At the hearing the commissioners were requested by the Crown's representative to deal with the assessment on the trustees as an alternative to the assessments on Mr Higgs.

d 9. The commissioners who heard the appeal took time to consider their decision and gave it in writing on 9th January 1969 as follows:

e 'I The formal question for our decision is whether a sum of £170,000 arising from the sale of Mrs. Higgs' interest in the partnership (H.L.N. Properties) represents: a trading profit of her husband, the Appellant in the first appeal: alternatively, the income of the Trustees of Mrs. Higgs' Settlement, the Appellants in the second appeal.

f 'II For the Appellants in both appeals it was broadly contended that none of them had engaged in any trade, and that Mrs. Higgs had only traded in respect of her partnership activity (but not in respect of her partnership interest).

g 'III For the [Crown, it was] contended that all the transactions amounted to a single scheme, which was a trading venture. It was no part of the [Crown's] case that the transactions were a sham, but that viewed as a whole they revealed an organised scheme for profit making. In reply [counsel for Mr Higgs] submitted that it was not enough to show a scheme from which profits emerged: it must also be shown that each participant had engaged in trade.

h 'IV In this decision we use the following terms with the following meanings: By "the Higgs companies" we mean what were called the Higgs Vendor Companies and Coventry Homesteads. By "the Harlox companies" we mean Laurt-pins, Nuduch, Harlox, Harley Street, Downry and Palatine. By "the Higgs interest" we mean Mr. Higgs, Mrs. Higgs, the Trustees and the Higgs companies.

i 'V We draw the following inferences of fact from the nature of the transactions before us as evidenced by the documents and from the oral evidence: (1) all the said transactions were planned in advance at one and the same time, and each was carried through upon the understanding that all subsequent ones would be carried through; (2) the broad object was that properties belonging to Higgs companies would be profitably developed by a Higgs company, but in such a manner that (it was hoped) a large slice of the expected profit would escape Tax. This escaping of Tax explains the complicated chain of transactions and was the reason for the participation therein of the Harlox companies, for which the Harlox group was to receive £30,000; (3) the person who put the scheme into operation and was in control of it throughout was Mr. Higgs; we do not mean by this that he planned or even understood the details, which he left to his professional advisers; what we mean is that we regard the whole scheme as his operation. We regard Mrs. Higgs and the Trustees, as well as the Higgs companies, as persons who acted at his behest and in accordance with his wishes, and we regard the Harlox companies as participating with his agreement and because he was prepared to make it profitable to them. a

'VI (1) To our minds the questions we have to decide are (a) whether the part played by Mr. Higgs constituted a trade or an adventure in the nature of trade carried on by him, the profits of which are assessable to Income Tax under Case I of Schedule D. (We would here say that in our view the Trustees are not themselves engaged in any trade within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts); (b) if so, whether a profit emerged assessable to Income Tax for 1960/61 or 1961/62. (2) On the documents, Mr. Higgs was not himself a party to any of the transactions in the chain; he was however the person who initiated and controlled them, and so far as concerned the parties who constituted the Higgs interest he procured them to act as they did. The scheme as a whole has the flavour of trade; the properties in question were at the outset, we were told, for the most part trading stock of various Higgs companies, and at the conclusion were being developed by a Higgs company. If the development should turn out profitably, the overall profit (using that word in a broad sense) would be retained by one or other of the persons constituting the Higgs interest, after the Harlox companies had received £30,000. If it turned out unprofitable, the position of the Harlox companies would seem to be secure, and the loss would fall on the Higgs interest. (3) If we understand the scheme correctly, the overall profit would emerge in the following way: (a) Coventry would receive remuneration under Clause 11 of its agreement with Downry, and perhaps further remuneration under Clause 14. It was not contended that this would be a profit to Mr. Higgs, and we are not concerned with it. (b) Coventry would expect to receive £257,135 in the manner provided in Clause 13 and Part III of the said agreement. Of this (i) £87,135 would appear to represent the value at which the properties were passed out of the books of the Vendor companies: it was not contended that this would be a profit of Mr. Higgs, and we are not concerned with it. (ii) £170,000 would appear to represent the sum which the Trustees were entitled to receive from the sale of the H.L.N. interest, which sum they advanced to Coventry. It is this which the Crown alleges is a profit to Mr. Higgs. (4) It was urged that Mr. Higgs was not entitled to this £170,000 or to any part of it. Assuming that £170,000 is or will be received by Coventry, and that it is repaid by Coventry to the Trustees, the position is that Mr. Higgs will have placed £170,000 where it suited him to place it, and we do not regard the circumstances that it is not his money as having much weight. (5) In approaching the question whether, in all this, Mr. Higgs embarked on an adventure in the nature of trade, we think it immaterial that part of the object was to avoid tax on £170,000; that was the explanation of the method employed, but the substance of the matter is that what we have in front of us is Mr. Higgs' chosen method of making £170,000 out of the exploitation of the properties. (6) Apart from one small piece of land, Mr. Higgs did not venture any property or capital of his own; it all belonged initially to Higgs companies, but as we see it, it was in reality he who ventured it, and he did so for the purpose of this scheme. There seems to us no other explanation of the action of the Higgs companies in selling the land at what was quite patently a very substantial under-value; no other explanation was offered to us. There is here undoubtedly a background of trade. Although the reported cases afford no example of an activity of this nature being held to be trading, they do indicate that a wide c a variety of different methods of money-making may constitute trades. (7) Our conclusion is that Mr. Higgs engaged in an adventure in the nature of trade in exploiting the properties in this manner.

b 'VII The Crown's contention was that the £170,000 which the Trustees became entitled to receive was profit assessable for either 1960/61 or 1961/62. We do not agree. As we see it, the Trustees received the £170,000 on the understanding that they would pass it on for the purpose of the scheme; if the exploitation of the properties should not turn out as profitable as expected there is no knowing whether they would ever get it back in full. Looking at the scheme as a whole, and on our understanding of the agreement between Coventry and Downry, we think that the development of the properties must yield £30,000 for the Harlox Group and £87,135 (vide VI (3) above) before Mr. Higgs' trading venture produces a profit. We do not know whether this happened in the years before us, but in case it did we uphold the assessments on Mr. Higgs in principle and leave the figures for further examination. The assessment on the Trustees we discharge.'

d 10. Figures were agreed between the parties on 20th June 1969 and on 16th July 1969. The commissioners determined the assessments as follows: 1960-61 assessment reduced to nil; 1961-62 assessment reduced to nil.

11. Immediately after the determination of the appeal the Crown declared their dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court. Mr Higgs also required the commissioners to state a case but subsequently withdrew his demand.

e 12. The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the commissioners' decision reducing both of the assessments under appeal to nil was correct in law.

f On 26th November 1971 Megarry J¹ allowed the Crown's appeal holding that the scheme as a whole had the flavour of trade and that Mr Higgs, having initiated and controlled the various transactions in the scheme, was liable to be assessed to income tax on the profit of £170,000. Mr Higgs appealed.

(14) Motley (Inspector of Taxes) v Higgs's Settlement Trustees

g 1. At a meeting of the commissioners held on 3rd December 1968, Gwendoline Stella Pickersgill and Harold Josiah Jenkins, the trustees of a settlement dated 29th March 1961 and made by Freda Gwendoline Higgs ('the trustees'), appealed against an assessment to income tax made on them under Sch D for the year 1960-61 in the amount of £170,000 in respect of 'Profits in connection with Partnership Interest in H.L.N. Properties'.

h 2. Shortly after the question for decision was whether the sum of £170,000 arising from the disposal of the partnership interest settled by the settlement dated 29th March 1961 was income assessable on the trustees for the year 1960-61.

i 3. The appeal was heard by agreement between the parties at the same time as an appeal by Alan Edward Higgs ('Mr Higgs', husband of Freda Gwendoline Higgs) against assessment to income tax for the years 1960-61 and 1961-62, both in the amount of £170,000 in respect of profits as 'land dealer and developer' in relation to certain properties. At the hearing the commissioners were requested on behalf of the Crown to deal with the assessment on the trustees as an alternative to the assessment on Mr Higgs.

4. In the event the commissioners reduced the assessment on Mr Higgs to nil and allowed the appeal by the trustees.

5. The commissioners stated a case, as required by the Crown, in relation to the appeal by Mr Higgs. Paragraphs 3 to 9 inclusive of that case¹ were incorporated in this case, with the following additional contentions (to paras 6 and 7 respectively):

(i) On behalf of the trustees it was contended that so far as the trustees were concerned, they had only sold an asset and there was no evidence to support any inference that the trustees had at any time carried on trade of any kind.

(ii) On behalf of the Crown it was contended that, if Mr Higgs was engaged in the year 1960-61 in the trading venture of land dealing and development in relation to the properties but was not assessable in respect of the profits thereof by reason of the trustees having received them, then, under s 148 of the Income Tax Act 1952 the trustees were properly assessable in respect thereof.

6. Immediately after the determination of the appeal the Crown declared their dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.

7. The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the decision of the commissioners, allowing the appeal by the trustees, was correct in law.

On 26th November 1971 Megarry J, having held that Mr Higgs was liable to be assessed to income tax on the profit of £170,000, upheld the commissioners' decision to discharge the assessment on the trustees. The Crown appealed.

(9) Dickinson (Inspector of Taxes) v Downes

The Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts (G R East Esq and H G Watson Esq) stated the following case for the opinion of the High Court.

1. At a meeting of the commissioners held on 19th and 20th March 1969 Albert James Downes ('Mr Downes') appealed against an assessment to income tax made on him under Sch D for the year 1961-62 in the sum of £75,000 in respect of profits of himself and his wife as property dealers.

2. At the same time the commissioners heard appeals by A J Downes & Sons Ltd, building contractors ('Downes'), against assessments made on that company to income tax under Sch D for the year 1962-63 in the sum of £75,000 and to profits tax for the chargeable accounting period ended 31st March 1962 in the sum of £11,302 4s 0d tax; by Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd ('Kilmorie') against an assessment to income tax made on that company under Sch D for the year 1964-65 in the sum of £19,240 in respect of profits arising from property development; and by the trustees of Mrs M J Downes's 1962 settlement ('the trustees') against an assessment to income tax made on them under Sch D for the year 1961-62 in the sum of £60,000 in respect of 'Profits in connection with sale of interest in partnership D.P.R. Properties & Co. and development of Landywood Estate'.

3. In the course of the hearing it was agreed that the appeals by Downes against the assessment made on that company should be allowed, and those assessments were accordingly discharged. The commissioners stated separately two cases for the opinion of the High Court relating to the appeals by Kilmorie³ and the trustees⁴.

4. Shortly stated the question for decision on the appeal by Mr Downes was whether he and/or his wife were engaged in the year ended 31st March 1962 in property dealing constituting a trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade.

[Paragraphs 5-9 of the case were in all material respects identical to paras 5-9 of the case stated in *Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd v Dickinson (Inspector of Taxes)*⁵.]

10. It was contended on behalf of Mr Downes: (1) that neither he nor his wife had personally in the course of the transactions relating to the Landywood Estate either acquired or sold any property; (2) that neither of them had been personally engaged a in the year 1961-62 in any property dealing trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade; (3) that the transactions did not constitute a scheme controlled by Mr Downes; (4) that (except for the profit of £394 made by Mrs Downes as a partner in DPR Properties) neither Mr or Mrs Downes made any profit directly or indirectly from any of the above-mentioned transactions.

b 11. It was contended on behalf of the Crown: (1) (a) that the transactions relating to the Landywood Estate were carried out in pursuance of a scheme which should be considered as a whole; (b) that the whole of the scheme commencing with the original building agreement and ending with the development by Kilmorie of the Landywood Estate had been put into effect by or/at the instigation and with the authority of Mr Downes; (c) that the operation of the scheme constituted the carrying on by Mr Downes of an adventure or concern in the nature of trade of property dealing; (d) that Mr Downes made a trading profit therefrom for the year 1961-62 of not less than £60,000 being the amount equal to that received by the trustees of his wife's settlement; (2) alternatively that Mr Downes by participating in the scheme in order that the £60,000 should be received by the trustees of the wife's settlement was carrying on an adventure or concern in the nature of trade of property dealing and made a trading profit of £60,000; (3) that the assessment made on Mr Downes was correct in principle, but should be reduced to the sum of £60,000.

d 12. [The commissioners' decision is set out in para 12 of the case stated in *Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd v Dickinson (Inspector of Taxes)*¹.]

13. Immediately after the determination of the appeal the Crown expressed their dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.

e 14. The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the commissioners' decision set out in para 12, sub-head 4, of the case stated in *Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd v Dickinson (Inspector of Taxes)*² was correct.

f On 26th November 1971 Megarry J³, reversing the decision of the commissioners, held that, as Mr Downes had placed the profit where it suited him, it could not be said that the scheme yielded no profit or that Mr Downes acted gratuitously, and that the assessment on Mr Downes to the extent of £60,000 should, therefore, be restored. Mr Downes appealed.

(13) Grant (Inspector of Taxes) v Downes's Settlement Trustees

g 1. At a meeting of the commissioners held on 19th and 20th March 1969 Dr M J Lees and Mr K N Cooke, the trustees of Mrs M J Downes's 1962 Settlement ('the trustees') appealed against an assessment to income tax made on them under Sch D for the year 1961-62 in the sum of £60,000 in respect of 'Profits in connection with sale of interest in partnership D.P.R. Properties & Co. and development of Landywood Estate'.

h 2. At the same time the commissioners heard appeals by A J Downes & Sons Ltd, building contractors ('Downes'), against assessments made on that company to income tax under Sch D for the year 1962-63 in the sum of £75,000 and to profits tax for the chargeable accounting period ended 31st March 1962 in the sum of £11,302 4s 0d tax; by Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd ('Kilmorie') against an assessment to income tax made on that company under Sch D for the year 1964-65 in the sum of £19,240 in respect of profits arising from property development; and by Albert James Downes ('Mr Downes') against an assessment to income tax made on him under Sch D for the year 1961-62 in the sum of £75,000 in respect of profits of himself and his wife as property dealers.

3. In the course of the hearing it was agreed that the appeals by Downes against the assessments made on that company should be allowed, and those assessments were accordingly discharged. The commissioners stated separately two cases for the opinion of the High Court relating to the appeals by Kilmorie¹ and Mr Downes².

4. Shortly stated the question for decision on the appeal by the trustees was whether Mr Downes and/or his wife were engaged in the year 1961-62 in property dealing constituting a trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade; and whether, if that was so but Mr Downes was not assessable in respect of the profits thereof by reason of the trustees having received them, the trustees were so assessable for that year.

5. It was not argued for the Crown that the trustees themselves carried on any trade assessable to income tax, or that the assessment made on them should be upheld otherwise than as an alternative to an assessment on Mr Downes in the circumstances referred to in the latter part of the preceding paragraph.

[Paragraph 6 incorporated paras 5-9 of the case stated in Dickinson (Inspector of Taxes) v Downes which were in all material respects identical to paras 5-9 of the case stated in *Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd v Dickinson (Inspector of Taxes)*³.]

7. It was contended on behalf of the trustees that neither Mr nor Mrs Downes had been personally engaged in the year 1961-62 in any property dealing trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade, and that the assessment made on the trustees, who had admittedly not themselves carried on any trade assessable to income tax, should accordingly be discharged.

8. It was contended on behalf of the Crown: (1) that Mr Downes or his wife was engaged in the year 1961-62 in an adventure or concern in the nature of trade of property dealing; (2) that he was assessable in respect of the profits of £60,000 resulting therefrom which, as part of the scheme which was put into operation, was paid to the trustees of his wife's settlement; (3) that, in the event of his being held not to be assessable in respect of the profits by reason of the fact that it was not himself or his wife but the trustees who received them, the trustees should be held to be so assessable, and (4) that the assessment made on them should accordingly be confirmed.

9. [The commissioners' decision is set out in para 12 of the case stated in *Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd v Dickinson (Inspector of Taxes)*⁴.]

10. Immediately after the determination of the appeal the Crown declared their dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.

11. The question of law for the opinion of the High Court was whether the commissioners' decisions set out in para 12, sub-head 5, of the case stated in *Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd v Dickinson (Inspector of Taxes)*⁵ was correct.

On 26th November 1971 Megarry J⁶, dismissing the Crown's appeal, held that, as Mr Downes was assessable in respect of the profits, the trustees were not so assessable. The Crown appealed.

(8) Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd v Dickinson (Inspector of Taxes)

The Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts (G R East Esq and H G Watson Esq) stated the following case for the opinion of the High Court.

1. At a meeting of the commissioners held on 19th and 20th March 1969 Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd ('Kilmorie'), a property dealing company which before 27th September 1964 was called Kilmorie (Torquay) Ltd, appealed against an assessment to income a tax made on the company under Sch D for the year 1964-65 in the sum of £19,240 in respect of profits arising from property development.

2. At the same time the commissioners heard appeals by A J Downes and Sons Ltd, building contractors ('Downes'), against assessments made on that company to income tax under Sch D for the year 1962-63 in the sum of £75,000 and to profits tax for the chargeable accounting period ended 31st March 1962 in the sum of £11,302 4s Properties and Co. and development of Landywood Estate'.

3. In the course of the hearing it was agreed that the appeals by Downes against the assessments made on that company should be allowed, and those assessments were accordingly discharged. The commissioners stated separately two cases for the opinion of the High Court relating to the appeals by Mr Downes¹ and the trustees².

d 4. Shortly stated the question for decision on the appeal by Kilmorie was whether payments totalling £19,240 made by that company to Opendy Building Co Ltd ('Opendy') in the year ended 31st March 1964 were admissible as deductions in computing for income tax purposes Kilmorie's trading profits for that year.

e 7. The following facts were proved or admitted.

(1) On 21st March 1962 K J Roodhouse Ltd ('Roodhouse'), Downes and Mr Downes entered into an agreement ('the original building agreement'), the parties thereto being therein referred to as 'the lessor', 'the builders' and 'the guarantor' respectively in relation to the development of the Landywood Estate and the grant of underleases of plots thereon. Mr Downes was a director of, and a substantial shareholder in, Downes. Neither Mr Downes nor Downes was in any way associated with Roodhouse and the original building agreement was negotiated at arm's length. Downes was thereby licensed and authorised to proceed as provided therein with the development of the Landywood Estate and in consideration thereof agreed, inter alia, to pay the lessor the sum of £67,500—£1,000 on signature of the agreement, £4,000 within a month, £15,000 when planning approval was granted, and the balance at the rate of £300 contemporaneously with and on the grant of each of the first 75 underleases and at the rate of £225 contemporaneously with and on the grant of each of the remaining underleases until such time as the whole amount was paid. By cl 6 it was provided that Roodhouse should receive a minimum global yearly ground rent from the underleases of £5,325. Under cl 17 Downes also agreed to pay certain annual sums during the development of the estate (to be cancelled pro tanto against ground rents payable by the underlessees in respect of the same periods). By cl 26
f h Mr Downes as director and principal shareholder of Downes for himself and his personal representatives irrevocably agreed with and guaranteed to Roodhouse, inter alia, that Downes would pay the rents and other sums payable under the agreement, that Downes would duly perform and observe the several stipulations therein and that he, Mr Downes, would pay and make good to Roodhouse any losses sustained by it in respect of the default of Downes in respect of any of those matters.

j (2) The original building agreement stipulated (cl 21) that Downes 'shall not be entitled to assign the benefit of this Agreement'. By a memorandum supplemental thereto dated 29th March 1962 it was, however, agreed that the original building agreement should be assignable subject to certain restrictions. One such restriction was that no sale assignment or transfer of the original building agreement should be made without the prior written consent of Roodhouse as lessor. (The original building agreement and the memorandum supplemental thereto are hereafter referred to as the 'building agreement'.)

1 See Dickinson (Inspector of Taxes) v Downes, p 668, ante.

(3) On 30th March 1962 Downes sold the building agreement to Sproul Bros (Builders) Ltd (a company not connected with Mr and Mrs Downes or any company which they controlled) for the sum of £2,250 and gave the undertakings and accepted the obligations therein contained. The directors of Downes (Mr Downes, Mrs Downes and a Mr G F Southall) considered that that price was a good one fully reflecting the then value of the building agreement. On 31st March 1962, i.e. the next day, Sproul Bros (Builders) Ltd sold the building agreement together with the benefit of the ancillary undertakings and obligations on the part of Downes contained in the contract dated 30th March 1962 to the partnership called DPR Properties (the partners in which were Mrs Downes, Posthart Building Co Ltd ('Posthart') and Rebfrins Building Co Ltd ('Rebfrins')) for the sum of £2,500. By a memorandum dated 4th April 1962, i.e. a few days later, Roodhouse gave consent in writing to the sales of the building agreement to the above-mentioned purchasers and also to three further sales thereof culminating in a sale to Kilmorie.

(4) On 2nd March 1962 Mr Downes's wife settled £10 on the trusts set out in an irrevocable discretionary settlement. That settlement recited, inter alia, that the settlor or other persons might wish thereafter to cause to be paid or transferred to the trustees other sums of money or investments or other property to be by them held on the trusts thereof. The beneficiaries comprised Mr Downes, the children and remoter issue of Mrs Downes by Mr Downes and certain specified charities. The settlement expressly provided that nothing therein should authorise the trustees to carry on any trade or business.

(5) On 7th March 1962 Mrs Downes, Posthart and Rebfrins entered into articles of partnership in which it was agreed that the parties would become partners in the business of dealers in and/or developers of land and property on the terms specified therein. It was agreed, inter alia, that the partnership should be called DPR Properties, that the partners should be entitled to the capital and property for the time being of the partnership and to the goodwill of the business in the following shares, that is to say, Mrs Downes 90 per cent, and Posthart and Rebfrins each 5 per cent thereof, and that the net profits and losses of the business should be divided and borne in the same ratio. The agreement further provided that the partnership should commence forthwith and continue until determined as to any partner by such partner serving on the other seven days' written notice to that effect but that it should not be determined as between the other partners by such notice or by the death or retirement of any partner.

(6) By a deed of gift dated 29th March 1962 Mrs Downes gave her 90 per cent interest in DPR Properties and her other rights under the articles capable of transfer therewith, but excepting moneys (other than in respect of partnership capital) advanced by her to the partnership before or any profits earned before or any interest on capital, or on such moneys accrued before 29th March 1962, to the trustees to hold on the trusts contained in the discretionary settlement.

(7) On 31st March 1962 Messrs K Tompkins and Co, solicitors, wrote to the trustees as follows:

'Trustees of Mrs. Margaret Joan Downes' Settlement

'Dear Sirs,

'D.P.R. Properties

'We act for a London Company whose name we are not yet permitted to disclose. Our clients understand that as Trustees of a Settlement of Mrs. Margaret Joan Downes you own her 90% share in D.P.R. Properties.

a 'Our Clients are interested in purchasing the Trustees interest on the basis of an immediate sale if terms can be agreed. Our Clients have been in communication with Posthart Building Co. Ltd. and Rebfrins Building Co. Ltd. and have obtained from them particulars of the prospects of this partnership and are prepared to offer, subject to contract, the sum of £60,000 for Mrs. Downes' interest in the partnership exclusive of her right to repayment of any monies (other than in respect of partnership capital) advanced to the partnership to date, and excluding her share of any profits earned to date or interest on her capital to date.

b 'We must make it clear that if the deal is to be concluded then it must be done at once as our Clients wish to acquire an interest in the partnership before it proceeds to sell any of its properties.

c 'Our Clients will wish to minimise their liabilities to ad valorem stamp duty payable on a contract for sale or formal assignment. They will, therefore, insist that the transaction is carried through, instead of on contract or assignment, by the trustees giving them an option for £10. to purchase at the price of £59,990 which option can be exercised orally.

d 'They will then arrange with the two above mentioned Companies to enter into the partnership with them and thus obtain the full benefit of what they have paid for without taking an assignment.

'We confirm however that this method of sale is adopted solely to avoid stamp duty.

'Yours faithfully,
K. Tompkins & Co.'

e (8) On 2nd April 1962 the trustees replied to that letter as follows:

'Dear Sirs,

'Trustees M. J. Downes' Settlement

f 'We, the undersigned James McLintock Lees of Lansdowne, Gorway Road, Walsall and Kenneth Noel Cooke of 18 Lichfield Street, Walsall as Trustees of Mrs. Margaret Joan Downes' Settlement thank you for your letter of the 31st March and accept your Clients offer on the terms set out in your letter.

'Yours faithfully,
(Signed) J. McL. Lees
" K. N. Cooke.'

g (9) Following that offer and acceptance the trustees on 4th April 1962 by an undertaking in writing granted to Blakorne Building Co Ltd ('Blakorne') in consideration of the sum of £10 an option to purchase on the terms of the letter dated 31st March 1962 for the sum of £59,990 the share and interest owned by them in DPR Properties, such option to be exercised by Blakorne verbally within three days. On the same day the trustees by a receipt in writing acknowledged receipt from Blakorne of the sum of £59,990.

h (10) On the same day, i.e. 4th April 1962, Mrs Downes resigned as from that date as a partner in DPR Properties, with the consent of Posthart and Rebfrins, and acknowledged the receipt of the sum of £238 1s 8d in full settlement and discharge of all liabilities of the partnership to her. The net profit shown by the trading and profit and loss account of DPR Properties for the period from 7th March 1962 to 4th April 1962 was £437 17s 1d, Mrs Downes's 90 per cent share thereof thus being £394 1s 5d.

j (11) By a memorandum of agreement between Posthart, Rebfrins and Blakorne, also entered into on 4th April 1962, it was agreed that following the retirement of Mrs Downes from the partnership Blakorne, having acquired her share in the partnership, should be admitted to the partnership in substitution for Mrs Downes, and that the partnership should continue on the terms of the articles dated 7th March 1962 under the same style of DPR Properties. a

(12) On 4th April 1962 further agreements were also entered into as follows. (a) An agreement for sale between DPR Properties and Harlox Equities Ltd. By that agreement Harlox Equities Ltd purchased from DPR Properties for the sum of £3,000 the building agreement together with the benefit of the ancillary undertakings and obligations on the part of Downes referred to in sub-para (3) above. (b) An agreement between Blakorne and Harlox Equities Ltd. By that agreement Harlox Equities Ltd purchased from Blakorne at the price of £60,250 the 90 per cent share and interest and all rights of the vendor (formerly belonging to Mrs Downes) in DPR Properties (excluding, however, rights in respect of moneys advanced and interest thereon, if any, and the 90 per cent share of the profits earned to 3rd April 1962, if any). (c) An agreement between Harlox Equities Ltd and Harley Street Securities Ltd. By that agreement Harley Street Securities Ltd purchased as one lot from Harlox Equities Ltd for the price of £76,000 the assets purchased by the latter company under the agreements referred to in (a) and (b) above. b

(13) On the same day, i.e. 4th April 1962, the trustees offered to advance to Kilmoreie the sum of £60,000 on the terms that it would bear interest calculated on a day to day basis at the rate of 6 per cent and be repayable in full or in part on demand. Kilmoreie on that day accepted that advance on those terms, and received it on the following day. c

(14) On that day, i.e. 5th April 1962, an agreement was entered into between Opendy Building Co Ltd ('Opendy') and Kilmoreie relating to the development of the Landywood Estate. That agreement recited, inter alia, that Opendy was entitled to the building agreement, and that it had been agreed between Opendy and Kilmoreie that Kilmoreie would carry out the building and other works thereafter mentioned in conformity with the agreement, and contained the following provisions: Part I (cll 1 to 8 inclusive)—provisions as to estate development; Part II (cll 9 to 12 inclusive)—provisions as to sales/underleases and conveyancing; Part III (cll 13 to 18 inclusive)—financial provisions; Part IV (cll 19 to 23 inclusive)—provisions as to receipt and application of proceeds of letting sale and disposal. Part I of the agreement provided in cl 1 (b): d

'[Kilmoreie] shall exercise all the development rights granted by the agreement and hereby undertakes with [Opendy] to pay all monies becoming due thereunder and observe and perform all the obligations on the part of [Kilmoreie] therein contained and indemnify [Opendy] in respect thereof.' e

Parts III and IV of the agreement included, inter alia, the following provisions: f

'13 (a) The prices/premia payable to [Opendy] for all the lots/plots by [Kilmoreie] or its nominated purchasers/underlessees shall be in aggregate the sum of Seventy-seven thousand two hundred and fifty pounds plus interest and costs in connection with monies borrowed with the consent of [Kilmoreie] by or any other payments incurred by [Opendy] in connection with the property and its development and disposal or arising out of these presents plus all sums payable pursuant to the agreement including the balance unpaid of the global premium and all interim and global rents thereunder and all other outgoings or obligations involving expenditure thereunder (in these presents called "the grand price"). (b) The grand price shall be apportioned to each lot/plot at the rate of Two hundred and sixty pounds or as may be agreed from time to time with [Kilmoreie]. g

'14. In consideration of [Opendy] entering into this agreement, [Kilmoreie] has deposited with [Opendy] the sum of Sixty-two thousand two hundred and fifty pounds . . . h

'18. The said sum of Sixty-two thousand two hundred and fifty pounds shall i a be repayable by periodical instalments as provided in Part IV hereof and in toto after [Opendy] shall have received the grand price.

b '19. [Kilmorie] will forthwith instruct irrevocably K. N. Cooke to act as sole Solicitors to [Opendy] and [Kilmorie] in connection with the sale and disposition of the property and all matters incidental to this agreement (or so far as [Opendy] may become entitled to any interest therein the building works) and shall give to him irrevocable instructions and authority to receive and deal with the proceeds of sales and disposals of the property in manner following and [Opendy] shall if required confirm such irrevocable instructions by Deed inter partes with such Solicitors (a) first in payment for the professional and other usual expenses of such sale or disposal (b) then in repayment of any sums secured on or owing to Bankers or others in respect of the property (c) then as to any balance from time to time remaining in their hands and any sums payable by [Kilmorie] under

c Clauses 13, 16 and 17 hereof in payment as to Fifty pounds per lot/plot to [Opendy] (as a payment on account of the grand price) and as to the balance to [Kilmorie] as an approximate proportionate return of the said sum of Sixty-two thousand two hundred and fifty pounds until [Kilmorie] shall have received a sum equivalent thereto.'

d (15) By a memorandum made between Downes and Kilmorie, also dated 5th April 1962, Kilmorie agreed to observe and perform all the obligations on the part of Downes contained in the original building agreement and gave Downes an indemnity in respect of any breach by Kilmorie of those obligations.

e (16) By a form of tender (undated) for the erection and completion of 302 dwellings for Kilmorie at the Landywood Estate Downes undertook to carry out the works required in that connection in accordance with specified bills of quantities for the sum of £550,622.

f (17) In the years ended 31st March 1963 to 31st March 1967 inclusive gross profits earned (a) by Downes on the development of the Landywood Estate for Kilmorie and (b) by Kilmorie on the development of that estate under agreement with Opendy were computed as follows:

				Gross Profits

j The premiums totalling £19,240 paid to Opendy in the year ended 31st March 1964 were the payments the treatment of which for income tax purposes was in issue between the parties on the appeal by Kilmorie.

(18) Mr and Mrs Downes were at all material times directors of, and shareholders in, a number of private companies carrying on business as builders and land developers, including Downes and Kilmorie, which were both engaged in estate development. Downes, which undertook the building work, had at all material times an issued share capital of £1,000, of which £495 was owned by Mr Downes and a further £495 by Mrs Downes. Kilmorie, which sold houses, had at all material times an issued share capital of £1,000, of which £900 was owned by Mr Downes and £100 by Mrs Downes.

(19) In the course of negotiations leading up to the original building agreement Mr Downes met Mr Meachem, a partner in the firm of solicitors, Tompkins & Co, and it was then suggested to him that a tax saving scheme might be brought into operation which would enable his family to benefit by making a capital profit. He authorised Mr Meachem to proceed with the preparation of such a scheme, and left it to him to evolve it. He did not concern himself with, or indeed fully understand, the details of the scheme as they were worked out, and knew little about the transactions involved in carrying it out subsequent to the sale of the building agreement to Sproul Bros (Builders) Ltd for £2,250. Apart from the fact that his wife was in partnership with them, he had no connection with Posthart or Rebfrins and he knew nothing of Blakorne, Harlox Equities Ltd or Harley Street Securities Ltd and had not been concerned with how Opendy came to be entitled to the building agreement. Mr Meachem, who had introduced him to Sproul Bros (Builders) Ltd, acted for Opendy, and settled with him the amount of the premiums to be paid by Kilmorie to that company. It was expected that Kilmorie would make a profit after deducting the premiums payable to Opendy but the actual profits made both by Downes and Kilmorie exceeded expectations.

(20) Apart from her association with DPR Properties, Mrs Downes was at no time engaged in carrying on any business in partnership. It was suggested to her by Messrs Tompkins & Co that it would be to the benefit of her family to form the partnership known as DPR Properties. She paid from her own bank account £90 in respect of her share of the partnership capital. When the trustees had sold her 90 per cent interest in the partnership to Blakorne she resigned from it because there did not then seem to be any point in her carrying on as a partner therein.

8. In the course of his evidence Mr Downes said, inter alia, that there were no arrangements as to what Sproul Bros (Builders) Ltd were to do with the building agreement, and that it was not necessarily the case that it was always clear that one of his companies would develop the land. The commissioners were not, however, satisfied, and did not accept, that it was not anticipated when Sproul Bros (Builders) Ltd acquired the building agreement that they would thereupon resell it to DPR Properties, or that it was contemplated that the development of Landywood Estate might be carried out otherwise than by a company or companies actually controlled by Mr Downes. On reviewing the evidence the commissioners drew therefrom the inferences of fact set out in sub-head 2 of their decision (see para 12 below).

10. It was contended on behalf of Kilmorie: (1) that the agreement between Kilmorie and Opendy dated 5th April 1962 was a proper commercial agreement entered into at arm's length between companies which were unassociated and was intended to and did in fact yield a substantial profit for Kilmorie from the conducting of its trade as an estate developer; (2) that the premiums paid by Kilmorie to Opendy thereunder were wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade of Kilmorie; (3) that the premiums were thus an admissible deduction in computing for income tax purposes the trading profits of Kilmorie for the year ended 31st March 1964.

11. It was contended on behalf of the Crown: (1) that the agreement between Kilmorie and Opendy dated 5th April 1962 was entered into for reasons which were not wholly commercial; (2) that the premiums paid by Kilmorie to Opendy thereunder a were not wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade of Kilmorie; (3) that the premiums were not accordingly admissible as a deduction in computing for income tax purposes the trading profits of Kilmorie for the year ended 31st March 1964.

b 12. The commissioners took time to consider their decision on the appeal by Kilmorie and on the appeals by Mr Downes and the trustees which were also before them and gave it in writing on 2nd May 1969 as follows:

c '1. On these appeals the questions for our determination are whether payments by Kilmorie (Aldridge) Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as "Kilmorie") to Opendy Building Co. Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as "Opendy") totalling £19,240 in the year to 31st March 1964, fall to be deducted in computing the profits of the trade of property development carried on by Kilmorie assessable to income tax for the year 1964/65; whether Albert James Downes (hereinafter referred to as "Mr. Downes") is assessable to income tax for the year 1961/62 on profits from property dealing in respect of a sum of £75,000 arising from the sale and purchase of a building agreement to develop Landywood Estate (an estate thereafter developed by Kilmorie); and whether if he is not so assessable the Trustees of Mrs. M. J. Downes 1962 Settlement (hereinafter referred to as "the Trustees") are chargeable to income tax for the year 1961/62, as persons receiving or entitled to income in respect of which tax under Schedule D is directed to be charged, in respect of a sum of £60,000 being part of the sum arising from the sale and purchase of the said building agreement.

e '2. These questions arise out of transactions relating to the development of Landywood Estate which took place shortly before the end of the income tax year 1961/62. Having carefully reviewed the evidence before us, both documentary and oral, regarding these transactions, we draw the following inferences of fact therefrom:—(1) The whole series of transactions was planned from the outset and each of the transactions in the series was carried through in the expectation that all subsequent ones would also be carried through. (2) The said transactions were planned with a view to enabling the development of Landywood Estate to be carried out by a company or companies controlled by Mr. Downes and at the same time to so arranging matters that if as a consequence of such development a substantial profit arose a large slice of that profit would not attract liability to income tax. (3) Mr. Downes, having authorised the preparation of such a scheme, left its detailed working out to his professional advisers. The scheme as it was worked out involved arrangements whereby certain companies not controlled by Mr. Downes participated in it.

g '3. As regards the question before us relating to Kilmorie, the agreement entered into by that company with Opendy in relation to the Landywood Estate building agreement was an essential prerequisite to the carrying out by Kilmorie of the development of the estate. It proved, moreover, in the event to be very much to the advantage of Kilmorie to enter into the first-mentioned agreement (hereinafter referred to as "the Kilmorie/Opendy agreement") on the terms specified therein. We have, however, to consider the position at the time when the Kilmorie/Opendy agreement was made, and against the background of the series of transactions which led up to it. So approaching the matter we are of opinion that the Kilmorie/Opendy agreement was entered into by Kilmorie with the object both of enabling that company to develop the Landywood Estate and of facilitating the scheme for avoiding liability to income tax referred to in paragraph 2 (2) above. In our view the latter object was on the facts of the case one of the main purposes, and not a mere secondary consequence, of the entering into by Kilmorie of the agreement, and the outlay totalling £19,240 was thus incurred by Kilmorie for dual purposes being purposes one of which was, and one of which was not, a trading purpose. We find accordingly that that outlay is, having regard to the provisions of Section 137 (a) of the Income Tax Act, 1952, not allowable as a deduction in computing the profits of the trade of Kilmorie. We therefore conclude that the appeal made by that company fails, and hereby confirm the additional assessment to income tax against which it was made, that is to say, the additional assessment on the company for the year 1964/65 in the sum of £19,240. a

'4. As regards the question before us regarding Mr. Downes, it does not appear that he or his wife at any time undertook personally any sale or purchase in connection with the transactions affecting Landywood Estate. He authorised the preparation of the scheme referred to in paragraph 2 above and so was concerned in putting in train transactions which led to the receipt by the Trustees of a substantial slice of the profits derived from the development by Kilmorie of the Landywood Estate. Viewing the facts as a whole, however, it seems to us that while he was interested personally (as distinct from as a director or shareholder in companies controlled by him) in this aspect of the matter neither he nor his wife was at any time engaged in carrying on personally in relation to the estate any trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade. We hold therefore that his appeal succeeds, and hereby discharge the assessment to income tax against which it was made, that is to say, the assessment on him for the year 1961/62 in the sum of £75,000. b

'5. As regards the question before us regarding the Trustees, it was not sought on behalf of the Crown to contend that they themselves carried on any trade assessable to income tax, or to support the assessment against which they appealed otherwise than in the event of Mr. Downes or his wife being held to have been carrying on personally a trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade but of Mr. Downes nevertheless not being held to be assessable in respect of the profits thereof by reason of such profits having been received by the Trustees. Following our decision set out above on the appeal made by Mr. Downes we accordingly hold also that the appeal made by the Trustees succeeds, and hereby discharge the assessment to income tax against which it was made, that is to say, the assessment on them for the year 1961/62 in the sum of £60,000.' c

13. Immediately after the determination of the appeal Kilmorie declared its dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court. d

14. The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the commissioners' decision set out in para 12, sub-head 3, above, was correct in law. e

On 26th November 1971 Megarry J¹ held that the contract between Kilmorie and Opendy had a dual purpose, one of which was to avoid liability to tax, and hence premiums paid by Kilmorie to Opendy under the contract were not deductible expenses from Kilmorie's profits, and dismissed the appeal. Kilmorie appealed. f

ROSKILL LJ read the first judgment at the invitation of Russell LJ. Two matters at least are clear in relation to the first four of these five appeals. First, in relation to what I shall for brevity call 'the Higgs transactions' a profit of £170,000 emerged for i a the benefit of the Higgs interests. This was always the object of these transactions. Secondly, in relation to what I shall for brevity call 'the Downes transactions' a profit of £60,000 emerged for the benefit of the Downes interests. This was always the object of these transactions. The two complex and ingenious schemes which have been considered over many days in this court were devised not only so as to enable those large sums by way of profit to be earned but also to ensure that those large sums were if possible earned in a manner which would secure that there would be no resultant liability to income tax on them. The question to be determined in the first four appeals is whether that objective has been achieved. The fifth appeal which also arises in relation to the Downes transactions raises an entirely separate question. I do not propose to set out or discuss the details of these schemes which will be found fully described in the relevant special cases.

c The Crown contend that each of these large sums attracts income tax under Case I of Sch D by reason of s 122 (1) (a) (ii) and s 123 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952. Section 122 (1) provides (so far as relevant) as follows:

d 'Tax under this Schedule shall be charged in respect of—(a) the annual profits or gains arising or accruing . . . (ii) to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any trade . . . whether carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere . . .'

Section 123 (1) provides (so far as relevant):

e 'Tax under Schedule D shall be charged under the following Cases respectively, that is to say—Case I—tax in respect of any trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere . . .'

Section 526 (1) defines trade as including 'every trade, manufacture, adventure or concern in the nature of trade'. Section 148 provides:

f 'Tax under Schedule D shall be charged on and paid by the persons receiving or entitled to the income in respect of which tax under that Schedule is in this Act directed to be charged.'

The Crown argued that these profits were profits of trade, the relevant trade having been carried on by Mr Higgs in the year 1960-61 and by Mr and Mrs Downes in the year 1961-62. Nothing turned on the fact (as counsel for the Higgs interests accepted at a very early stage of the argument in these appeals) that no assessment had been sought to be made on Mr Higgs in respect of alleged trading by both Mr and Mrs Higgs whereas in the case of the Downes transactions the assessment was in respect of alleged trading by both Mr and Mrs Downes. In the case of the Higgs transactions, the Crown argued that there had been trading or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade by Mr Higgs in 1960-61 which had yielded this profit and that Mr Higgs was the person receiving or entitled to the income in respect of which the tax was directed to be charged. Alternatively the Crown argued that if it were a fact that Mr Higgs had been trading but by reason of the provisions of the Higgs transactions Mr Higgs was not the person receiving or entitled to the income and for this latter reason only was not chargeable to tax under s 148, the Higgs trustees were the persons so receiving or entitled to the income and were thus properly chargeable to tax under that section. Similarly in the case of the Downes transactions the Crown argued that there had been trading or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade by Mr and Mrs Downes in 1961-62 which had yielded this profit and that they were the persons receiving or entitled to the income in respect of which the tax was directed to be charged and that in those circumstances the assessment had been properly raised against Mr Downes. Alternatively the Crown argued that if it were the fact that Mr and Mrs Downes had been trading but by reason of the provisions of the Downes transactions were not the persons receiving or entitled to the income and for this latter reason only Mr Downes was not chargeable to tax under s 148, the Downes trustees were the persons so receiving or entitled to the income and were thus properly chargeable to tax under that section.

No attempt was ever made to claim that either the Higgs trustees or the Downes trustees had themselves been trading or engaged in an adventure or concern in the nature of trade and counsel for the Crown properly accepted that this contention was not open to the Crown in this court. It follows that if there were no trading by either Mr Higgs or by Mr and Mrs Downes the entire claim for tax in the first four appeals fails. The alternative claim against each set of trustees is dependent on proof of trading by Mr Higgs in the one case and by Mr and Mrs Downes in the other case. The Special Commissioners in Mr Higgs's case concluded that he had been engaged in an adventure in the nature of trade and upheld the assessments on him in principle but reduced the assessment to nil and left the figures for further examination. They discharged the assessment on the Higgs trustees. The Special Commissioners in Mr Downes's case, who were differently constituted from the Special Commissioners in Mr Higgs's case, took a different view. They held that neither Mr nor Mrs Downes had personally undertaken any relevant sale or purchase in connection with the transactions in question and that accordingly neither was at any time engaged in carrying on personally any trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade. They accordingly allowed Mr Downes's appeal and discharged the assessment on him. Consistently with that conclusion they also discharged the assessment on the Downes trustees.

Mr Higgs appealed. The Crown cross-appealed against the reduction of the assessment on Mr Higgs to nil and also against the Higgs trustees. The Crown appealed against both Mr Downes and against the Downes trustees. Megarry J¹ dismissed Mr Higgs's appeal, allowed the Crown's appeal against the reduction of the assessment to nil but consistently with his view of the matter dismissed the Crown's appeal against the Higgs trustees. He allowed the Crown's appeal against Mr Downes but—again consistently with his view—dismissed the Crown's appeal against the Downes trustees.

Thus the crucial question is whether either Mr Higgs or Mr and Mrs Downes were at the material times engaged in any trade or in any adventure or concern in the nature of trade. It was to this issue that the greater part of the argument in this court was directed.

Before dealing with this question, it will be convenient to dispose of another matter which is peculiar to Mr Higgs's appeal. Counsel for Mr Higgs challenged a number of the conclusions or inferences of fact contained in para 9 V and VI of the special case in Mr Higgs's case². I list only the more important of those conclusions or inferences of which he complained as unwarranted or unsupported by the evidence. 1. Mr Higgs was the person who was in control of the scheme throughout. 2. Mrs Higgs, the Higgs trustees and the Higgs companies all acted at Mr Higgs's behest and in accordance with Mr Higgs's wishes. 3. The Harlox companies participated with Mr Higgs's agreement and because Mr Higgs was prepared to make it profitable for the Harlox companies to do so. 4. Mr Higgs was the person who initiated and controlled the transactions and procured the parties who constituted the Higgs trustees to act as they did. 5. The scheme as a whole had the flavour of trade. 6. As the result of the Higgs transactions Mr Higgs succeeded in placing £170,000 where it best suited him to place it. 7. The substance of the matter was that what was before the Special Commissioners was Mr Higgs's chosen method of making £170,000 out of the exploitation of the properties. 8. In reality it was Mr Higgs who ventured the property and capital of the Higgs companies for the purposes of the scheme. 9. The Higgs companies sold the land at what was quite patently a very substantial under-value.

a Counsel argued that there was no evidence to justify these various conclusions or inferences of fact and it was therefore not only open to the court but it was the duty of the court to ignore these findings. Reliance was placed by both counsel, Mr Beattie and Mr Walton, in this connection on the speeches in the House of Lords in *Cameron v Prendergast*¹ per Viscount Maugham and in *Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow*² per Viscount Simonds³ and Lord Radcliffe⁴. But, as counsel for the Crown pointed out, in both those cases their Lordships were concerned with findings, conclusions or inferences (whichever word be used) of a very different kind from those here sought to be challenged. In *Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow*² the Special Commissioners had (as the House of Lords ultimately held, wrongly) reached a conclusion that the transaction there in question was not an adventure in the nature of trade which was quite contrary to the remainder of their findings. It was, in Lord Radcliffe's phrase⁵, a 'determination obviously erroneous in point of law' having regard to the facts found. Counsel for the Crown also drew our attention to two decisions of Devlin J, *Nello Simoni v A/S M/S Straum*⁶ and *Royal Greek Government v Minister of Transport*⁷. In the latter case the learned judge clearly expressed the view that all conclusions of fact including inferences of fact were for the tribunal of fact. In the former case, he observed, that if a party thinks that a tribunal of fact may reach a conclusion of fact which there is no evidence to support, he can ask that tribunal to leave as a question of law whether there is any evidence to justify that conclusion. In the field of commercial arbitration this has long been recognised as the position: see *Gillespie Bros & Co v Thompson Bros & Co*⁸ per Atkin LJ, and *Tersons Ltd v Stevenage Development Corpn*⁹ per Upjohn LJ—both decisions of this court. It would also seem to have been recognised as the position in Revenue cases for even longer: see *New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v Stephens (Surveyor of Taxes)*¹⁰ per Moulton LJ¹¹ and Farwell LJ¹², another decision of this court which does not appear to have been cited in this connection either in Revenue or in commercial arbitration cases until the present appeals. In *Tersons Ltd v Stevenage Development Corpn*¹³ Pearson LJ said in terms that normally it would be conclusions inferred or deduced from primary findings which could properly be made the subject of such a special case.

f The principles laid down in these cases are well established and nothing said in *Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow*², which was considered by this court in *Tersons Ltd v Stevenage Development Corpn*¹⁴ contradicts them. If it is desired to contend on the hearing of a special case that there was no evidence to justify a particular conclusion of fact then a party must ask for the case to include the question whether there was any evidence to justify such a conclusion. If he does not do so then that question is not before the court because the court does not know what evidence was called before the tribunal of fact, and if that question is not before the court then the conclusion sought to be complained of can only be attacked if other findings in the case make it perverse or manifestly wrong in law. That clearly is not so in the present case. The Special Commissioners heard evidence (see para 5 (16) of the case¹⁵). We do not know what that evidence was. Very properly it is not exhibited to the special case. The Special Commissioners were not asked to exhibit that evidence nor indeed fully to summarise it. a

In Revenue cases the parties have the advantage, denied to parties in commercial arbitrations, of seeing a draft of the special case in advance. There should therefore be no practical difficulty in seeking the statement of the requisite question of law, if necessary as an additional question, whether there was any evidence to justify a particular conclusion at which the Special Commissioners proposed to arrive. This was not done in the present case. Though in my judgment it is clearly open to the Higgs interests to argue on the facts found that there was no relevant trade or adventure in the nature of trade being carried on, it is not in my judgment open to them now to challenge the findings, conclusions or inferences of fact of which counsel for Mr Higgs sought to complain in this court or to seek to argue the question whether or not there was any trade or adventure in the nature of trade carried on by Mr Higgs otherwise than by reference to the facts, conclusions and inferences found or drawn by the Special Commissioners. b

I would only add that there is no reflection in the judgment of Megarry J¹ of this issue having been discussed before him though we were told by counsel for Mr Higgs that it had been raised at the hearing in that court. c

I therefore turn to consider the crucial issue of 'trade' in relation to the Higgs transactions. It is important to observe certain basic facts which underlie this highly ingenious scheme. If the Higgs companies had themselves developed the properties in question, there could be no doubt that each of those companies would have been liable to tax on any relevant profit which each made. It was of the essence of this scheme that the companies, instead of themselves realising these properties for gain, should be required to part with them at what the Special Commissioners found was 'quite patently a very substantial under-value'. The reason for this is obvious. The potential profit to which the development of these properties would lead was not to be taken by their original owners. The profit was to be taken at a different and later point in the transactions as a result of which the trustees, who had paid nothing for the 90 per cent partnership interest which had been settled on them gratuitously by Mrs Higgs, would receive £170,000 from the sale of the partnership interest to a Harlox company. The trustees were then to hold that sum on discretionary trusts for beneficiaries of whom Mr Higgs was one while Harlox received £30,000 for their involvement in the scheme. Put in other words, the scheme in total threw up a profit of £200,000 divided in the proportions of £170,000 to the Higgs trustees and £30,000 to the Harlox interests. d

The essence of counsel for Mr Higgs's arguments was that the trustees derived £170,000 from the sale of an asset which had been settled on them on these discretionary trusts. It was not, they said, a Revenue profit. It was a capital profit. Still less, it was argued, was this a Revenue profit deriving from any trading by Mr Higgs. Mr Higgs had not traded at all. Nor had he engaged in any adventure or concern in the nature of trade. His part and the part played by Mrs Higgs had been limited to actions as directors and controlling shareholders in the Higgs companies. Those companies were in law separate and distinct entities from their directors and controlling shareholders. In these circumstances it was contended that it was impossible to say that Mr Higgs ever traded in anything at all let alone in property or land as the Crown had sought to assert. Mr Higgs had ventured nothing. The companies had ventured the properties. The Crown's case was an attempt either to charge a shareholder to tax in respect of something done by the company in which he held shares or to charge a director to tax in respect of transactions into which he had caused the company to enter. All the relevant acts were acts of the companies and not of Mr Higgs. e a The Crown challenged that it was legitimate to break down this elaborate scheme to a large number of isolated component parts and then having done this to concentrate on a single element in the scheme, the receipt of the £170,000 by the trustees in return for the sale of the partnership interest and then to claim that that was an isolated sale by the trustees of a capital asset. The entirety of the scheme had to be regarded in the light of the findings of fact by the Special Commissioners and in particular their findings as to the precise part which Mr Higgs played in carrying the b entire scheme through. The scheme was devised by Mr Higgs's professional advisers but on the findings he was the person who put the scheme into operation and was in control throughout. The Special Commissioners had regarded the scheme as his operation and everyone else as playing his or her allotted part at Mr Higgs's behest.

c Reliance was placed on behalf of the Crown on the approval by the House of Lords in *Ducker v Rees Roturbo Development Syndicate Ltd*¹ per Lord Buckmaster of the test earlier laid down by the Inner House of the Court of Session in *Californian Copper Syndicate (Limited and Reduced) v Harris (Surveyor of Taxes)*² per the Lord Justice-Clerk: '... is it a gain made in an operation of business in carrying out a scheme for profit-making?' It was argued that there was in the present case a gain and that the scheme was clearly one for profit-making and if possible for profit-making free of d tax. That the scheme was designed to secure that any profit was free of tax seems to me to be irrelevant. The question—accepting this definition—is whether it was a gain in an operation of business in carrying out such a scheme and that brings one back to the crucial question whether or not Mr Higgs was trading or engaged in an adventure or concern in the nature of trade.

e The question may be put in slightly different language. On the facts found did Mr Higgs organise a commercial adventure designed to produce a profit? The companies which he and Mrs Higgs controlled owned this land and property. The assets were potentially extremely valuable. It was desired to exploit those assets. If those assets were to be exploited most advantageously to the companies, tax would be payable on the companies' profits. But it was thought that there was a way of exploiting the land and the properties in a way less advantageous for the companies because
f they would have to sell at an under-value but more advantageous to the Higgs interests. This potential profit could be earned provided Mr Higgs and others at his behest did or concurred in doing certain acts beneficial to themselves or to their intended beneficiaries though not to the companies. Mr Higgs and the others at his behest did or concurred in doing those acts. Those were acts of exploitation of the companies' assets designed to produce these profits out of dealings in land and property which the implementation of the scheme as a whole involved.

g Counsel for the Crown invited us to consider an imaginary conversation between Mr Higgs and a representative of the Harlox interests at the time of the inception of the scheme. He suggested that Mr Higgs would say that he was in a position to arrange a deal whereby the Harlox group for an outlay of some £275,000 would get land or property worth some £287,000 with a resale price underwritten by Coventry to the extent of £257,000 down. Mr Higgs's return would be that the Harlox interests
h would devote £170,000 of the outlay to purchasing from trustees acting at his behest a partnership interest to be vested in those trustees for nothing for the purpose of selling that interest to the Harlox interests for £170,000. Counsel for the Crown stressed that if the Harlox interests had asked Mr Higgs how this could be done, Mr Higgs would have replied 'by exploiting my interests and getting my wife to exploit her interests in the companies of which we are the directors and controlling i shareholders'.

To my mind the crucial factor in this case is that the acts of the companies which were an essential prerequisite to the achievement of the scheme were not in any real sense acts of the companies carried out in those companies' own interests. They were acts forced on or enjoined on the companies by Mr Higgs and those acting with him against the companies' own interests but in the interests of those who controlled the companies. The dominating actor was Mr Higgs. He was exploiting the companies and his necessary fellow actors are found to have been acting at all times at his behest.

Much reliance was placed in argument before us on two recent decisions of the House of Lords, *F A & A B Ltd v Lupton (Inspector of Taxes)*¹ and *Thomson (Inspector of Taxes) v Gurneville Securities Ltd*². It is not necessary to consider the highly complex facts of those two cases. Suffice it to say that in neither case was the taxpayer held entitled to offset under s 341 of the Income Tax Act 1952 losses said to have been incurred, on the ground that the transactions in question, having been entered into for fiscal purposes, were not trading transactions, the relevant trade being said by the taxpayer to have been that of a dealer in shares. It was argued on the basis of those decisions that because dividend stripping operations had there been held not to be normal trading by way of dealing in shares, the Higgs transactions (which like the Downes transactions it was accepted were stock stripping transactions) could not in law be held to be trading or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade. With all respect to this argument which was so strongly pressed on us, the question is not what were or were not trading transactions in other cases but whether on the facts found by the Special Commissioners Mr Higgs was in relation to the Higgs transactions engaged in trade or in an adventure or concern in the nature of trade.

Mr Walton, following Mr Beattie in relation to the Higgs appeal, insisted that none of the transactions bore any badges of trade on the part of Mr Higgs. All Mr Higgs did was first to persuade his wife to go into partnership with others and make a settlement of that 90 per cent partnership interest; secondly, to persuade or 'cajole' (the word was counsel's) the Higgs companies into selling the land and property at an under-value, and thirdly to make the relevant arrangements with the Harlox group and with Coventry. But, counsel argued, every relevant act by Mr Higgs was an act done as a director of or shareholder in the Higgs companies acting in concert with the other directors and shareholders concerned. Each crucial act, he said, was the act of the company concerned and not the act of Mr Higgs. Even the final act by Coventry, he said, was the act of that company and not of Mr Higgs. No single step taken was a trading step by Mr Higgs who was not paid for anything he did. All he did was to induce others to join with him in getting the various companies to implement the scheme which was not and could not be trading or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade.

Counsel for the Crown compared the activities of Mr Higgs with those of a broker arranging a deal between two other parties from which the broker derived a profit of £170,000. He submitted that the reality of the totality of the scheme must be looked at and that reality, he claimed, shone through when the scheme was regarded as a whole. For my part I venture to doubt whether analogies are of assistance in seeking to solve the crucial problem. But I accept that the scheme must be looked at as a whole. So looked at it was a scheme for realising the values of these properties in a manner which attracted for the benefit of the Higgs interests a profit of £170,000. Mr Higgs was, as I have already said, the main actor, everyone else concerned acting at his behest. Mr Higgs was in a position to secure and did secure that the exploitation of these properties, which the owning companies were required to sell at a substantial under-value as part of the scheme, produced this profit at the point in the implementation of the scheme at which it most suited him and the Higgs interests that that profit should arise. Mr Higgs was the only person embraced in the phrase 'the Higgs interests' who stood to gain any benefit from the transactions. The vendor companies were losers. The trustees were a mere vehicle for the implementation a of the scheme. Mrs Higgs did not stand to gain at all. On the contrary she settled her 90 per cent partnership interest gratuitously. And Coventry was Mr Higgs's final chosen means whereby the exploitation of these properties was to be accomplished.

The question was repeatedly asked during the argument: if this were trading by Mr Higgs or an adventure or concern on his part in the nature of trade, what was the name of this trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade? I accept that the difficulty in naming the trade may be a reason for doubting whether such a trade, b adventure or concern is being carried on. But the difficulty is to my mind in no way conclusive against the carrying on of a trade, adventure or concern. The important question is not the name but whether the acts in question amount to trading or to an adventure or concern in the nature of trade. If a name has to be found, I do not see why it should not be said that Mr Higgs was on the facts found trading in the exploitation of the properties owned by the Higgs companies or engaged in an adventure or c concern in the nature of trade of that description.

In *Barry v Cordy (Inspector of Taxes)*¹, a case much canvassed in argument, the Crown did not seek to say that the taxpayer was dealing in life insurance policies but the Court of Appeal had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that what the taxpayer was doing in relation to his acquisition and disposal of such policies came within d the words 'trade' and 'adventure'. I cannot find anywhere in the judgment of this court delivered by Scott LJ that a name was given to the trade or adventure in which the taxpayer was held to have been engaged.

Many authorities were referred to in the course of the argument where questions of trade had arisen. In some of them the Crown succeeded. In others the taxpayer succeeded. I do not find it necessary to review these authorities each one of which e turns on its own facts as found by the tribunal of fact concerned. The question is not whether this case is like another case or is unlike another case. The question is whether on the facts as found the Crown has proved that Mr Higgs was engaged in trading or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade in 1960-61, and that the profit of £170,000 was a profit accruing from that trade or adventure. This question has to be answered by applying the facts as found to the sections of the statute which I have f quoted.

In many cases the question which side of the line a particular case falls will be entirely or almost entirely a question of fact or degree for the tribunal of fact and in such cases the court will not interfere with the conclusion of that tribunal even though the court itself or a differently constituted tribunal of fact might have reached a different conclusion. In the present case the relevant facts have been found against Mr Higgs, but I do not regard that as conclusive against him if he can show that on g the facts so found the Special Commissioners have reached a conclusion unjustified by those facts or a wrong conclusion in point of law. I have already indicated the arguments in support of the view that their conclusions were unjustified by the facts found and wrong in law and I need not repeat them.

I am of the clear opinion that on the facts found the Special Commissioners were entitled in law to hold that Mr Higgs was engaged in trading or in an adventure h in the nature of trade. In essence my reasons for that conclusion are: 1. The Higgs transactions must be looked at as a whole and not broken down into a number of separate component parts. 2. It is wrong to regard the profit of £170,000 which emerged from the Higgs transactions solely as the proceeds of sale of a capital asset by the Higgs trustees. 3. It is wrong to regard the actions of Mr Higgs solely as the actions of a director of or shareholder in the Higgs companies. 4. Mr Higgs was the dominant i actor and it was his personal action under professional advice which enabled the assets of the companies which he and Mrs Higgs controlled to be exploited for the benefit of the Higgs interests and not for the profit of those companies who in order to further the interests of Mr Higgs and others immediately concerned were obliged to sell properties owned by them substantially beneath their true value. 5. Everyone concerned was acting at Mr Higgs's behest. 6. The reality of the Higgs transactions which shines through when they are regarded as a whole was that the profit of £170,000 was to be taken at that particular point in the transactions where it suited Mr Higgs best that it should be taken.

I would only add that while I fully accept the argument of counsel for Mr Higgs that it is not legitimate to disregard the separate legal entities involved—Mr Higgs on the one hand and the Higgs companies on the other: see *Inland Revenue Comr v Europa Oil (NZ) Ltd*¹ per Lord Wilberforce—in my judgment the reason why Mr Higgs is to be held to have been trading or engaged in an adventure in the nature of trade is because of what he personally did and procured and not because of what the Higgs companies did or were procured to do by him and those acting with him.

I therefore reach the same conclusion on this issue as did the Special Commissioners and Megarry J².

The question then arises whether the relevant assessments should be raised against Mr Higgs or against the Higgs trustees. The Special Commissioners and Megarry J² thought the former. I greatly hesitate to differ from them but I do not think that this is correct. Counsel for the Crown sought to argue that even if Mr Higgs were never legally entitled to the £170,000, he nonetheless received that sum within the meaning of s 148 because he procured the money to be placed where he wanted it, namely in the hands of the Higgs trustees. But Mr Higgs plainly never 'received' this money and under the scheme I do not see now it can be said that he was 'entitled' to the £170,000. Indeed it was the essence of the scheme that he should neither receive it nor be entitled to receive it. 'Entitled' in s 148 must mean 'legally' entitled. Mr Higgs was never legally entitled to that money. The trustees were legally entitled to that money. I think therefore the correct assessment was that raised against the trustees and not against Mr Higgs.

The question arose during the argument whether the assessment should have been on the full £170,000. This question seems never to have been properly investigated before the Special Commissioners on behalf either of Mr Higgs or of the trustees. The Crown might well therefore have argued successfully in this court that it was now too late for this issue to be raised for the first time. However, in the circumstances counsel for the Crown very properly sought and obtained authority to agree to the matter being remitted to the Special Commissioners if this court were of the opinion that Mr Higgs had been trading, in order that the question whether any and if so what expenses were properly deductible might further be considered by them. He emphasised (though counsel for Mr Higgs did not agree) that this was a matter of concession and must not be regarded as a precedent in any other case. I say no more than is necessary to record the terms in which counsel on behalf of the Crown agreed to remission. I express no view whether there are any expenses which are properly deductible since this is not an issue which is before the court.

In the result I would allow Mr Higgs's appeal and discharge the assessment against him but I would also allow the Crown's appeal against the trustees and uphold in principle the assessment raised against them and remit the matter to the Special Commissioners for determination on the expenses issue in order that the proper quantum of tax payable may be determined by them.

I now turn to Mr Downes's appeal against the assessment in respect of the alleged profits of himself and Mrs Downes which are said to have arisen from trading in the year 1961-62. The original assessment was in the sum of £75,000 but it was ultimately limited by the Crown to £60,000. I can deal with this appeal more shortly than with Mr Higgs's appeal for many of the issues are the same as those already discussed. Counsel for Mr Downes accepted that basically the scheme in question was the same as in Mr Higgs's case but pointed out that there were two differences. First, the a subject-matter of the Downes transactions was not land or property owned by companies controlled by Mr and Mrs Downes. It was a newly negotiated building agreement dated 21st March 1962 between K J Roodhouse Ltd and A J Downes & Sons Ltd, a company controlled by Mr and Mrs Downes. I shall call this the Roodhouse agreement. It is found by the Special Commissioners to have been negotiated at arm's length. The agreement licensed A J Downes & Sons Ltd to develop an estate called the Landywood Estate in consideration of payment of the sum of £67,500 and certain other payments for which that agreement made provision. It was this chose in action which was the subject of the Downes transactions.

b Secondly, the Special Commissioners concerned decided the crucial issue of trading in favour of Mr Downes. Their decision was reversed by Megarry J¹. It is to be observed that the sum of £60,000 which the Crown claimed to attract tax was the sum payable to the Downes trustees for the sale by them to a Harlox company of the partnership interest settled on the trustees gratuitously by Mrs Downes. Once again it is not necessary to relate the complex details of the Downes transactions. They will be found set out in the special case. By various steps the benefit of the Roodhouse agreement reached a Harlox company called Opendy who made an agreement with a Downes company called (for short) Kilmorie which was in substance an agreement by Kilmorie to comply with the terms of the Roodhouse agreement, Kilmorie paying, inter alia, £77,250 for the privilege of so doing. Kilmorie had to carry out the developers' obligations under the Roodhouse agreement in return for getting the benefit of that contract. Kilmorie had to deposit £62,500 with Opendy of which £60,000 was obtained by borrowing that same amount from the Downes trustees.

c In essence the Crown's case was the same as in the Higgs case. The Roodhouse agreement was an asset of A J Downes & Sons Ltd. Mr Downes obviously appreciated that it was an asset capable of producing large future profits. He with his advisers considered how that asset might most profitably be exploited for the benefit of himself and his family but not for the company which possessed the benefit of the Roodhouse agreement. His objectives under professional advice were achieved by requiring that company to part with the asset for £2,250 to a third party, that asset to be ultimately repurchased from that third party for £77,250, a share of the profit being handed over to the Downes trustees and represented as the purchase price of an asset.

d The Crown argued that in the Downes case as in the Higgs case what made the activities trading or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade was the activities of Mr Downes in procuring the conclusion of all these arrangements including the procurement of the Downes company to act as it did in relation to the Roodhouse agreement solely in the interests of Mr Downes and his family.

e Counsel for Mr Downes urged that this case was stronger from the taxpayer's point of view than was the Higgs case. He pointed out that there was only a single asset here involved, namely the Roodhouse agreement. There were here no badges of trade, no repetition or frequency of transaction. Whatever difficulty there was, he said, in naming Mr Higgs's trade, it was impossible to find a name for what Mr Downes did for he did nothing which could conceivably be called trading. Counsel attacked Megarry J's conclusion¹, reversing the Special Commissioners for two reasons. First, he said that the judge, having decided the Higgs case against the taxpayer, decided this case against the taxpayer on some supposed principle of uniformity. Secondly, he said the judge was wrong in the way in which he dealt with the repeated use by the Special Commissioners of the adverb 'personally' in para 12 (4) of the special case².

As to the first, I think with respect counsel for Mr Downes has misunderstood what the judge meant regarding uniformity¹. I think the judge meant no more than that it was unsatisfactory to have differing decisions in two different cases arising under closely similar schemes. I do not think he meant that because he decided one case in favour of the Crown he must decide the other the same way. In principle this would be wrong since every case must turn on the facts found and in legal theory at least different findings of fact could lead to different decisions even under closely similar schemes. I think all the judge meant was that the schemes were so similar that it would be unsatisfactory for the two decisions to differ. But I do not think he intended to say that for that reason alone he must decide the two cases alike. As to the second point, I agree with the learned judge that the use of the word 'personally' by the Special Commissioners is of the greatest importance. They used it to justify the conclusion in point of law that Mr and Mrs Downes were not trading or engaged in an adventure or concern in the nature of trade. The Special Commissioners would seem to have thought that while Mr Downes had a personal interest as a director or shareholder in the Downes companies, neither he nor his wife was personally engaged in relation to the Landywood Estate in carrying out any trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade.

Counsel (Mr Potter following Mr Walton) boldly argued for Mr Downes that what was done was incapable of being trading because the scheme was—and I quote his words—'the execution of a planned raid on the Revenue'. This phrase was borrowed from the speech of Lord Donovan in *F A & A B Ltd v Lupton (Inspector of Taxes)*². Because, as counsel did not shrink from arguing, the Downes transaction was a planned raid on the Revenue, it was remote from trade and indeed could not be trade. With respect, there is a non sequitur in this argument. Clearly those who plan raids on the Revenue, at least where the object is to make a profit and not, as in the Lupton case³, a loss, are unlikely to plan on the basis that the taxpayer will make a profit from trade or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade or the chosen scheme is unlikely to achieve its avowed objective. But it may well be that one untoward consequence of a tax avoidance scheme aimed at making a tax free profit is that the profit in fact made will prove to have been made albeit inadvertently as the result of trade or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade, and thus, contrary to the hopes and intentions of those responsible for the scheme, to be taxable.

In truth Mr Downes was in the same position as Mr Higgs. This scheme must be looked at as a whole. It was planned as a whole. It was carried out as a whole. Mr Downes used his controlling position to make his companies conclude agreements not for the benefit of those companies but for the benefit of him and his family. Artificial prices were fixed. And it was prearranged with the Harlox interests that those interests, having acquired the benefit of the Roodhouse agreement from one Downes company, would in turn pass a large part of the consequent gain, after retaining a part for themselves, to a nominated recipient, the trustees for Mr Downes and his family. I accept that this was in one sense an isolated transaction but I do not think that that of itself prevents it being trading or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade especially as the so-called isolated transaction contained so many complex transactions within itself. In truth this is another case of choosing a method of exploiting a valuable asset and it was the personal activity of Mr Downes and of Mrs Downes which enabled that asset to be exploited as it was. Where I respectfully disagree with the Special Commissioners is in their conclusion that, although Mr Downes was interested personally, he and Mrs Downes were not engaged personally in carrying on any trade or adventure in the nature of trade in relation to the development of the estate. The Special Commissioners have looked at the matter as if the a crucial question were whether Mr or Mrs Downes were engaged as individuals in actual estate development. What they have not regarded is the true character of their, and in particular of Mr Downes's, activities as revealed by the facts found. Those facts so found, as I have already said, show procurement of the exploitation of the Roodhouse agreement for the benefit of Mr Downes and of his family and, for the same reasons as I have given in the Higgs case, I think that amounts to a trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade. Once again I do not think the difficulties of nomenclature prevent this being the position. Counsel for Mr Downes also sought to support the Special Commissioners' decision on the ground that there was a conclusion of fact in Mr Downes's favour. The answer to this submission is that I think on the facts found the Special Commissioners have reached a wrong conclusion in point of law.

c But also for the reasons given in the Higgs cases I think that the proper assessment was that raised against the Downes trustees and not against Mr Downes. I would therefore allow Mr Downes's appeal and the Crown's appeal against the trustees. I would discharge the assessment against Mr Downes and uphold the assessment on the trustees. There is no question of remission in this case.

d I now turn to the fifth appeal, that by Kilmorie. Kilmorie made substantial gross profits in the years ended 31st March 1964 and 31st March 1965 out of the exploitation of the benefits of the Roodhouse agreement. So did A J Downes & Sons Ltd—see para 7 (17) of the special case¹. The figure for the year to 31st March 1964 was £16,565 and for that to 31st March 1965 was said to be £66,885. These figures were arrived at after deducting premiums payable and paid by Kilmorie to Opendy amounting in the year to 31st March 1964 to £19,240 and in the year to 31st March 1965 to £46,329. The total of those premiums and of the premiums also paid for the ensuing year to 31st March 1966, namely £11,681, was £77,250. But the present appeal was concerned only with the figure of £19,240 which it was claimed to deduct for the year to 31st March 1964. In addition to these sums so paid by Kilmorie to Opendy, Kilmorie for the same financial year also paid sums totalling £67,950 to K J Roodhouse Ltd. The Crown has not sought to dispute that these payments made to this company were admissible deductions.

f The crucial question is whether the premiums totalling £19,240 paid by Kilmorie to Opendy for the year to 31st March 1964 were admissible as deductions for the purpose of computing Kilmorie's taxable trading profits for the year 1964-65. Kilmorie claimed that they were. The Crown disputed this. The Special Commissioners accepted the Crown's contention. Megarry J² dismissed Kilmorie's appeal against that decision.

g Section 137 of the Income Tax Act 1952 provides:

h 'Subject to the provisions of this Act, in computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged under Case I or Case II of Schedule D, no sum shall be deducted in respect of—(a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade, profession or vocation . . .

i Counsel for Kilmorie contended that these payments fell precisely within the language of the subsection because the liability to pay them as also the liability to pay the other sums to K J Roodhouse Ltd arose under cl 13 of the Kilmorie-Opendy agreement. Counsel went so far as to say that it was 'nonsense' to seek to tax the payments to Opendy and not the payments to K J Roodhouse Ltd. It is important to observe the findings of the Special Commissioners in para 3 of the final decision of the special case³. After stating that they were considering the Kilmorie-Opendy

2 [1972] 2 All ER 817

3 See pp 677, 678, ante

agreement against the background of the series of transactions which led up to it, the Special Commissioners continued¹:

'So approaching the matter we are of opinion that the Kilmore/Opendy agreement was entered into by Kilmore with the object both of enabling that company to develop the Landywood Estate and of facilitating the scheme for avoiding liability to income tax referred to in paragraph 2 (2) above. In our view the latter object was on the facts of the case one of the main purposes, and not a mere secondary consequence, of the entering into by Kilmore of the agreement, and the outlay totalling £19,240 was thus incurred by Kilmore for dual purposes being purposes one of which was, and one of which was not, a trading purpose.'

In other words the Special Commissioners clearly took the view that the factual position was not that this was a case of payments made under a trading agreement which happened also to carry with them incidental fiscal advantages but payments which, though made pursuant to the provisions of the trading agreement, had as 'one of their main purposes' the avoidance of liability to income tax in accordance with the objective of the Downes scheme as a whole. Thus, the Special Commissioners concluded, one of the main purposes of the making of the payments in question being tax avoidance, even though the agreement also had as its objective the development of the Landywood Estate, it could not be said that these payments were admissible as a deduction under s 137 (a).

Counsel for Kilmore vigorously challenged this reasoning. He argued that if once a trading concern entered into a contract under which it could earn profits and intending to earn profits thereunder and that contract required that trading concern to make any outlay or payments without the making of which it could not earn those intended profits, those outlays or payments were made for the purpose of earning those profits and were thus wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade in question. The mere existence of a double motive was not sufficient to prevent these payments to Opendy being admissible deductions and they did not cease to be admissible deductions because there was a tax advantage to be thereby gained. Motive, he argued, was irrelevant at least in the case of expenditure of this kind. If the trading concern had to spend the money or to make the payment in question in order to earn the profits, then the expenditure in question was properly deductible.

Counsel for Kilmore referred us to many well-known authorities on this topic such as *Smith's Potato Estates Ltd v Bolland (Inspector of Taxes)*² and *Bentleys, Stokes and Lowless v Beeson (Inspector of Taxes)*³. But I would venture respectfully to repeat the warning given both by Viscount Simon who was in the minority and by Lord Porter who was in the majority in the former case that in cases of this kind it is 'better' (per Viscount Simon⁴) or 'safer' (per Lord Porter⁵) to have regard to the language of the statute and then apply to that language the facts of a particular case rather than rely too greatly on the language used in some of the judgments in cases arising under this section. Counsel for Kilmore emphasised—correctly—that there is no reference to motive in s 137 (a). He also sought to draw a distinction between what he called 'overhead' expenditure and 'trading' expenditure, a distinction which perhaps merits the comment that it too finds no mention in the relevant statutory provision. I would agree with counsel when he said that the Crown has no right to rewrite a trader's contract so as to produce a different fiscal result from that produced by the contract as actually concluded by the trader. Any trader must be free to make a his own contracts on his own terms as he thinks it is best in his interests to do: see *Craddock (Inspector of Taxes) v Zevo Finance Co Ltd*¹ per Lord Wright. But to accept that submission does not without more involve acceptance of the submission that everything payable under such a contract is of necessity admissible as a deduction under s 137 (a). Were it otherwise I think that *Littlewoods Mail Order Stores Ltd v McGregor (Inspector of Taxes)*² would have been differently decided. Yet in that case both Sachs LJ and Karminski LJ emphasised that the court must look at the true nature and purpose of the expenditure claimed to be deductible. And I am unable to accept counsel's suggested distinction of that case on the ground that the expenditure there in question was of an overhead rather than of a trading nature, for the statute prescribes a single universal criterion for determining whether the expenditure is deductible or not.

c It is a striking fact that when Mr and Mrs Downes on 5th April 1962 caused Kilmore to enter into the agreement with Opendy and pay Opendy sums which in the event totalled £77,250 for the benefit of the Roodhouse contract, they were requiring Kilmore to pay those sums for an asset which six days earlier, namely on 30th March 1962, they had caused A J Downes & Sons Ltd to sell to a Harlox company for £2,250. It is not perhaps surprising in those circumstances that the Special Commissioners took the view that there were two elements in the sums which Kilmore was thereby committed to pay, first a sum of £2,250 which apparently represented the genuine value of this contract on 30th March 1962 and secondly an element of what counsel for the Crown described as 'bounty' in favour of those who were intended to benefit from the transactions when viewed as a whole. There is a finding in the special case³ that the directors of A J Downes & Sons Ltd considered the price of £2,250 'was a good one fully reflecting the then value of the building agreement'. It is true that the Special Commissioners do not go on to find that that was in fact the then value of the building agreement but it must, I think, be taken to be their conclusion that this had been the view of the Downes directors at the material time. If this is right, then of the figure of £77,250 agreed to be paid six days later, it is difficult to see how more than £2,250 can truly be said to represent the arm's length value of the Roodhouse agreement. There is thus ample evidence to justify the Special Commissioners' conclusion that a second main motive in agreeing that these payments should be made was to benefit the Downes family rather than Kilmore. In truth of course the provision for these payments by Kilmore to Opendy was designed not to benefit Kilmore by enabling Kilmore to earn large profits but to diminish the large profits which it was hoped Kilmore might one day earn—as in fact Kilmore did one day earn—for Kilmore was required to pay to Opendy what that Harlox company had agreed to pay in order to produce what it was hoped would prove to be a tax free profit for the Downes family.

g What to my mind is virtually fatal to the arguments of counsel for Kilmore on this appeal is the recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in *Inland Revenue Comr v Europa Oil (NZ) Ltd*⁴. That appeal to the Privy Council arose under the corresponding section of the New Zealand Land and Income Tax Act 1954, s 111. Though the language of that section is different from that of s 137 (a) of the 1952 Act, its effect is not different so far as concerns the present appeal. The facts of that case were highly complex and do not require repetition here. Their Lordships were divided in opinion but I do not read the minority opinion of Lord Donovan and Viscount Dilhorne as differing on any matter of principle. The minority opinion differed in the application of the complex facts of the case to principles which were not in dispute.

The crucial question was whether the respondents were entitled to off-set certain expenditure incurred by them under what was called 'the products contract' as having been exclusively incurred for the purchase of Europa's trading stock. There was no right, it was said, to deny to the respondents a trader's normal right to deduct from his revenue the whole expenditure which he incurred in purchasing his trading stock. The majority of their Lordships accepted that it was not for the Crown or the court to say how much he had spent. But as Lord Wilberforce said¹ delivering the opinion of the majority:

'For a claim to disallow a portion of expenditure incurred in purchasing trading stock to succeed, the Crown, in their Lordships' judgment, must show that, as part of the contractual arrangement under which the stock was acquired some advantage, not identifiable as, or related to the production of, assessable income, was gained, so that a part of the expenditure, which can be segregated and quantified, ought to be considered as consideration given for the advantage. Taxation by end result, or by economic equivalence, is not what the section achieves.'

Applying that test to the present case, that in my judgment is precisely what the Crown on the facts found is able to show. Here a part of the expenditure sought to be deducted can clearly be isolated. It was not expenditure made for the purpose of Kilmorie making profits. It clearly does not fall within the language of s 137 (a). It was expenditure which Kilmorie was required to make reducing its own profits, in order that others, parties to different individual transactions which were part of the main scheme, might gain. I would only add with reference to counsel for Kilmorie's argument that it was 'nonsense' to tax Kilmorie on the Opendy payments but not on the Roodhouse payments that the latter were clearly made because Kilmorie took over the obligations originally assumed by A J Downes & Sons Ltd under the Roodhouse agreement which was (as found) an arm's length agreement. These payments were therefore altogether in a different category from the Kilmorie payments to Opendy. They were, it would seem, payments which A J Downes & Sons Ltd had to agree to make in order to get the benefit of the Roodhouse agreement. Kilmorie having assumed that obligation previously resting on A J Downes & Sons Ltd had similarly to make those payments. But the payments to Opendy were, as I have already sought to show on the facts found, quite different in their nature purpose and intent. I therefore think that the Special Commissioners and Megarry J² were plainly right on the fifth appeal and I would dismiss Kilmorie's appeal.

The Higgs transactions

Mr Alan Edward Higgs appealed to the Special Commissioners against assessments to income tax made on him under Case I of Sch D in respect of the profits of the trade of land dealer and developer for each of the years 1960-61 and 1961-62 in the sum of £170,000. There was only one sum of £170,000 and the taxed assessments were alternative assessments. Heard, by agreement, with those appeals was an appeal by the trustees of a settlement made by Mrs Higgs, who received it, against an assessment in a like sum for the year 1960-61.

The commissioners who heard the appeals concluded that Mr Higgs engaged in an adventure in the nature of trade but that the sum of £170,000, having been received by the trustees on the understanding that they would pass it on for the purpose of the scheme which they described, and, taking the view the trustees might never get it back in full concluded that the sum of £170,000 was assessable for neither 1960-61 nor 1961-62 and they reduced the assessments to nil.

a From these decisions the Crown appealed. The appeals came before Megarry J¹ who held that there was ample evidence on which the commissioners could reach the conclusion that Mr Higgs had engaged in an adventure in the nature of trade, that it mattered not the trustees having received the £170,000 (in 1960-61) were bound in advance to lend it for the scheme and that Mr Higgs was assessable in that sum for that year. From that decision Mr Higgs appeals to this court. Inevitably as the result of that decision, Megarry J dismissed an appeal by the Crown against the decision of b the Special Commissioners allowing the appeal of the trustees. The inspector of taxes now appeals against Megarry J's decision contending that if Mr Higgs was not properly chargeable in respect of the £170,000 the assessment made on the trustees in that sum for 1960-61 should be restored. What is said in relation to the latter appeal is that the trustees were the persons who received, or were entitled to, the income derived from the adventure and consequently, by virtue of s 148 of the c Income Tax Act 1952, they were chargeable.

The facts found by the commissioners as a result of the evidence, both oral and documentary, adduced before them are set out in para 5 of the stated case² and for the purpose of this judgment I will treat myself as having read them at this point in full. I will only remark as to the detailed findings, because at one point it had seemed to me this might be material, that there is no finding as to the number of shares in the d Higgs companies owned by Mr and Mrs Higgs respectively. What emerges is this:

(1) On 30th March 1961 properties belonging to companies controlled by Mr and Mrs Higgs were sold to the partnership in which Mrs Higgs had a 90 per cent interest, and which had been formed a month earlier for the purpose of buying them, for £86,825. At the same time two small parcels of land needed to give access to one of the properties were sold by Mr Higgs to the partnership for £310 making a total e purchase price of £87,135.

(2) A week later on 5th April 1961 the properties so sold were under the so-called agency agreement of that date agreed to be developed by Coventry, a property dealing f company controlled by Mr Higgs, on terms under which, shorn of trimmings, over a period of three years Coventry was to pay Downry, a company in the Harlox Group in which Mr and Mrs Higgs had no interest, the sum of £287,135. The difference between the £87,135 paid on 30th March and the sum of £287,135 agreed to be paid on 5th April, namely £200,000, had, as a result of the intermediate transactions set out in the stated case, emerged indirectly in the form of £30,000 retained or to be received by the Harlox Group as their 'cut' on the transaction and £170,000 paid to the trustees of the settlement made by Mrs Higgs.

(3) Of the sum of £287,135 agreed to be paid by Coventry, over the three year period g during which it was contemplated that the properties would be developed or realised, £257,135 was pursuant to the agreement between Downry and Coventry paid in advance or deposited with Downry. To facilitate this payment in advance the trustees lent their £170,000 to Coventry. There is no finding by the Special Commissioners how the £87,135, the balance of the £257,135 deposit, was found and h it cannot be taken to have been lent to Coventry by the Higgs vendor companies out of the purchase moneys received by them.

(4) It is not clear, and is I think immaterial, whether the £200,000, being the difference between the price to the Higgs vendor companies on 30th March (less the £310 paid to Mr Higgs, which can, I think, be ignored) and the sum agreed to be paid by the other Higgs company, Coventry, emerged as the result of sale at an under-value by the former companies or an acquisition by the latter at an over-value i or partly by each. The fact remains that as a result of the transactions which took place the properties of the former companies were exploited in such a way that £200,000 emerged at the expense of the former or the latter or both, and was paid;

as to £170,000 to the trustees of a settlement for the benefit of Mr Higgs and his children. a

The commissioners drew certain inferences of fact from the nature of the transactions before them (to which they had referred in detail) as evidenced by the documents and from the oral evidence: first (and this is not challenged), that all the transactions were planned in advance at one and the same time, and each was carried through on the understanding that all subsequent ones would be carried through; b secondly (and this is not challenged), that the broad object was that properties belonging to the Higgs companies would be profitably developed by a Higgs company, but in such a manner that (it was hoped) a large slice of the expected profit would escape tax. This escaping of tax, remarked the commissioners, explained the complicated chain of transactions and was the reason for the participation therein of the Harlox companies, for which the Harlox Group was to receive £30,000; and c thirdly, that the person who put the scheme into operation and was in control of it throughout was Mr Higgs: they did not mean by this that he planned or even understood the details, which he left to his professional advisers; what they meant was that they regarded the whole scheme as his operation. They regarded Mrs Higgs and the trustees, as well as the Higgs companies, as persons who acted at his behest and in accordance with his wishes, and they regarded the Harlox companies as participating with his agreement and because he was prepared to make it profitable for them. d

It was submitted to this court that Mr Higgs did not trade in anything. The subject-matter of the transactions which took place—the properties and the 90 per cent share in the partnership—were never the property of Mr Higgs. He never dealt with them. He did not make the settlement. He ventured nothing. Neither did he receive nor did he ever become entitled to any part of the £170,000 and he never had any interest in it except as a discretionary object under the settlement which was e made by Mrs Higgs. To no single one of the complicated series of transactions which took place was Mr Higgs a party. What put the £170,000 in the hands of the trustees were acts done by companies of the Harlox Group and Mrs Higgs; for it was obtained as the result of the acquisition by the trustees by way of gift of a share in the partnership of nominal value and its sale for £170,000 a few days later after the partnership had acquired the properties for £87,135. At that time Mrs Higgs had ceased to have a f financial interest in the partnership. If you pick out and examine each transaction separately you accordingly find that the £170,000 was 'made' by the trustees at the expense of the Harlox Group. If you look at them together and as a whole you find it was made at the expense of one or more Higgs company as the result of a series of acts done by Higgs companies (in which I include Coventry), Mrs Higgs, the Harlox Group and the trustees. There were, it is urged, no facts found by the commissioners on which any reasonable tribunal properly directed as to the law could have reached the conclusion that Mr Higgs was engaged in an adventure in the nature of trade. And in the course of the debate the rhetorical question was asked: what was the trade or adventure in the nature of trade? Far from being a trade or an adventure in the nature of trade the transactions were, so the argument runs, simply an exercise in the avoidance of tax which is not a trade. h

I will deal with the last submission first. It is true that if you find that transactions which would otherwise be trading transactions have been entered into for the purpose of either suffering a trading loss and setting off for the purposes of income tax that loss against other profits, or extracting money from the Revenue by way of a loss claim those transactions may be held not to be trading transactions: see e.g. *F A & A B Ltd v Lupton (Inspector of Taxes)*¹. It does not, however, in my judgment, follow that because a transaction or series of transactions is dictated by the desire to make a profit which is tax free there is no trading transaction. If there are two ways of exploiting a property at a profit, one of which is simple and will attract income tax j a and the other of which is complicated and will, so it is hoped, avoid tax, it would be an untenable argument that because the more complicated way has been chosen for the sole purpose of avoiding tax, the exploitation of the property was not a trading transaction. The fact that in this case the avoidance of tax was the motive for exploiting the Higgs companies' properties in the way it was done is in my judgment nothing to the point.

b As I have said the commissioners found, and the finding is not contested, that all the transactions were planned in advance at one and the same time and each was carried through on the understanding that all subsequent ones would be carried through. So it was part of the plan that Mr and Mrs Higgs should, and they did, use their position as directors and shareholders of the Higgs companies to procure the sales to the partnership for £86,825. It was part of the plan that Mr Higgs should use his control of Coventry to procure that company to agree to pay a Harlox company c £287,135 for what had been sold by the Higgs companies for £86,825 a week earlier. It is true that Mr Higgs did not sell or acquire any properties; but he procured the Higgs companies to sell the properties and he procured Coventry to enter into the agreement with Downry. Either the Higgs companies could, by entering into a direct agreement with Coventry, have obtained for their properties a sum greatly in excess of the sum paid for them, or Coventry could have obtained them for a sum d far less than it was required to pay. By the effect of the dealings which took place the Higgs companies and Coventry were between them stripped by £200,000. Mr Higgs used his position as a director to procure them to do the acts which had this result and he contrived that of this sum of £200,000, £170,000 should be paid to trustees for the benefit of himself and his children.

e If a man being in control of one company procures it to sell its property to him for £87,000, and then a few weeks later procures another company controlled by him to purchase that same property from him for £277,000, I would conclude, whatever breach of his fiduciary duty he might have committed, that he had concerned himself in an adventure in the nature of trade; and if he so arranges it that the first sale is made to another party and the second sale by a third party and that there shall be intermediate transactions from which he, or a trustee for himself and his family, f acquires part of the difference of £200,000 which so emerges, it is I think open to commissioners properly to find that he has carried on an adventure in the nature of trade. In my judgment not only did the commissioners properly find that Mr Higgs engaged in an adventure in the nature of trade but no other conclusion was properly open to them. I accept the remark of Megarry J to the effect that the categories of trading are not closed and while remembering that the words of judges are not to be taken out of their context or construed as if they were contained in an Act of Parliament, I derive comfort for my conclusion from the remarks of Lord Buckmaster in *Ducker v Rees Roturbo Development Syndicate Ltd*¹ where he spoke of 'a gain made in an operation of business in carrying out a scheme for profit-making'. Counsel for the Crown in the course of his argument remarked that no doubt what was done was odd and unusual, but, as he said, no doubt more odd and unusual schemes to make money will come before the courts.

g I would, however, if necessary answer the rhetorical question, what was the adventure in the nature of trade in which Mr Higgs engaged himself? by holding that it was the exploitation by Mr Higgs (and perhaps Mrs Higgs), by arrangement and in collaboration with the Harlox Group, of the properties belonging to Mr Higgs's companies with a view to extracting from those companies or another company a profit or sum h of £200,000, which ought to have been theirs, and of which £30,000 accrued to the Harlox Group as the price of their participation in the venture and £170,000 was paid to the trustees for the benefit of Mr Higgs and his children.

j It was the Crown's contention before the commissioners that the £170,000 which the trustees, as the commissioners put it, became entitled to receive was profit assessable for either 1960-61 or 1961-62. Taking the view that since it was the understanding that the trustees should pass on the £170,000 which they might not get back, or might not get back in full, and that on their understanding of the agreement between Coventry and Downry the development of the properties must yield £30,000 for the Harlox Group and the £87,135 payable to the Higgs vendor companies before Mr Higgs's trading venture produced a profit, the commissioners determined the assessments on Mr Higgs at nil and discharged the assessments on the trustees.

I share the view of Megarry J, though I would put the matter somewhat differently, that the fact that the trustees were expected or bound to lend the £170,000 at interest for the purpose of the scheme does not prevent it from being a realised profit of the adventure. Where a taxpayer engaged in the trade of buying and selling land sells a plot of land at a profit but on the terms that part of the price is left on loan to the purchaser at interest the profit falls to be assessed regardless of the fact that in the end the loan or part of it may be irrecoverable. Indeed the contrary was hardly argued in this court. Had Mr Higgs, the person engaged in the adventure, received the £170,000 on the terms that he should lend it at interest it would in my judgment have been properly brought into account as a receipt of the trade in the year it was received.

In my judgment, however (and the Crown hardly argued to the contrary), the trustees and not Mr Higgs are the parties to be assessed. I accept the submission that Mr Higgs never received the profit and never became entitled to it. The trustees on the other hand became entitled to and did receive it within the meaning of s 148 of the Income Tax Act 1952. It was argued before the Special Commissioners that if there was an adventure in the nature of trade the assessment ought to have been on Mr and Mrs Higgs jointly; for Mrs Higgs, as one of the two persons controlling the Higgs vendor companies, was a necessary party to the sale of the properties to the partnership and played a more active part than her husband. But Mrs Higgs like her husband never became entitled to nor received the £170,000, so that whether the adventure be regarded as a separate venture by Mr Higgs or as a joint venture by Mr and Mrs Higgs the trustees are in my judgment the proper persons to be assessed.

The Downes transactions

In one of the cases arising out of the Downes transactions Mr Albert James Downes appealed to the Special Commissioners against an assessment to income tax made on him under Sch D for the year 1961-62 in the sum of £75,000 in respect of profits of himself and his wife as property dealers. Heard, by agreement, with that appeal was an appeal by the trustees of a settlement made by Mr Downes's wife, Mrs M J Downes in the sum of £60,000 in respect of profits in connection with the sale of their interest in the partnership referred to in the case stated.

The Special Commissioners held that neither Mr nor Mrs Downes was at any time engaged in carrying on personally in relation to the property concerned any trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade and they discharged the assessment on Mr Downes.

Because it was not sought on behalf of the Crown to contend that the trustees themselves carried on any trade or to support the assessment on the trustees otherwise than in the event of Mr Downes or his wife being held to have been carrying on personally a trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade and because the assessment on the trustees was made against the event of Mr Downes and Mrs Downes nevertheless not being held to be assessable in respect of the profit thereof by reason of the profit having been received by the trustees, the assessment on them was also discharged.

The Crown appealed against both decisions. The appeals came before Megarry J¹ along with other appeals including that in Ransom v Higgs to which the scheme a adopted in the instant case bore certain resemblances. He reversed the decision of the Special Commissioners, holding that on the primary facts found by the commissioners it seemed to him that the true and only reasonable conclusion contradicted the conclusion that neither Mr Downes nor Mrs Downes was carrying on an adventure in the nature of trade. He directed that the assessment on Mr Downes should be restored but in the sum of £60,000 and not £75,000. Because the assessment on the trustees was alternative he upheld the decision by the commissioners in this regard.

b The facts found by the commissioners as the result of the evidence both oral and documentary adduced before them are set out in the stated cases. The documents have been made available as part of the case. What emerges is this.

(1) Immediately prior to 30th March 1962 A J Downes & Co Ltd, building contractors (hereinafter called 'Downes') were entitled under a building agreement dated 21st March 1962 to develop an estate known as 'the Landywood Estate' belonging to the concern called K J Roodhouse Ltd on terms as to payment by Downes of £67,500 therein mentioned.

(2) On 30th March 1962 Downes, a company of which Mr and Mrs Downes and one Southall were directors, sold the benefit of the building agreement to Sproul Bros Builders Ltd for £2,250. The commissioners had before them evidence that this sum fully reflected the value of the agreement.

d (3) A week later, on 5th April 1962, the benefit of the agreement so sold was resold by a company referred to as Opendy to a company referred to as Kilmorie, a property dealing company in which Mr and Mrs Downes were the sole shareholders, on terms under which, shorn of their details, Kilmorie was to undertake the obligations under the building agreement (including the payment of £67,500 to be made thereunder) and pay £77,250 and interest which was to be paid over the period of the development of the properties. The difference between the £2,250 paid on 30th March and the sum of £77,250 agreed to be paid for the benefit of the building agreement had, as a result of the intermediate transactions set out in the stated case, emerged indirectly in the form of £60,000 paid to the trustees of the settlement made by Mrs Downes, and as to the balance by companies participating in the schemes not controlled by Mr and Mrs Downes.

f (4) Under the Kilmorie agreement £62,500 was to be deposited or paid in advance by Kilmorie with or to Opendy. To facilitate this deposit the trustees lent Kilmorie the £60,000 they had received the previous day at interest.

The scheme bore a similarity to that adopted 12 months earlier in the Higgs cases; but it is clear that in this case it was Kilmorie which was exploited, for that company incurred a liability to pay £77,250, for an asset which had been sold a week earlier for £2,250.

g As appears from the case the commissioners did not accept the evidence of Mr Downes that there was no arrangement as to what Sproul Bros Ltd were to do with the building agreement or that it was not necessarily the case that it was always clear that one of his companies would develop the land. On reviewing the evidence they drew therefrom inferences of fact including: (1) The fact that the whole series of transactions was planned from the outset and that each of the transactions in the series set out in the case was carried through in the expectation that all subsequent ones would also be carried through. (2) The transactions were planned with a view to enabling the development of the Landywood Estate to be carried out by a company or companies controlled by Mr Downes and at the same time to so arrange matters that if as a consequence of such development a substantial profit arose a large slice of that profit would not attract liability to income tax. (3) Mr Downes, having authorised the preparation of such a scheme, left its detailed working out to his professional advisers. The scheme as it was worked out involved arrangements whereby certain companies not controlled by Mr Downes participated in it.

j I share the view in effect expressed by Megarry J that the essential features of the dealings which took place were substantially the same as those to which I have referred in the Higgs cases and would hold on grounds similar mutatis mutandis to those I have expressed in that case that on the primary findings of fact of the commissioners Mr and Mrs Downes engaged themselves in an adventure in the nature of trade. I find the rhetorical question, what was the adventure in the nature of trade in which Mr and Mrs Downes engaged themselves? less susceptible to a simple description. Doing the best I can I would describe it as the exploitation of an asset owned by Downes by procuring or contriving, in collaboration with other companies, the sale to Kilmorrie at an over-value in excess of £60,000 with a view to obtaining a profit which would not enure to Downes but to the trustees of a settlement for the benefit of Mr and Mrs Downes, their children and remoter issue. a

The Special Commissioners acceded to the submission that because neither Mr nor Mrs Downes at any time undertook personally any sale or purchase in connection with the transactions affecting the Landywood Estate, neither of them was at any time engaged in carrying on personally in relation to the estate any adventure or concern in the nature of trade. That was the ratio of their decision and in my judgment it was wrong in law. One who by virtue of his shareholding is in control of two companies and procures the sale of an asset by one company to another on the terms that there shall be paid to himself a commission on the deal may be just as much carrying on an adventure in the nature of trade as any broker; and the fact that the payment is made or emerges in the course of a complicated series of transactions which have been planned in advance by him but to which he is not a party can in my judgment make no difference. Nor in my judgment is the venture any the less an adventure in the nature of trade because the commission is planned to emerge, and emerges, as a payment to trustees holding on trust for himself and his family. I cannot accept that directors of a company who use their votes to commit the company to a sale to another concern, but with a view to exploiting the asset sold for their own advantage, are not acting 'personally' but merely as directors. The acts done by Mr and Mrs Downes as directors of Downes and Kilmorrie cannot in my view be regarded as not done by them also in their personal capacity. I would reject the conclusion of the commissioners that neither Mr nor Mrs Downes personally undertook any of the transactions which took place. To hold otherwise would be to conclude that a director who procured one of his companies to sell a property to another of them on the terms that a commission was paid to a trustee for the director could never be held to be engaged in an adventure in the nature of trade. c

For the reasons I have given in the Higgs case I would discharge the assessment on Mr and Mrs Downes and allow the Crown's appeal against the trustees.

Arising out of the Downes transactions was an assessment to income tax on Kilmorrie under Sch D for the year 1964-65 in the sum of £19,240 in respect of profits arising from property development. The Special Commissioners, in effect disallowing the deduction, upheld the assessment, and Kilmorrie's appeal against the assessment was dismissed by Megarry J. g

Pursuant to the agreement with Opendy of 5th April 1962 Kilmorrie during the years ended 31st March 1963, 1964 and 1965 made the payments to K J Roodhouse Ltd which Downes had contracted to make under the building agreement dated 21st March 1962. No question arises regarding these payments which amounted in the aggregate to £67,950. In addition Kilmorrie pursuant to its agreement with Opendy, made payments to Opendy amounting in the aggregate to £77,250, this sum representing the difference between the sum agreed to be paid by Downes to K J Roodhouse Ltd for the benefit of the building agreement on 21st March 1962, and the price agreed to be paid by Kilmorrie to Opendy on 5th April 1962, for the benefit of the same building agreement. That difference by the effect of the transaction described in the stated cases found its way as to £60,000 into the hands of the trustees of Mrs Downes's settlement and as to the balance was absorbed by the companies h a not controlled by Mr and Mrs Downes which took part in those transactions. Of that difference £19,240 was paid by Kilmorie to Opendy in the year to 31st March 1964 and was sought to be deducted by Kilmorie in computing its profits arising from property development as money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of Kilmorie's trade, and is the subject-matter of the controversy. That the payments made by Kilmorie to Roodhouse in accordance with the Roodhouse building agreement are deductible is not in question.

b It was submitted on behalf of the taxpayer that if a trader enters into what is from his point of view a trading agreement and this provides for the taxpayer to make certain payments all those payments to whomsoever made and for whatsoever purpose must of necessity be paid exclusively for the purposes of his trade. The Revenue cannot, so it is urged, dissect the payments made under a single agreement.

c This submission, if well founded, would as I see it lead to absurdities: e.g. a trader enters into an agreement to purchase goods at an excessive price on the terms that part of that price is paid to a relation of the purchaser to whom he wishes to make a gift. This submission was made as well before Megarry J as before this court and because I can find no fault in the careful reasoning by which he rejected it, which I would gratefully borrow, I would dismiss the appeal. That in a sense results in double taxation, but it is a commonplace of income tax law that a payment made by a trader—e.g. sums paid to a builder for building a factory—may not be deductible in computing the profits of his trade but must nevertheless be brought into account in computing the profits of the builders' trade.

RUSSELL LJ. The judgments that have just been delivered deal comprehensively with the complex facts and wide range of debate in these cases. In saying that I entirely agree with their conclusions I wish to make only one general observation. As I see it the critical question is one of approach. Is it right to regard each episode in a complex scheme as a separate event in which the only actors are the direct participants in that episode? In such cases as these I think not. In each case the spouses were in a position of command over the assets and profitability of a company, and in one of them, on the findings of the commissioners, where the assessment was in respect only of an alleged trade of the husband, he was also in command of his wife's decisions. Suppose one person to be in such a position of command, and the company to occupy a position from which it appears that in the ordinary course of direction by the board its trading activities would throw up a profit of £x. Suppose a scheme of the character that we have seen in these cases, expressly designed and carried through by the person able to control the company in order to siphon off a profit of £y (leaving £x-y to the company) into a container, whether his own pocket or a settlement desired by him. It may well be that no one, the company remaining solvent and profitable, can complain. But it can in my view be fairly said that that person has carried out a profitable adventure in the nature of trade notwithstanding that the assets that he has turned to his own account were not his assets but those of the company. The analogy may be, as analogies so often are, imperfect; but the conductor of an orchestra is responsible for the performance of the symphony although he plays no instrument. Even more so if he happens to control the performing rights in the work.

BRIGHTMAN J

20th FEBRUARY, 7th MARCH 1973

Judgment – Order – Supplemental order – Jurisdiction to make supplemental order – New facts – Plaintiffs obtaining order for specific performance – Subsequent application by plaintiffs for supplemental order for enquiry into damages – Supplemental order limited to damage arising after date of order for specific performance.

By an agreement in writing made on 7th February 1972 between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the defendant agreed to sell and the plaintiffs agreed to purchase certain freehold property, the completion date to be 7th March. On 11th April the plaintiffs issued a writ against the defendant in which they claimed specific performance of the agreement and, further or alternatively, damages for breach of contract. On 21st July an order was made in favour of the plaintiffs that the agreement should be specifically performed and carried into execution, the completion date to be 16th August. The order did not include a direction for an enquiry as to damages although, had the plaintiffs then sought such an enquiry, a direction would have been included in the order. On 5th September the plaintiffs issued a summons, as a result of which a further order was made on 7th December nominating a Master of the Supreme Court to execute the transfer and also directing the defendant to deliver up vacant possession to the plaintiffs. On 29th December the plaintiffs issued a notice of motion in which they sought an order, supplemental to the order of 21st July, that there should be an enquiry whether the plaintiffs had sustained any and what damages by reason of the defendant's delay in completing the agreement.

Held – The court had power to make a supplemental order if and so far as the order was sought on new facts. Accordingly an order would be made, supplemental to the order of 21st July, that there should be an enquiry as to damages sustained by reason of the defendant's delay but the order would be limited to damage which arose after 21st July (see p 703 e and f, post).

Motion

- a By notice of motion dated 29th December 1972, the plaintiffs, Holman Lancelot Ford-Hunt and his wife, Edith Mabel Ford-Hunt, sought against the defendant, Raghbir Singh, an order, supplemental to an order for specific performance made against the defendant on 21st July 1972, 'that there be an inquiry whether the plaintiffs have sustained any and what damages by reason of the defendant's delay in completing the agreement in the said order mentioned'. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- c 7th March. BRIGHTMAN J read the following judgment. The issue on this application is whether an enquiry as to damages ought to be added, by supplemental order, to an order for specific performance made in July 1972. Despite the frequency of specific performance decrees, legal reporting does not instance a similar application for almost 70 years.

- d On 7th February 1972 an agreement in writing was made for the sale by the defendant, Raghbir Singh, to the plaintiffs, Holman Lancelot Ford-Hunt and his wife, Edith Mabel Ford-Hunt, of a property known as 7 Upper Holly Hill Road, Bexley, at the price of £5,750. The date fixed for completion was 7th March 1972. The plaintiffs state that they intended to raise the purchase money by means of a building society mortgage. The contract not having been completed on the due date, on 11th April 1972 the plaintiffs issued a writ against the defendant for specific performance
- e of the contract and damages. The defendant did not enter an appearance.

- On 21st July 1972 an order was made that the sale agreement should be specifically performed and carried into execution. The date named in the order for completion was 16th August 1972, on which date the plaintiffs were to pay to the mortgagees the amount owing to them and were to pay the balance of the purchase money as the defendant might direct or, in default of any such direction, into court to the credit
- f of the action. The defendant neglected to execute an instrument of transfer as required by the order, and therefore a further order was made on 7th December 1972 nominating a Master of the Supreme Court to execute the transfer, and also directing the defendant to deliver up vacant possession to the plaintiffs. That direction also was disobeyed, in consequence of which a writ of possession was issued. In the end the plaintiffs obtained possession in mid-January 1973, or thereabouts.

- g One effect of the defendant's delay in giving up possession, it is said, was that the plaintiffs were unable to obtain, at the time when they first needed it, the building society finance which they had arranged. The building society would not advance the money until vacant possession was given. In the result, the plaintiffs say that they were compelled to arrange a bridging loan at considerable cost to cover the period between the time when they had to part with their purchase money and the time
- h when they obtained vacant possession. They also claim to have suffered certain other damage by reason of the delay.

- The decree of specific performance did not direct an enquiry as to damages. Accordingly, on 29th December 1972 the plaintiffs issued a notice of motion asking for an order, supplemental to the order of 21st July 1972, that there be an enquiry whether the plaintiffs had sustained any and what damage by reason of the defendant's delay
- j in completing the sale agreement.

A vendor who seeks specific performance is entitled to damages for delay, if he can prove that he has suffered damage: see *Jaques v Millar*¹, to which I shall refer later, and *Jones v Gardiner*². There is no doubt that, if the plaintiffs had asked, an enquiry as to damages would have been added to the order for specific performance. The question is whether an enquiry can be directed now. a

The plaintiffs do not rely on RSC Ord 20, r 11—the 'slip' rule. There was no clerical mistake in the order and no error arising from an accidental slip or omission. The plaintiffs rely on a principle which is stated thus in the Supreme Court Practice¹ in the notes to RSC Ord 20, r 11: 'There is jurisdiction to make upon proof of new facts an order supplemental to an original order . . .' This observation is almost a verbatim quotation from a passage in the judgment of A L Smith LJ in *Re Scowby, Scowby v Scowby*², although strangely enough that case is not noted in the Supreme Court Practice³ against the proposition which I have cited. The facts in *Re Scowby, Scowby v Scowby*⁴ were shortly as follows. In 1883 and 1884 a testator's estate became involved in administration and other proceedings instigated by a solicitor called Miller, whose purpose was to make costs. The parties to the administration proceedings included Mrs Scowby and her brother, John Coward, who became trustees of the estate and were the tools of Miller. In 1887 the taxed costs of the parties to the administration proceedings, amounting to £3,500 and almost all payable to Miller, were directed to be raised by Mrs Scowby and John Coward and paid into court. In 1892 two further orders were made, displacing Mrs Scowby and John Coward as trustees, but directing that certain costs should be paid to them. It later transpired that the £3,500 had not been paid into court but had been used by Miller for his own purposes. The new trustees issued a summons to vary the 1892 orders so that the costs thereby directed to be taxed should be disallowed to Miller. Kekewich J held that he had no jurisdiction to vary the 1892 orders, but that he could make a supplemental order directing the present trustees not to make any payment to Mrs Scowby or John Coward pursuant to the 1892 orders until the money directed by the 1887 order to be paid into court should have been duly lodged. Coward appealed. The jurisdiction to make such a supplemental order was upheld, as it was grounded on facts not available at the time when the 1892 orders were made, and did not alter the 1892 orders. b

Another instance of a supplemental order is to be found in *Hall v Burnell*⁵. That was a vendor's action for specific performance. In 1911 Eve J made an order for specific performance. The purchaser failed to complete in accordance with the order. So the plaintiff moved for an order that the sale agreement should be rescinded and the deposit forfeited to the plaintiff. The order was made as asked. This was clearly a supplemental order based on facts occurring after the date of the previous order, as distinct from facts (as in *Re Scowby, Scowby v Scowby*⁴) occurring before but discovered after the date of the previous order. f

Counsel for the plaintiffs was not able to refer me to any reported case where an order for specific performance was varied by the later addition of an enquiry as to damages. Nor indeed, as he tells me, has the Chief Master had experience of such a case in chambers. g

The general rule is that a court has no jurisdiction to vary its order after the order has been passed and entered. For example, in *Glazier v Rolls*⁶ a question arose whether there could be added to an order, which had already been passed and entered, a direction that the costs to be taxed and paid by the unsuccessful party should include a transcript of the shorthand note of the evidence before the trial judge. The application failed, and Bowen LJ said this⁷: h a 'To seek to alter the judgment by asking that something may be embodied in it, the demand for which was not even thought of at the time, and was never brought to the attention of the Court, is really to ask us to make a different judgment from that which has already been perfected.'

The question before me is whether the case with which I am concerned falls within any recognised exception to that general rule.

b A case somewhat similar to the present came before Farwell J in 1903; it was a vendor's specific performance action, *Munro v Finlinson*¹. The only report which seems to exist is the extremely brief note that is to be found in the Law Times Journal. It reads as follows:

c 'In a specific performance action the vendors in their statement of claim claimed damages as well as the specific performance of the agreement. At the hearing the court ordered specific performance in the event of a good title being shown on inquiry, and gave the plaintiffs their costs if it appeared on inquiry that a good title could have been made before the action was brought. Nothing was said in the order as to an inquiry as to damages, nor were they asked for at the hearing. The certificate found that a good title could have been made before action brought; and on further consideration the plaintiffs asked for an inquiry into the damages sustained by them owing to the delay. All the facts were in the plaintiff's knowledge when the action was heard. Held, that under the circumstances the plaintiffs, not having made their demand when the original order was drawn up, were not now entitled to such inquiry.'

e In my view Re Scowby, *Scowby v Scowby*² is an authority which would justify my making the order which is desired in the present case if and so far as such order is sought on new facts. *Munro v Finlinson*¹ is too briefly reported to be of much value as a precedent, but the decision appears to be consistent with the reverse proposition, namely, that I ought not to make the order which is sought so far as it is based on facts which were known at the date when the decree of specific performance was made.

f In my judgment I am entitled to, and should, direct an enquiry as to damages sustained by reason of the delay, limited to damage which arose after 21st July 1972, the date of the decree for specific performance. Any such damage would be a new fact sufficient to ground a supplemental order.

g I shall, therefore, make an order, supplemental to the order of 21st July 1972, that there be an enquiry whether the plaintiffs have suffered any and what damage after that date by reason of the defendant's delay in completing the sale agreement. The damages so recoverable will be confined in the usual way³ to—h 'the damages which may be reasonably said to have naturally arisen from the delay, or which may be reasonably supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties as likely to arise from the partial breach of the contract.'

I express no view whether such damages would include the additional expense of bridging finance, over and above what would have been payable under a building society mortgage. That may be a matter for argument on the enquiry.

i The costs of the enquiry will be reserved in accordance with the normal practice. The plaintiffs also ask for the costs of this application. Clearly they would not be entitled to an order for such costs now, because if no damage is proved, this application ought not to have been made. The most that the plaintiffs could seek would be that the costs of this application be reserved until the enquiry is concluded. I will hear argument if requested, but I am at present minded to make no order as to the costs of this application on the ground that an enquiry as to damages would have been included in the order of 21st July 1972 if the plaintiffs had asked, but they failed to do so. The expense of this application could, therefore, have been avoided by the plaintiffs, and it would be wrong to throw on the defendant costs which the plaintiffs need not have incurred.

3 Per Fry J in Jacques v Millar (1877) 6 Ch D at 160.

Order accordingly. No order as to costs.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

DAVIES, CAIRNS AND STAMP LJJ

16th FEBRUARY 1973

Divorce – Custody – Access – Taking child out of jurisdiction – Leave – Application for leave by parent having custody – Mother having custody of child – Mother obtaining appointment at South African university – Mother wishing to teach at university level and unable to obtain appointment within jurisdiction – Father holding strong views hostile to policies of South African government – Views expressed in print – Father fearing child would be indoctrinated – Fearing also that he would not be allowed into South Africa – Whether grounds for refusing to grant mother leave to take child out of jurisdiction.

The parties were married in March 1967 and had a daughter later that year. In May 1968 the mother left the father taking the child with her. In December 1969 she was awarded custody of the child by a court of summary jurisdiction and in November 1972 she was given leave to file a petition for divorce. She herself had a degree in art and taught for a while at a comprehensive school. She had wanted to teach art at university level but when her attempts to obtain a post of that kind in the United Kingdom failed she left the comprehensive school and took a job in an antique shop in London. In 1972 she was offered a two year appointment as an art teacher at a university in South Africa. The father, who was concerned in educational matters and wrote about education, disapproved strongly of the apartheid policy of the South African government. He feared that if the child went with the mother to South Africa (i) the child might become infected and even indoctrinated with the country's racist doctrines; (ii) that the mother, who had said that she was not interested in such matters, would take no steps to warn the child against those doctrines; (iii) that he might not be admitted into the country to see the child because of his strong views on its racialism expressed in his writings. The mother, who had said that she would not go to South Africa if prevented from taking up the appointment, applied for, and was granted, leave to take the child out of the jurisdiction. When asked about her attitude to apartheid she had said: 'I feel completely open about it. I shall judge for myself when I get there. I do not think one can always appreciate a country's present circumstances from newspaper reports. I think it is better to go and see for yourself'. She had also said she would not influence the child; she would let her make up her own mind. The father appealed.

Held – The appeal would be dismissed; it was a very strong thing for the court to make an order which would prevent a parent granted custody of a child following

- a her chosen career and in the circumstances it would be quite wrong for the court to debar the mother from taking up her appointment on account of fears of the father (see p 706 h and p 708 e and h, post).

Appeal

- The father appealed against an order made by Finer J on 17th January 1973 ordering that the mother should have leave to remove the child of the family born on 16th August 1967, permanently out of the jurisdiction of the court to reside in the Republic of South Africa on her undertaking to return the child to the jurisdiction if so ordered by the court. The facts are set out in the judgment of Davies LJ.

S Tumin for the father.

P M J Slot for the mother.

- e DAVIES LJ. This is an appeal by a father against an order of Finer J made on 17th January 1973 whereby he gave leave to the mother to take the only child of the marriage, a girl some 5½ years old, to Grahamstown in South Africa, I will not say necessarily permanently, but in order to allow the mother to take up an appointment as an art teacher at the School of Fine Art at Rhodes University in Grahamstown.

- f The two main grounds of the father's appeal are: first of all, the long distance that the mother and child will be away from the father (he has been having monthly access to the girl); that the cost of his going to South Africa, or I suppose of the mother bringing the child back, would be very great; and that, owing to the strong views that he holds about the racist approach of the South African government to the natives there, which views he has expressed in writing, he might very well not be permitted to enter South Africa, and that in any event he would dislike intensely to be in that country. Secondly, and arising out of that last point, he expresses a lively fear that, if this little girl goes to and is brought up in South Africa, even if only for two years, which is the length of the mother's present appointment, the child might be infected with the doctrines that the government in that country favour, and indeed to some extent become indoctrinated. The third ground of substance that is put forward by counsel for the father is that the mother has expressly in her evidence stated that she is not interested in matters of that kind and would, save in exceptional circumstances, take no steps to warn the little girl or to bring her up in views opposed to the South African regime.

- h The parties—still very young—were married in March 1967 when the father was 23 and the mother 21. The father has a doctorate of philosophy of Edinburgh University and he is concerned in educational matters; he writes about education and has written at least one book. The mother, who has a degree in art, is, by profession, an art teacher, though presently she has been employed in an antique shop in Mayfair, having previously been teaching in comprehensive schools. The girl was born on 16th August 1967. The marriage proved very short-lived, the mother leaving on 20th May 1968 taking the child. In December 1969 the court of summary jurisdiction in Brighton awarded custody to the mother and made a small order of maintenance for the child of £1 a week. That no doubt was because at that time the father was probably earning very little indeed. a

In January 1971 the mother filed a petition on the ground of the father's unreasonable conduct; and the case at one time was being defended, the father alleging desertion on the part of the mother. Eventually, on 30th November 1972, the mother was given leave to file a fresh petition, on the ground of two years' living apart; and in December of that year Faulks J by consent granted an injunction to prevent the mother from taking the child out of the jurisdiction until the summons as to custody and for leave to take the child out of the jurisdiction was heard. As I have said, it came before Finer J on 17th January when he made the order allowing the mother to take the child out of the jurisdiction and gave leave to appeal, which I do not think was necessary. He did not deal with an application by the father, who, on the basis of the judge's order allowing the child to be taken out, wished to have what, I suppose, he thought was a final visit to the girl, in the absence of the mother. The judge said that this court would have to deal with that application; and eventually we may have to have a discussion with counsel about that. b

In the forefront of his grounds of appeal the father complains that the learned judge put too much emphasis on some observations made in this court in *P (LM) (otherwise E) v P (GE)*¹. It is not necessary for me to discuss the facts in that case but just to make two short quotations, the first being from the judgment of Winn LJ²: c

'His right [i.e. the stepfather's right in that case] to do what he chooses with his life and to live where he chooses is, of course, in conflict, as the matter stands at this very moment, with the view of the court expressed by [the judge], since that order will prevent freedom for the stepfather in this particular respect.'

Then in Sach LJ's judgment³: d

'When a marriage breaks up, then a situation normally arises when the child of that marriage, instead of being in the joint custody of both parents, must of necessity become one who is in the custody of a single parent. Once that position has arisen and the custody is working well, this court should not lightly interfere with such reasonable way of life as is selected by that parent to whom custody has been rightly given. Any such interference may, as Winn LJ has pointed out, produce considerable strains which would be unfair not only to the parent whose way of life is interfered with but also to any new marriage of that parent.'

Our attention was also called to a similar observation by myself in *T v T*⁴. e

Counsel for the father has rightly pointed out that the facts in *P (LM) v P (GE)*¹ were vastly different from those in the present case. I entirely agree. One does not, I think, need to make comparisons between the facts of the two cases. But I emphasise once more that when one parent has been given custody it is a very strong thing for this court to make an order which will prevent the following of a chosen career by the parent who has custody. In the present case, if the mother is not permitted to take up her appointment in South Africa, she has declared her intention of not going there at all. She welcomes the appointment. She has been trying for a long time to get an art teaching job other than in a comprehensive school in this country and has failed; and that is why she went to take the job in the antique shop. She does not want to continue in that: she wants to teach art. So far as finance is concerned, she has been earning in the antique shop some £1,200 a year; and in South Africa her salary, though the cost of living is apparently higher, will be in the neighbourhood of £2,500. f a Counsel for the father has forcefully put before us all the matters which are contained in his long and elaborate notice of appeal; but I do not propose to go through all of those. It is said by counsel that the father would not mind the mother going almost anywhere else in the world, but he says she has chosen the one country—I think this is probably hyperbole—of which the father so violently disapproves and to which in all practicability he thinks he will be unable to go and visit his little daughter.

b He says that the mother has made no proper enquiries about the cost of living and living accommodation and conditions in South Africa. I cannot agree with that observation. We have had put before us two letters, one of which is a letter from a Professor Bradshaw, who is at the School of Fine Art in Rhodes University, explaining quite fully the conditions that the mother is likely to find if and when she goes out to this university. That was a letter of 3rd October 1972. We have also before us a c letter of 27th November from the registrar of the university dealing in a good deal of detail with schooling in South Africa, the possibility of getting a servant or a nanny to help with the daughter, and travelling arrangements; and so on and so forth. In addition to that, Professor Bradshaw was over in this country in December and the mother had the opportunity of having a conversation with him about conditions and opportunities if she goes out.

d Then, coming back to the apartheid question, I have already pointed out that the father is afraid that the child will be infected or indoctrinated with the views held by many people in South Africa. One would have thought that possibly the reaction might be the opposite; but one does not know. Then it is said with great emphasis by counsel for the father that the mother has expressly said that she will not take any steps to disabuse the child or make her dissatisfied with conditions and doctrines in South Africa. We were referred to one or two passages in her evidence in that

e regard with reference to her attitude to apartheid and her attitude in that connection to her little daughter. She was asked, right at the end of her evidence-in-chief: 'Have you ever been roused to an interest in the subject, or is your mind absolutely open?' This is with regard to the South African doctrines, of course. The answer was:

f 'I feel completely open about it. I shall judge for myself when I get there. I do not think one can always appreciate a country's present circumstances from newspaper reports. I think it is better to go and see for yourself.'

It seems to me that there is considerable force in that answer and that it is a sensible answer. She said that she had not read any books on the subject: all she had read about South Africa was in certain publications which she had had from the High

g Commission here. Then another passage to which we were referred in cross-examination:

'Q You realise, and now you must realise, do you not, that [the little girl] will be brought up at school to regard blacks as essentially inferior to whites? A Well, she is an intelligent child. She can make up her own mind when she is of age.'

h 'Q What sort of lead would you give her? A I would not influence her.'

'Q You would not influence her on that; I see. A No. I would not influence her on anything. I would let her make up her own mind.'

Later on the mother did say that if there were some special circumstances she would, if I may use the phrase, have a word with the girl about it.

i Another point made by counsel for the father is with regard to the mother's mother. She is some 61 years of age and has been divorced by, or more probably has divorced, her husband. We were not told the facts of that. Apparently she has no money except for the periodical payments which she gets from her former husband. It is pointed out that she was not called as a witness, though she was available to be called; so the judge had no opportunity of seeing her and estimating her character, and she is quite an unknown quantity. And, says counsel for the father, it is a part of the mother's plan that that lady should go out to South Africa with them and live with them and, I suppose, be available to keep an eye on the little girl when the mother is at work. I see the force of that, and perhaps it would have been better if the grandmother had been called. But, save that it is suggested by the father, somewhat faintly, that the grandmother has been a disturbing influence during periods of access, there really is, as I see it, no suggestion of any weight at all against the mother's mother, and I do not think that that is a matter that should properly be taken into consideration in this case.

At the end of it all, one comes back to the principles enunciated by Sachs LJ in the case to which I have referred¹. The mother has been unable to get a job that suits her in this country. Her teaching job was in a comprehensive school, and she does not want to teach art to children of that kind; she wants to teach art at university level. She disliked the teaching that she was doing in this country so much that she took this job in the oriental antique shop that I have mentioned. She had the good fortune, having failed to get other jobs in this country, to see an advertisement which led to her being offered and accepting this appointment in Grahamstown. She was due to go there and start work on 1st January 1973, but that, of course, has had to be delayed pending the application to the learned judge and the appeal to this court.

I have, I think, considered everything that has been said to us by counsel for the father. One sympathises a great deal with the father, whose views obviously do not in anything like every respect correspond with those of the mother—not that there is anything against the mother at all. It does seem to me that it would be quite wrong for us to say to the mother that she cannot take this appointment because of the fears which the father has, some of them, I feel, somewhat unjustified, since the approach to this problem seems to be that as the result of the views held by the authorities in South Africa the whole place is completely uncivilised. I do not believe that that is the situation in a university town or that Grahamstown is anything like that at all. It seems to be an ordinary, civilised place, apart from this one very serious objection that the father has. I think that it would be wrong to prevent the mother on that ground from going out and taking the job which she has obtained.

This is not necessarily permanent. Of course, one cannot see ahead. It could turn into a long-term appointment in South Africa. It could, I suppose, result in the mother marrying again in South Africa. One just does not know. On the other hand, she might not like the job and not like conditions there and either give notice within her two year contract and get released from it or come back to this country at the end of the two year period.

In accordance with the views which the learned judge expressed in a very long and very careful judgment, in which he considered not only the matters to which I have adverted but all the many factors that came out in the affidavits and in the oral evidence of the parties, I agree with what he said and I agree with the order that he made. I think not merely that we ought not to interfere but that, in all the circumstances, it was the right and proper order; and I would dismiss the appeal.

The employers recognised four trade unions for the purposes of collective bargaining and negotiation on terms and conditions of employment. By virtue of an agreement between the employers and the four unions a works committee was established as part of the structure created for collective bargaining and the orderly settlement of disputes. The committee consisted of representatives of management and of certain elected workers. To qualify for election a worker had to be a member of one of the four recognised unions. A vacancy having occurred on the works committee, a notice was published inviting nominations to fill the vacancy. The notice stipulated that candidates for nomination had to be members of one of the recognised unions. Two employees ('the complainants') who were members of an unrecognised union submitted nomination papers which showed that they were not members of one of the recognised unions. The nomination papers were rejected by the employers. On a complaint of unfair industrial practice, an industrial tribunal found that the employers had discriminated against the complainants under s 5 (2) (b), (4)^a of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 and ordered (a) that the complainants had a right to be eligible for election to the works committee and (b) that the employers had no right to refuse to accept their nomination papers on the ground that they were not members of one of the recognised unions. The employers appealed.

Held – The appeal would be allowed as the employers had not 'discriminated against' the complainants within the meaning of s 5 (2) (b), (4) of the 1971 Act; those two subsections, which complemented one another, contemplated a detriment or a benefit suffered or enjoyed by a worker as an individual in the context of his contract of employment and were not aimed at discrimination in the sense of differentiation between certain groups of workers; the 1971 Act encouraged collective bargaining and the development of orderly procedures for settling disputes and it was inherent in the recognition of certain unions that for some purposes an employer would be obliged to discriminate between those of his employees who were members of the unions concerned and those who were not; since on the evidence the discrimination by the employers was between those workers who as members of a recognised union were eligible for election as union representatives and those who were not and was not discrimination against the complainants as members of the latter group, the qualifications applicable to candidates for election to the works committee did not involve any unfair industrial practice and the employers were entitled to refuse nomination papers from either of the complainants (see p 715 a to g, post). a

This was an appeal by the Central Electricity Generating Board ("CEGB") against a decision of an industrial tribunal (chairman G M Smailes Esq) sitting in Leeds, dated 12th October 1972, on a complaint under ss 5 and 106 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, that Roger Coleman and Ian James ('the complainants') had a right to be eligible as candidates for election to the works committee for Ferrybridge 'C' Power Station and that the CEGB had no right to refuse to accept a nomination paper from either complainant on the ground that he was not a member of a trade union which was a party to the agreement under which the works committee was established. The Electricity Council, the North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board, the South of Scotland Electricity Board, the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers ('AUEW'), the Electrical, Electronic & Telecommunications Union/Plumbing Trades Union ('EET/PTU'), the National Union of General and Municipal Workers ('NUGMW') and the Transport and General Workers' Union ('TGWU') were added as parties to the proceedings under r 52 of the Industrial Court Rules 1971¹. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. d

5th March. SIR JOHN DONALDSON P read the following judgment of the court. In *Electricity Supply Union v Central Electricity Generating Board*² this court considered and rejected an application by the Electricity Supply Union ('ESU') for a reference to the Commission on Industrial Relations under s 45 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, which deals with sole bargaining agencies. However, the judgment contained the following passage³: h

"There is, however, one observation which we make in conclusion. Paragraph (4) of the model constitution for works committees which is set out in schedule 3 to the [National Joint Industrial Council] agreement provides that no employee shall be eligible as a candidate for election to a works committee unless he is a i

- a member of [a National Joint Industrial Council] union. On the basis, which we accept as correct, that a works committee is not a negotiating body, it occurs to us to question whether this restriction is in conflict with section 5 of the Act of 1971. This section does not allow an employer to discriminate against a worker by reason of his exercising his right not to belong to a registered or unregistered trade union, save in special circumstances which do not apply here. We express no view on the answer to this question, because we have heard no argument and it is not an issue before us. We mention the question as one which the parties to the [National Joint Industrial Council] agreement might feel it right to consider.'
- b

In the event the parties had little opportunity of considering this question because the problem had already arisen in an acute form and the complainants made their application to the industrial tribunal within 48 hours of this court giving judgment.

- c The industrial tribunal sitting in Leeds unanimously found in their favour—
- 'that each of the complainants has a right to be eligible as a candidate for election to the Works Committee for Ferrybridge "C" Power Station and that the [Central Electricity Generating Board] have no right to refuse to accept a nomination paper from either complainant on the grounds that he is not a member of a trade union which is a party to the agreement under which the constitution of the Committee is established.
- d

From that decision the Central Electricity Generating Board ('CEGB') now appeals.

- The Electricity Acts of 1947 and 1957 imposed a statutory duty on the Electricity Council, the Scottish Electricity Boards and their respective predecessors to seek joint consultations with any appropriate organisation with a view to the conclusion of collective agreements for establishing and maintaining machinery for negotiating on terms and conditions of employment and allied matters. In pursuance of that duty an agreement was reached in March 1948 and this was replaced by the current agreement which was concluded on 31st August 1955. The latter agreement was made between the Central Electricity Authority (the predecessor of the Electricity Council in this context), the North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board, the South of Scotland Electricity Board, the Amalgamated Engineering Union (now the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers [Engineering Section]), ('AUEW') the Electrical Trades Union (now the Electrical, Electronic & Telecommunications Union/Plumbing Trades Union) ('EET/PTU'), the National Union of Enginemen, Firemen, Mechanics and Electrical Workers (which is now part of the Transport & General Workers' Union), the National Union of General and Municipal Workers ('NUGMW') and the Transport and General Workers' Union ('TGWU').
- e
- g

- By s 12 (4) of the 1957 Act it is the duty of the CEGB, the appellants, to comply with any such agreement. The current agreement provides for the establishment of a National Joint Industrial Council ('NJIC'), District Joint Industrial Councils ('DJIC') and local works committees. The NJIC consists of 18 representatives of management and 13 representatives nominated by the four recognised trade unions, namely the AUEW, the EET/PTU, the NUGMW and the TGWU ('the recognised unions'). Its prime function is to settle by negotiation the terms and conditions of employment of manual workers engaged in the electricity supply industry. The DJICs consist of eight representatives of management and varying numbers of representatives of the four recognised unions, again nominated by those unions. Their prime functions are to implement at district level the various agreements reached in the NJIC and to establish and supervise the activities of works committees including elections to those committees. The works committees consist of representatives of management and representatives of the manual workers. The latter are not appointed but are elected by the general body of manual workers from amongst candidates nominated by any two electors. The only material qualification for becoming a candidate is membership of one of the recognised unions. The functions of the works committee are set out in the national agreement but can be summarised as follows: (a) To secure that the employees shall be given an interest in and responsibility for the conditions under which their work is performed (para 1). (b) To secure joint action to implement the national agreement and to deal with any problems in relation to working hours, payment of wages, holiday arrangements and the settlement of internal grievances, subject to the express proviso 'that the Works Committee shall not in any event have power to negotiate terms and conditions of employment' (paras 2 and 3). (c) To operate a differences procedure involving investigation, settlement or reference to the district council (para 6). (d) To operate a grievances procedure involving reference to the works committee if the grievance has not been settled by the employee directly with management or by subsequent discussions between the recognised trade union of which the employee is a member and management.

Through no fault of the tribunal, evidence of the events leading up to the complaints with which they were concerned was not as detailed as it might have been. The reason may have been that the basic facts were not in dispute. Before us, additional evidence was admitted with the consent of the complainants. It now appears that in June 1972 a vacancy occurred on the works committee for a representative of the electrical and instrument skilled group to which both the complainants belonged. The joint secretaries of the works committee (Mr Hancox of the EET/PTU and Mr Rowbotham, a management representative) posted a notice inviting nominations and stating that nomination forms could be obtained from the general office. The notice stated that candidates must be members of one of the recognised unions.

The nomination forms contain a declaration that the proposed candidate is such a member. The complainants asked for and were given these forms, which they completed in such a way as to suggest that they were not members of any of the recognised unions but were members of the ESU. When the completed forms were handed in at the general office, they were seen by a Mr Elstrop, who was a clerk employed by the CEEGB, and rejected by him on the grounds that the forms on their face showed that neither of the complainants was eligible for election. It now appears that Mr Elstrop should not have taken this action but should have handed the forms to the election scrutineers, who would have rejected them. The scrutineers are appointed annually and are drawn from the employees' side of the committee.

The tribunal concluded that the restriction of candidates for election to the works committee to manual workers who were members of one of the recognised unions constituted unlawful discrimination by the CEEGB and that this constituted discrimination against the complainants rather than against the ESU of which they were members. The tribunal also decided that the proviso as to union membership contained in the constitution of the works committee was severable and that accordingly the complainants were eligible for membership. Finally it decided that it was just and equitable to make the declaration of rights sought by the complainants.

It seemed to the court that the decision on this appeal would vitally affect the two Scottish Electricity Boards, the Electricity Council and the four recognised unions and that it was undesirable that it should be decided without their being given an opportunity for advancing argument. Accordingly the court exercised its powers under r 52 of the Industrial Court Rules 1971¹ to join all seven bodies as additional respondents. In the event all were represented with the sole exception of the AUEW.

The case for the complainants is that as between themselves and the CEEGB they have the right to be a member of such registered trade union as they may choose (see s 5 (1) (a) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971), and have in fact chosen to be members of the ESU, which is such a trade union. This is accepted by the CEEGB. Furthermore they have the right to refuse to be a member of any particular trade union or a unions, whether registered or not (see s 5 (1) (b) of the 1971 Act) and have in fact chosen not to be members of any of the recognised unions. This again is accepted by the CEGB. The complainants then go on to allege that the CEGB has discriminated against them by reason of their having exercised their right not to belong to any of the recognised unions and to submit that this is an unfair industrial practice under s 5 (2) (b) of the 1971 Act. The discrimination alleged is that they are debarred from standing as candidates for election to the works committee.

b The arguments advanced on behalf of the employers and the recognised unions differed in detail, but nothing turns on these differences. The CEGB take three main points, namely that (a) the evidence does not disclose discrimination within the meaning of that word in s 5 of the 1971 Act, (b) any such discrimination was exercised by persons other than the CEGB and (c) in any event it would not be just or equitable to make the order asked for.

c We can dispose of the latter two submissions briefly. Whilst it may well be true that the clerk who rejected the complainants' nomination papers was exceeding his authority in an attempt to be helpful, the CEGB by its representative Mr Rowbotham was a party to giving notice of the forthcoming works committee election and to affirming that only members of the recognised unions were acceptable as candidates. We therefore have no doubt that the discrimination (if any) was exercised by the CEGB, although it did not act alone.

d Apart from cases in which the complainant has in some way induced the respondent to breach a right conferred on him by the 1971 Act, or the breach is purely accidental or technical and is not denied, it is difficult to think of circumstances in which it would not be just and equitable to make an order determining the rights of the respective parties. Suffice it to say that in the present case the tribunal was correct in expressing their view of the rights of the parties in the form of a determination of right.

e This leaves the main point of whether there was an unfair industrial practice consisting of discrimination of a kind prohibited by s 5 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. The solicitor for the two complainants points out (possibly rightly) that they were unaware of the ramifications of the structure of NJIC and DJICs. His clients f just wanted to serve on their works committee. They were not allowed to do so, because they had exercised their right to refuse to belong to one of the recognised unions. They had been deprived of the opportunity of enjoying the job satisfaction which goes with membership of the works committee. In his submission this amounted to discrimination and constituted an unfair industrial practice under s 5.

g Counsel for the CEGB, with the support of counsel for the Electricity Council and the Scottish Electricity Boards and counsel for the unions, contended that there was no discrimination against the complainants and that if there was any discrimination at all, it was against the ESU. The works committee was an integral part of the collective bargaining machinery permitted and indeed encouraged by the 1971 Act and necessarily had to be composed of members of the recognised unions on the employees' side. In particular he pointed out that the agreement could have provided h for the employee members to be nominated by the recognised unions as was the case with the DJICs. Alternatively it could have provided for them to be elected by a ballot limited to members of the recognised unions. In neither case would there have been discrimination within the meaning of the section. It would therefore be odd that a widening of the franchise should create an unfair industrial practice.

i In our judgment the key to the problem lies in reconciling s 5 with the principles of collective bargaining and of developing orderly procedures for settling disputes. Both involve recognition of unions and the differentiation between the union which is recognised and those unions which are not. This in its turn can create an advantageous position for those employees who are members of the recognised union as compared with those who are members of an unrecognised union or are not members of any union.

The principle of collective bargaining freely conducted on behalf of workers and employers with due regard to the general interests of the community is the first of the 1971 Act's guiding principles (see s 1). The second is that of developing and maintaining orderly procedures in industry for the peaceful and expeditious settlement of disputes by negotiation, conciliation or arbitration, again with due regard to the general interests of the community. The fourth is the principle of freedom and security for workers, protected by adequate safeguards against unfair industrial practices on the part of employers and others. Part III of the 1971 Act deals in detail with collective bargaining (see ss 34-60). Part II of the Act deals with the rights of workers (see ss 5-33).

'(1) Every worker shall, as between himself and his employer, have the following rights, that is to say,—(a) the right to be a member of such trade union as he may choose; (b) subject to sections 6 and 17 of this Act, the right, if he so desires, to be a member of no trade union or other organisation of workers or to refuse to be a member of any particular trade union or other organisation of workers; (c) where he is a member of a trade union, the right, at any appropriate time, to take part in the activities of the trade union (including any activities as, or with a view to becoming, an official of the trade union) and the right to seek or accept appointment or election, and (if appointed or elected) to hold office, as such an official.

'(2) It shall accordingly be an unfair industrial practice for any employer, or for any person acting on behalf of an employer,—(a) to prevent or deter a worker from exercising any of the rights conferred on him by subsection (1) of the section, or (b) to dismiss, penalise or otherwise discriminate against a worker by reason of his exercising any such right, or (c) except in accordance with the next following section, to refuse to engage a worker on the grounds that, at the time when he applied for engagement, he was a member of a trade union or of a particular trade union, or that he was not then a member of a trade union or other organisation of workers or of a particular trade union or other organisation of workers or of any of two or more particular trade unions or other such organisations.

'(3) For the purposes of subsection (2) (a) of this section an employer, or a person acting on behalf of an employer, shall not be regarded as preventing or deterring a worker from exercising the rights conferred on the worker by subsection (1) (b) of this section by reason only that (without any suggestion of reward for compliance or penalty for non-compliance) he seeks to encourage the worker to join a trade union which the employer recognises as having negotiating rights in respect of him.

'(4) Where an employer offers a benefit of any kind to any workers as an inducement to refrain from exercising a right conferred on them by subsection (1) of this section, and the employer—(a) confers that benefit on one or more of those workers who agree to refrain from exercising that right, and (b) withholds it from one or more of them who do not agree to do so, the employer shall for the purposes of this section be regarded, in relation to any such worker as is mentioned in paragraph (b) of this subsection, as having thereby discriminated against him by reason of his exercising that right.'

The complainants rely on sub-ss (2) (b) and (4) of s 5. Counsel for the Electricity Council and the Scottish Electricity Boards submitted that, on its true construction, sub-s (4) is not concerned with a case in which workers who in fact join, or remain members of, a particular union obtain a benefit which is denied to those who do not. It is concerned with a case in which the workers who obtain the benefit are those who have agreed with the employer that they will join, or remain members of, a particular union. We consider that this is too narrow a construction of the subsection, for it would enable an employer to render illusory the rights conferred a by sub-s (1) by the simple expedient of giving substantial rewards to those who in fact refrained from exercising them. In our judgment, sub-s (4) is merely complementary to sub-s (2) (b). Subsection (2) (b) is concerned with the pressure by penalising the worker who exercises his rights. Subsection (4) is concerned with pressure by rewarding the worker who refrains from exercising his rights. Accordingly we think that sub-ss (2) (b) and (4) can be regarded as a composite whole.

b There is a real difference between 'discriminating', which is defined in the Shorter Oxford Dictionary as 'to make or constitute a difference in or between; to differentiate', and 'discriminating against' which is there defined as 'to make an adverse distinction with regard to' (our emphasis). There can be no doubt that the CEGB discriminated between those workers who were members of one of the recognised unions and those who were not. But this is not condemned by the 1971 Act. The unfair industrial practice consists of dismissing, penalising or otherwise discriminating against one group of workers or conferring a benefit on the remainder. In our judgment, what is contemplated is a detriment or benefit suffered or enjoyed by the worker as an individual in the context of his contract of employment. Examples spring readily to mind in the field of pay, promotion, holidays, choice of work or shift and grievance and disciplinary procedures. But that is not this case. Here the CEGB has recognised four trade unions, a step which much of the 1971 Act is designed to encourage. It is inherent in such recognition that for some purposes an employer will be obliged to discriminate between those of his employees who are members of the unions concerned and those who are not. Thus shop stewards and other local union representatives will be accorded the facilities usually accorded to holders of their offices. They will necessarily be members of the recognised unions and the facilities may be said to be a benefit. The vital distinction, however, is that they are benefits which are enjoyed by the worker qua union representative and not qua individual. Insofar as any discrimination is involved, it is a discrimination between workers who are union representatives and those who are not. It is not discrimination against the latter. Similarly in the present instance the discrimination is between those who are eligible for election as union representatives on the works committee and those who are not. It is not discrimination against the complainants as members of the latter group. For the sake of completeness we should add that we regard it as immaterial that the works committee has no direct negotiating rights. It is part of the structure which has been created for purposes of collective bargaining and the orderly settlement of disputes. Accordingly we do not consider that the restrictive qualifications applicable to candidates for election to the works committee involve any unfair industrial practice under s 5.

g For these reasons the appeal is allowed. The determination of the tribunal will be varied to provide that neither of the complainants has a right to be eligible as a candidate for election to the works committee for Ferrybridge 'C' Power Station unless and until he is a member of one of the trade unions which is a party to the agreement under which the constitution of the committee is established and that the CEGB was entitled on this ground to refuse to accept a nomination paper from either of the complainants.

h Although the CEGB has been successful in this appeal, we think that the parties to the NJIC agreement would be well advised to give further consideration to two of its provisions. The first is the limitation of membership of the works committee to those who are members of the NJIC unions. The second is the grievance procedure set out in para 7 of the functions section of the works committee constitution.

j Uniform recognition of trade unions on a national basis has much to commend it in the electricity supply and similar industries where there are few employers, all of whom are associated with one another and the nature of the business carried on by each is very similar. Nevertheless, it should be recognised that from time to time workers in a particular area may be less enthusiastic over the arrangement than are those in the rest of the country. Ferrybridge 'C' Power Station is or may be a case in point. It is in the interests of good industrial relations that the system should allow those workers to express their lack of enthusiasm, both in order to draw attention to any remediable defects in the service provided by the recognised unions and in order to avoid the feeling of frustration which they would otherwise experience. For the reasons which we have already expressed we have no doubt that it is perfectly proper to restrict membership of the employees side of the works committee to members of the NJIC unions. But is it necessary or wise? The first function of such a committee is expressed to be 'to secure that the employees shall be given an interest in and responsibility for the conditions under which their work is performed'. This will not be achieved if the employees' representatives on the works committee can only be elected from members of the NJIC unions and for some reason or other those unions have temporarily lost the confidence of a significant proportion of the employees in the works. The removal of this restrictive qualification should pose no threat to the NJIC unions or to the national and district arrangements for collective bargaining. If they enjoy local support, their members will still be elected. If they are not elected, they will receive early warning that all is not well and they will be able to put matters right. Even if the result were that the NJIC unions were wholly unrepresented on a few works committees—and this seems a most unlikely eventuality—it would provide no grounds for re-opening the question of recognition on a district and national basis.

The individual grievance procedure raises a different issue. In the light of the rights of workers set out in s 5 of the 1971 Act it is desirable, and probably essential in order to avoid an unfair industrial practice on the part of the employer, that the procedure shall operate and be seen to operate equally fairly whether or not the employee concerned is a member of one of the NJIC unions.

Stage (a) of the agreed procedure involves discussions directly between the employee concerned and the appropriate officer of the board. This is in accordance with para 125 (1) of the Code of Practice¹. But it also provides that the employee 'may if he so desires be accompanied and assisted by his manual workers' representative'. Under the existing constitution such a representative will necessarily be a member of one of the NJIC unions which may not be satisfactory to an employee who is not such a member. It is for consideration whether it would not be better if this read 'and may if he so desires be accompanied and assisted by his manual workers' representative or other person of his choice'.

Stage (b), which applies if the grievance is not settled at stage (a), involves the employee remitting the matter 'to his Trade Union (being a party to the agreement under which this constitution is established) for further discussion with the appropriate officer of the Board'. This is plainly inapplicable in the case of an employee who is not a member of one of the NJIC unions.

Stage (c), which applies if the grievance is not settled at stage (b), involves the representative of either the board or the manual workers referring the matter to the works committee, the employee's NJIC trade union having a right to appear. This again is inapplicable in the case of an employee who is not a member of an NJIC union. He has no right to refer the matter to the works committee himself and, not being a member of an NJIC union, he may not be satisfied that his manual workers' representative will do so on his behalf. Finally he has no relevant trade union to appear before the works committee on his behalf.

It is for consideration whether it would not be preferable to combine and amend stages (b) and (c) to provide:

'Failing a settlement of the grievance, either the representative of the Board or the employee shall refer the difference to the Works Committee and the employee may if he so desires appear before the Committee and be accompanied and assisted by his manual workers' representative or other person of his choice.'

¹ The Code of Practice was brought into operation on 28th February 1972 by the Industrial Relations (Code of Practice) Order 1972 (SI 1972 No 179)

a Such an amended constitution would enable the NJIC unions to intervene on behalf of their members at either stage if the employee so wished, and even if the constitution of the works committee were altered it is unlikely that they would be unrepresented amongst the employees' side.

b It is not for us to decide whether any and, if so what, amendments should be made in the NJIC agreement and we do not seek to do so. Apart from the fact that such a decision would be outwith our jurisdiction, we have heard no argument from those concerned and we are not fully informed on all the relevant considerations. Some may say that if the court has no power of decision it should not comment. Indeed, this was said in the course of the hearing. We venture to disagree. The principal object of this court is to promote better industrial relations. No one who has the same object at heart should object to being asked to consider constructive suggestions for the improvement of the agreed procedure. This is all that we have done. We shall be surprised if any of the parties to this appeal take exception to our doing so. We shall be disappointed if they fail to think about the problem.

The applicant was charged with driving a motor vehicle without insurance. The case was due for hearing in November 1971. The applicant failed to appear before the justices either then or on four subsequent occasions. The justices finally dealt with the case in his absence and, having found it proved, imposed a fine on him, but, since they could not, by virtue of s 26 (2)^a of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, disqualify him from driving in his absence they adjourned the question of disqualification to a subsequent hearing. The applicant finally appeared on a warrant, after three further adjournments, in June 1972. His licence was produced and he was disqualified for six months. The applicant applied for an order to quash the disqualification.

Held – Under s 14 (3)^b of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952 the justices' power to adjourn the case was limited to adjournment 'after convicting the accused and before sentencing him or otherwise dealing with him'. Accordingly, if they were going to consider disqualification they were bound to adjourn the whole question of sentencing and disposal and to deal with it as one matter when the adjourned hearing took place. The disqualification order had therefore been made in excess of jurisdiction and should be quashed (see p 719 j to p 720 b, post). a

Philip Geoffrey Bithell applied to the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division for an order of certiorari to remove into the court and quash an order made by the Talgarth justices on 6th June 1972 that the applicant should be disqualified from driving for a period of six months in accordance with s 5 (3) of the Road Traffic Act 1962. On 7th March 1972 the applicant had been convicted in his absence by the justices on charges of driving a motor vehicle without insurance and of driving a motor vehicle without a test certificate. The grounds of the application were, inter alia, stated to be as follows: following the applicant's conviction the justices purported to adjourn the question of disqualifying the applicant from driving, as they were obliged to do under s 26 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, having regard to the fact that the applicant was not present before them; the justices purported to adjourn the matter under s 14 (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952 but, rather than adjourning the matter before sentencing the applicant, the justices purported to sentence him to a fine of £15 before adjourning the matter for the question of disqualification to be considered; the justices were functi officio on 7th March and could not therefore consider the question of disqualification on 6th June as they purported to do. c

LORD WIDGERY CJ. In these proceedings counsel moves on behalf of Philip Geoffrey Bithell for an order of certiorari to remove into this court with a view to its being quashed an order made by the Talgarth justices on 6th June 1972 when they purported to disqualify the applicant from driving for a period of six months. I take the facts from the affidavit of the clerk to the justices which shows that the applicant faced two charges, one for driving without insurance and one for driving without a Ministry of Transport certificate in relation to his vehicle. The case was first due for hearing as long ago as 7th November 1971, but the applicant, the defendant in those proceedings, did not appear and the case was adjourned for a month. In December 1971 again he did not appear, and again the justices adjourned the case for a month. Before the sitting of the court in January 1972 the applicant pleaded guilty by letter, but he did not send his driving licence, which was necessary in order that the court could exercise its powers of endorsement, so the case was put over until February 1972. Again there was a letter from the applicant; again he failed to send his driving licence and the matter was adjourned until March, the justices issuing a further summons against the applicant for failing to produce his licence to the court. On 7th March the applicant was again not before the court; no communication had been received from him. Proof was tendered that both the summonses had been served personally and the court decided to proceed with the case in the applicant's absence. They fined him certain sums in respect of the three offences, as they now were, which faced him, but they did not deal with any question of disqualification from holding a licence, saying that that must be adjourned to await the production of the licence. f a April came and no driving licence, no fines had been paid, a warrant was issued for the applicant's arrest. In May the warrant had not been executed and the court was still without the driving licence. Finally in June 1972 the applicant appeared, having been arrested and allowed bail; his driving licence was at last produced, and he was disqualified from driving for six months. It is that matter which counsel seeks to have brought up into this court with a view to its being quashed.

b There is no dispute but that the justices acted quite properly at the sitting in March when they decided to try the case in the applicant's absence. The history which I have recounted is quite sufficient to show that the time had come when trial in his absence was a perfectly legitimate course for the court to take and the reason no doubt why they did not dispose of the case finally on that occasion was because they had in mind s 26 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, which provides:

c 'A magistrates' court shall not in a person's absence impose any disqualification on him, except on resumption of the hearing after an adjournment under section 14 (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952 . . .'

d In the face of that provision the justices no doubt appreciated that they could not make an order of disqualification in the absence of the applicant, and so they purported to make a split order. By this I mean they purported to impose a fine at their March sitting and stood over the question of disqualification until that order was eventually made at the sitting in June.

e The short question is whether the justices were in a position to make an order in June, or whether, as counsel contends, they were functi officio by virtue of the order which they had made in March. It would in any event, in my judgment, be bad sentencing practice to deal on different occasions with different elements in the disposal of a single case. Very often forfeiture or disqualification is related to penalty, and it is dangerous, to say the least of it, to embark on the disposal of any case without having all the matters available for decision by the same court at the same time. But I would not think that a decision would be quashed on certiorari merely because it was not in accordance with good sentencing practice. Here, however, it is said, f and I think with force, that the matter went beyond a breach of the rules of good sentencing practice, and was in fact illegal. When one looks at s 14 (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952, the reason becomes apparent. Under sub-s (1) of that section a magistrates' court is given power, whether before or after beginning to try an information, to adjourn the trial. That is a provision clearly restricted in my view to an adjournment which becomes necessary before the trial is finished, that is to say before a verdict has been returned. Subsections (3) and (4) of the same section provide:

h '(3) A magistrates' court may, for the purpose of enabling inquiries to be made or of determining the most suitable method of dealing with the case, exercise its power to adjourn after convicting the accused and before sentencing him or otherwise dealing with him; but, if it does so . . . the adjournment shall not be for more than three weeks at a time.

'(4) On adjourning the trial of an information the court may remand the accused . . .'

i That provision also does not suit the present case for two reasons. In the first instance, the three week time limit was not observed, but more fundamentally than that, the justices did not decide to adjourn after convicting the applicant and before sentencing him or otherwise dealing with him. They endeavoured instead partially to deal with him, and I think that that was outside the powers conferred by the section. It seems to me that however tiresome it must have appeared to these justices, in view of the behaviour of the applicant, that they were in fact in duty bound, if they were going to consider disqualification, to adjourn the whole question of sentencing and disposal under s 14(3) and deal with this matter as one matter when the adjourned hearing took place. a

In the circumstances I think that they were in excess of their jurisdiction when they purported to make the disqualification order, and I would allow certiorari to go to quash the disqualification.

Landlord and tenant – Notice to quit – Validity – Periodic tenancy – Certainty of duration – Weekly tenancy – Written memorandum of agreement – Memorandum expressing tenancy ‘to continue until determined by the lessee’ – Whether lessor having right to determine – Whether tenancy void for uncertainty – Whether fetter on lessor’s right to determine void as being repugnant to nature of periodic tenancy. e

R Ltd, the registered proprietors of certain garage premises, granted the plaintiffs the use of those premises giving them a memorandum, signed on their behalf, in the following terms: ‘... Received from [the plaintiffs] the sum of £12-0-0 being one week’s rent on [the demised premises] and to continue until determined by the lessee. (CASH) £12’. The plaintiffs used the garages for the purpose of letting parking or garage space. Subsequently the defendants, who were the successors in title of R Ltd, purported to determine the plaintiffs’ tenancy. The plaintiffs claimed that under the terms of the tenancy granted only the lessee had the right to determine the lease. The defendants contended that the tenancy agreement, as expressed in the memorandum, was void for uncertainty. f

Held – (i) The tenancy was not void for uncertainty. The memorandum provided for a tenancy from week to week unless determined. The rule that, if a term was to be validly created, the maximum duration of the term must be ascertained before it took effect did not directly apply to periodic tenancies; it was sufficient if it was known when the term could be brought to an end even if it was not known when it would be brought to an end (see p 725 c e f and g and p 728 a, post); Charles Clay & Sons Ltd v British Railways Board [1971] 1 All ER 1007 applied; Lace v Chandler [1944] 1 All ER 305 distinguished. g

(ii) Although a fetter on the right to determine, even for a period of uncertain duration, was not necessarily repugnant to the grant of a periodic tenancy, it was nevertheless basic to a tenancy that at some stage the person granting the tenancy should have the right to determine; a tenancy under which the landlord would never have the right to determine was a contradiction in terms. On the evidence it was clear that the parties had intended to create a weekly tenancy and not a perpetually renewable lease; accordingly the fetter placed on the landlords’ right to h

Action

The plaintiffs, Centaploy Ltd, issued a writ on 26th May 1971 which, in its amended form, sought relief against the defendants, Matlodge Ltd and Swordheath Properties

Ltd. By their statement of claim served on 24th June 1971 the plaintiffs claimed against the defendants: (i) a declaration that a notice to quit dated 20th May 1971, by which the first defendants purported to determine the plaintiffs' tenancies of premises situate at and known as 25 Ashburn Mews and 39/41 Ashburn Mews, London, SW 7, on 3rd June 1971, was bad in law and of no effect; (ii) a declaration that the plaintiffs held the premises on weekly tenancies which were determinable by the plaintiffs but not determinable by the defendants; (iii) alternatively, a declaration that the plaintiffs held the premises on perpetually renewable leases converted by s 145 of, and Sch 15, paras 1 and 2, to, the Law of Property Act 1922 and s 220 of the Law of Property Act 1925 into leases for 2,000 years. The defendants served a final defence and counterclaim on the plaintiffs on 21st November 1972. By their counterclaim the defendants sought: (1) an injunction to restrain the plaintiffs from interfering with the defendants' possession of the premises; (2) further or in the alternative, possession. In their final reply and defence to counterclaim dated 23rd November 1972, the plaintiffs stated that they would, if necessary, claim that their tenancies of the premises were business tenancies within the meaning of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954, Part II, and protected by that Act, and that no notice had been served on the plaintiffs in respect of either of the premises, as required by or in accordance with the Act and denied that, in the circumstances, the defendants were entitled to the relief claimed or to any relief. In their reply to the defence to counterclaim dated 14th December 1972 the defendants asserted that if, which was denied, the tenancies were business tenancies within the meaning of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954, Part II, the tenancies were pursuant to the provisions of the Act terminated by various acts and events (which were set out). The facts are set out in the judgment.

16th February. WHITFORD J read the following judgment. Ashburn Mews lies to the south of Cromwell Road between Ashburn Road on the west, from which the mews can be entered at its north-west end, and Gloucester Road on the east. The mews at its south-east end runs into Courtfield Road, a road which runs roughly parallel with Cromwell Road.

In February 1968 a company, Rawlings Bros Ltd, were the registered proprietors with title absolute of the mews and certain other adjacent properties not directly material to this action. At this date the mews consisted essentially of a number of flats above lock-up garages. The flats and garages were all let by Rawlings, but they were separately let. The letting of the garages was in the hands of a Mr Stratford, but he had nothing to do with the flats.

This action is concerned with the terms on which, on 8th February 1968 and 22nd February 1968 respectively, Rawlings granted the plaintiffs, Centaploy Ltd, the use of garages 39 and 41, and a company, Redshire Ltd, the use of garage 25. The plaintiffs assert that the interest granted to Redshire Ltd in garage 25 was assigned to them on 5th November 1968. The defendants, Matlodge Ltd and Swordheath Properties Ltd, did not in the end challenge the assignment of Redshire's interest. In brief, the plaintiffs claim that on 8th February there was an oral agreement reached between a Mr Strickland acting on their behalf, and Mr Stratford, acting for Rawlings, that the plaintiffs should have a weekly tenancy of garages 39 and 41 for £12 a week, the tenancy to be terminable only by the plaintiffs and not by Rawlings. They claim further that on 22nd February 1968 an agreement was reached between Mr Strickland, then acting for Redshire Ltd, and Mr Stratford, acting for Rawlings, relating to garage 25, on exactly the same terms save only that the rent was to be £1 15s a week.

a The plaintiffs say further in relation to garages 39 and 41 that on 8th February 1968 they were given and accepted a memorandum signed by Mr Stratford on behalf of Rawlins in the following terms:

'GROUND FLOOR GARAGE Received from Centaploy Ltd the sum of £12-0-0 being one week's rent on 39/41 Ashburn Mews S.W.7 and to continue until determined by the lessee. (CASH) £12'.

b They rely on this memorandum as a further tenancy agreement or, alternatively, as evidencing the agreement made orally, to which I have already referred. In the same way they say in relation to garage 25 that a similar memorandum was signed and dated 22nd February 1968 in these terms:

c 'RECEIVED FROM REDSHIRE LTD. THE SUM OF £1=15=0 BEING ONE WEEK'S RENT ON 25 (TWENTY FIVE) ASHBURN MEWS S.W.7. THE TENANCY TO CONTINUE THUS ON THE SAME TERMS UNTIL DETERMINED BY THE LESSEE.'

They rely on this memorandum as a further tenancy agreement or, alternatively, as evidencing the oral agreement which they say was reached on that day.

d The defendants assert that there was never an agreement for anything more than an ordinary weekly tenancy of the properties in question, that is to say a tenancy determinable by either side on one week's notice. The defendants say that Mr Stratford never agreed to the grant of tenancies determinable only by the plaintiffs. They challenge the authenticity of the documents produced by the plaintiffs: one is the document which the plaintiffs allege was signed by Mr Stratford on 8th February 1968; the other document which the defendants rely on is, they allege, a photocopy of a document which was originally signed by Mr Stratford on 22nd February 1968 and which was subsequently lost. The defendants say that these documents are forgeries, although they bear admittedly in the one case the signature of Mr Stratford and in the other case a photocopy of his signature. They assert that these documents were altered while in the custody of the plaintiffs and are in consequence of no effect. They further say that, if the documents were in the form in which it would appear from the exhibits that they were, and if they were not altered, f Mr Stratford's signature to them was obtained by deceit, and on this ground, too, they are either void or voidable. Over and above this, the defendants assert that Mr Stratford had no authority, express or ostensible, to enter into such agreements as the plaintiffs contend for. If they are wrong on these issues of fact, all of which are in dispute, then the defendants claim that there are good grounds in law for saying that the agreements cannot have the effect for which the plaintiffs contend.

g The charges of forgery and deceit are serious, and I shall deal with them first. This case, originally estimated for five days, took twice as long as that, and much of the time was taken up, very understandably, by a most searching cross-examination on both sides. At the opening of his final address, counsel for the defendants urged this on me, that, although much of the hearing was taken up with evidence relating to the issues of deceit and forgery, a determination in favour of the plaintiffs on those issues could be in no sense conclusive; and I think this is right. Nonetheless, as I have said, these are charges of a serious character. It is, I think, right to deal with these matters first, for if the charges are made good then the plaintiffs must fail.

h It is, I think, only fair, having regard to the seriousness of the charges of forgery and deceit and the fact that a consideration of the evidence relating to them must take some time that I should at this stage give my conclusion, which is that there is no substance at all in either of these charges.

i Before I come to the events of 8th and 22nd February, which I must consider carefully, it is necessary to say just a little further about the properties in question. Garage 25 is a lock-up garage capable of accommodating two relatively small cars or one relatively large car. Garages 39 and 41 are in fact two garages, now in one. There is a door between the two garages that faces into the mews, and no doubt at one time there was a partition between them, but at some date that partition was taken down, and there is now one single space, which is apparently able to accommodate some six cars, or possibly seven, or even eight if they are small ones. At one time Rawlings had been using garages 39 and 41 as a workshop in which they offered facilities for car service. This use by Rawlings ended in December 1967 and at that stage certain workshop fittings which had been installed were removed. In February 1968 there was still a hydraulic lift in position but not operable, as the gear that caused it to operate had gone, and there were still, apparently, some power points suitable for workshop use. There is a dispute whether at that time there may have been one or two work benches, but that is of so little importance that I do not propose to attempt to resolve it. Garages 25 and 39/41 are not of themselves worth an action of this magnitude. This action has, I imagine, been brought because in March 1968 Rawlings sold their interest in Ashburn Mews to a company, Kamvale Properties Ltd. I was told that Kamvale and certain of its directors ran into difficulties involving criminal proceedings. I am in no way concerned with that. Kamvale in March 1968 executed a first legal charge, including the mews property in question, in favour of a company, Trade Development Bank. In exercise of its power of sale Trade Development Bank sold the property in question to the first defendants in February 1971. The first defendants in their turn sold the property in question to the second defendants in June 1971. Ashburn Mews forms part of an area which can be described as ripe for development. Most, if not all, of the garages and flats other than garages 39/41 and 25 and the flats over them have already been knocked down. If the plaintiffs are right, if they have been granted tenancies of these garages which only they can determine, the plans for development of this area may be handicapped. [His Lordship then reviewed the evidence as regards the charges of forgery and deceit. He also reviewed the evidence concerning Mr Stratford's authority, and found that Mr Stratford had ostensible authority to conclude the bargains which were concluded on behalf of Rawlings. He continued:] If, as I find, the memoranda of 8th and 22nd February 1968 were signed by Mr Stratford, he having ostensible authority to sign them, what then is the effect in law? For this purpose it was not suggested on either side that any significant difference could be drawn between the two documents.

First, it was said on the defendants' side that this is a case of non est factum. I was referred to *Saunders v Anglia Building Society*¹. I am unable to see on the evidence in this case that it is in any way possible to make the plea good. Mr Stratford admittedly knew that he was signing an agreement for a weekly tenancy. His evidence is that he read the documents at the time. If, as I have found, they were in their present form, he agreed he would have had no difficulty in understanding their terms, in particular the disputed term, and on any basis he ought in fact at the relevant time to have read them and, if he had done, he would have known what the terms to which he was agreeing were.

The next point taken by the defendants is of more substance. They say that if there is a lease it is void because it lacks certainty. The defendants accept that a normal weekly tenancy was granted but submit that the memoranda do not in terms refer to a weekly tenancy at all. While the words 'weekly tenancy' do not appear in either case, in both these documents there are references to 'one week's rent' and the words 'to continue' are also to be found. The defendants say it is impossible to infer that there is a weekly tenancy under the memoranda because the provision for determination is inconsistent with such a periodic tenancy.

I was referred to *Gladstone v Bower*². In that case a question arose whether a particular agreement took effect as an agreement for the letting of a farm on a tenancy from year to year. Diplock J said³:

a 'A tenancy from year to year at common law is an interest which does possess certain invariable characteristics without which it is not a tenancy from year to year and which constitute a standard by which the magnitude of other interests may be judged: it must last for one year and, unless determined at the end of the first year by notice (either six months' notice or whatever other length of notice, if any, is expressly provided for in the contract of tenancy), will be renewed by operation of law for successive periods of one year each, until determined at the end [of one] such yearly period by such a notice.'

It seems to me that on their true construction the documents in question provide for a tenancy from week to week unless determined, but the judgment of Diplock J to which I have referred makes it clear that there may be some variation in the terms on which a periodic tenancy may be determined without it ceasing to be a periodic tenancy. It cannot, in my view, be said that the term is uncertain on the basis of the finding of Lord Greene MR in *Lace v Chandler*¹, the next case to which the defendants referred. In that case the premises were let 'for the duration of the war', so that when the agreement took effect there was a lease for a single term the duration of which was wholly uncertain. No doubt in one sense it can be said that there is an artificiality in referring to certainty of term even, for example, in the case of what counsel for the defendants was prepared to describe as an ordinary weekly tenancy, a weekly tenancy at, for example, £12 a week with nothing said about determination. At the moment when the first £12 is paid over, unless one of the parties there and then gives notice to determine, the tenancy is going to run for two weeks, for if nothing is said the rule is that determination shall be on one week's notice on either side. Thereafter, if nothing is said on either side, the tenancy may run on for a wholly indefinite period, but it stands accepted that this fact does not lead to the result that the tenancy is void for uncertainty. The Court of Appeal has held in *Charles Clay & Sons Ltd v British Railways Board*² that the simple statement of the law that if a term is to be validly created the maximum duration of that term must be ascertained before the term takes effect cannot have direct application to periodic tenancies. It is apparently enough if you know when it could be brought to an end even if you do not know exactly when it will be brought to an end. The law is evolutionary. In the evolution of life it is common enough to find that forms which were at one time successful have died out completely or changed radically. The defendants accept that a fetter can be placed on the right to determine a periodic tenancy for a certain period. They also accept in this court, although they expressly reserve the point for a higher court, that on the authority of *Charles Clay & Sons Ltd v British Railways Board*² it must be accepted here that such a fetter can be placed on the right to determine for an uncertain period.

b The defendants base themselves further on a decision given by the Court of King's Bench in *Doe d Warner v Browne*³ where it was decided that it was repugnant to the nature of a tenancy from year to year that the right to determine should rest solely with the tenant, a decision approved by the Court of Appeal in *Cheshire Lines Committee v Lewis & Co*⁴.

c Uncertainty and repugnancy were the defendants' main grounds for attack assuming that the agreements were in other respects unimpeachable. The submission of the plaintiffs on repugnancy was basically that this must be considered to be a ghost of the past and I was urged to pass on unafraid. In fact both the plaintiffs and the defendants relied on the judgment in the Court of Appeal in *Charles Clay & Sons Ltd v British Railways Board*², a case in which there was a half-yearly tenancy determinable on either side on three months' notice with a provision that the landlords should not be entitled to determine until they required the premises leased for the purposes of their undertaking. The defendants, the British Railways Board, the successors in title to the Midland Railway Co, the original landlords, claimed that the agreement was void for uncertainty, and in the alternative that the fetter on the right to determine was repugnant to the nature of the tenancy and should be set on one side so that they would be left with a tenancy determinable on three months' notice on either side. The Court of Appeal¹ upheld the judgment of Foster J² based on a rejection of the defendants' submission.

I must refer to a major portion of the judgment in that case. The relevant passage in the judgment of the court, read by Russell LJ, is as follows³:

'It has been quite clearly and for long established that if a term of years is to be validly created the maximum duration must be ascertained before the term takes effect. A purported lease "for the duration of the war" is no lease (see *Lace v Chandler*⁴) because there is no present knowledge how many years will elapse while that undesirable situation continues. It is too late to enquire why this aspect of the particular estate was considered essential to its existence or to question the doctrine. A lease for life was outside the requirement, probably because this was recognised as an estate of freehold. Moreover, if it was desired to achieve a result in substance the same as a lease until an event the date of whose occurrence could not be forecast, this could be done by the grant of a lease for (say) 90 years determinable on the event. We mention this only to show that the subject-matter under consideration has an air of artificiality, of remoteness from practical considerations; and in such circumstances we think the court should be unwilling to be moved by some process of logic to travel further than authority compels in the direction of holding that what parties to a transaction in plain English agreed is something impossible in law and therefore void. In *Lace v Chandler*⁴ the landlord sought possession of a dwelling house. The county court judge ordered possession on grounds not presently material. The defendant tenant in terms pleaded that "The said dwellinghouse was let to the defendant for the duration of the war" The defendant appealed. This court obviously took the point—the respondent was not called on and the point had not been argued below—that the letting pleaded did not create a leasehold interest at all, since the maximum duration of the estate was quite uncertain when it purported to take effect. Now it appears to us that that decision is confined to a case in which that which was purported to be done was simply to create a leasehold interest for a single and uncertain period. The applicability of this matter of certainty to a periodic tenancy was not under consideration. If the case of *Lace v Chandler*⁴ had been one in which there was simply a periodic tenancy with a proviso that the landlord would not give notice during the continuance of the war, this court might not have concluded that such an agreement, which would of course have left the tenant free to determine on notice at any time, was inoperative to create a leasehold. There is nothing in the reasoning of the judgments to lead to the necessary conclusion that such must have been so. If one has an ordinary case of a periodic tenancy (e.g. a yearly tenancy), it is plain that in one sense at least it is uncertain at the outset what will be the maximum duration of the term created, which term grows year by year as a single term springing from the original grant. It cannot be predicated that in no circumstances will it exceed, for example, 50 years; there is no previously ascertained maximum a duration for the term; its duration will depend on the time that will elapse before either party gives notice of determination. The simple statement of the law that the maximum duration of a term must be certainly known in advance of its taking effect cannot therefore have direct reference to periodic tenancies.

The question therefore is whether authority or principle should lead us to mould or enlarge that simple statement of the law so as to adapt and apply it to such a b tenancy. It is argued that the principle of avoidance through uncertainty is only not applicable to an ordinary periodic tenancy because of the ability of either party at any time to define the maximum by giving notice of determination.
This, it is suggested, provides the necessary degree of certainty; because of this c power neither party is left in a state of unknowing what is his maximum commitment to the other. But where (it is said) one or other party is, by the terms of the document, deprived of that power until a future event or the fulfilment of a condition the date of whose occurrence (if at all) is uncertain, that person is in such a state of unknowing. Therefore it is said the term should be held void; and reference is made to the statement in Hill and Redman, Law of Landlord and Tenant¹ which suggests that an ordinary periodic tenancy does not conflict
d with the ancient doctrine, because although the maximum duration of the term be originally indefinite, it can be made subject to a definite limit by either party giving notice to determine. In the course of the argument we found this approach logically attractive. Here is one term growing period by period and there is no knowing (on one side) its maximum length, if (on that side) there is no power to determine save in an event whose occurrence is in point of time uncertain.
Why logically should that differ from a lease directly for a term of which the e maximum duration is uncertain? But in the end we are persuaded that, there being no authority to prevent us, it is preferable as a matter of justice to hold parties to their clearly expressed bargain rather than to introduce for the first time in 1971 an extension of a doctrine of land law so as to deny the efficacy of that bargain. We were referred to a number of decided cases, but in none of f them was it held that a curb on the power to determine a periodic tenancy infringed the principle that an estate of leasehold to be effective must be certain in its maximum duration; rather they were cases in which the question in debate was whether the curb was repugnant to the nature of a periodic tenancy.
Accordingly we hold that in the present case the proviso in cl 2 is not such as to negative the tenancy on the ground of uncertainty of duration. Moreover, we do this on the broad ground, and not on the narrow ground that the particular g proviso leaves it open to the landlord by adjustment of the requirements of its undertaking to assume the power to determine the leasehold interest.²

In the present case the position on uncertainty is somewhat different. Here we have periods growing week by week and there is never going to be any possibility of knowing, on the landlords' side, their maximum length, for there is never going to be a right in the landlords to determine. In Charles Clay & Sons Ltd v British Railways
h *Board*² counsel for the defendants submitted that a periodic tenancy is only an exception to the uncertainty rule, because if both sides are going to be able to determine there is no relevant uncertainty. In the present case a stronger case can be made out on the defendants' side than was made out in Charles Clay & Sons Ltd v British Railways *Board*². It can be urged that as the landlords cannot ever be certain when the agreement is going to be brought to an end there must be a relevant uncertainty. As I j understand the judgment in the Court of Appeal² what has been held in relation to the issue of uncertainty is that it is better to enforce a clearly expressed bargain than

2 [1971] 1 All ER 1007, [1971] Ch 725

to attempt to introduce yet further refinements into a field where the lines have perhaps already been rather over-finely drawn. On this basis I have reached the conclusion, having regard to what was said in the Court of Appeal in *Charles Clay & Sons Ltd v British Railways Board*¹, that I must reject the defendants' argument on the basis of uncertainty which, but for *Charles Clay & Sons Ltd v British Railways Board*¹, I would have been prepared to accept.

In the judgment read by Russell LJ, repugnancy is next considered²:

'There remains the question whether the proviso must in law be rejected as repugnant to the nature of the estate created—a half yearly periodic tenancy. Our instinct, as previously indicated, is to give effect if possible to the bargain made by the parties. It may well be that if in a periodic tenancy an attempt was made to prevent the lessor ever determining the tenancy, that would be so inconsistent with the stated bargain that either a greater estate must be found to have been constituted or the attempt must be rejected as repugnant. But short of that we see no reason why an express curb on the power to determine which the common law would confer on the lessor should be rejected as repugnant to the nature of the leasehold interest granted. In *Breams Property Investment Co Ltd v Stroulger*³ a curb on the lessor for three years, unless they required the premises for their own use, was upheld in this court, notwithstanding the earlier cases of *Doe d Warner v Browne*⁴ and *Cheshire Lines Committee v Lewis & Co*⁵. It follows that in a periodic tenancy a similar curb for ten, 20, or 50 years should not be rejected as repugnant to the concept of a periodic tenancy; and once the argument based on uncertainty is rejected we see no distinction in the present case. Accordingly in our judgment this appeal should be dismissed. We say nothing as to the situation which might arise in law should the board sell the reversion to another, when it might be arguable that the proviso would be no longer relevant.'

In *Charles Clay & Sons Ltd v British Railways Board*¹ the point which I have to consider—the ghost of the past—was expressly left unlaidd. Here we have a case where the tenant is saying that on the bargain struck the landlord cannot ever determine the tenancy.

Now counsel for the plaintiffs was able to say, and to say quite rightly, that great inroads have been made on the application of this idea of repugnancy since 1807, as the passage I have just read shows, and there is no need for me to go into the cases between *Doe d Warner v Browne*⁴ and *Charles Clay & Sons Ltd v British Railways Board*¹ for it is now plain that a fetter for a period, even a period of uncertain duration, cannot necessarily be considered as repugnant to the grant of a periodic tenancy. It nevertheless appears to me that it must be basic to a tenancy that at some stage the person granting the tenancy shall have the right to determine and a tenancy in which the landlord is never going to have the right to determine at all is, as I see it, a complete contradiction in terms. Unless, therefore, some greater estate than a weekly tenancy was created by the agreements, the determination provisions must, in my view, be regarded as repugnant and on this aspect the defendants are entitled to succeed.

The plaintiffs, however, claim in the alternative that they hold the premises on a perpetually renewable lease convertible to a lease for 2,000 years. Counsel for the plaintiffs, in advancing this contention (as he put it) very much as an alternative and accepting (as I understand him) the defendants' submission that the court leans against perpetual renewals, submitted (in my view quite rightly) that the court must be a concerned with the intention of the parties. He reminded me of the evidence of Mr Strickland, and he referred me to the judgment of Evershed J in *Northchurch Estates Ltd v Daniels*¹. It is, I think, important to recall the language which was under consideration in that case. That was a case in which there was an agreement in which, as regards the term, it said²:

b 'The term shall be for a period of one year certain from Mar. 25, 1938, the tenant having the option to renew the tenancy from year to year on identical terms and conditions as hereinafter stated notice of such intention to renew the tenancy to be given in writing on or before Dec. 25, in each year.'

c Evershed J reached the conclusion that there was a clear intention expressed by the parties to create a perpetually renewable lease and that any inclination which he might otherwise have felt to lean against any intention to create such a lease must give way to the language which the parties in that case themselves had chosen to use.

d So far as this particular case is concerned, on the whole of the evidence I have reached the clear conclusion that not only is there no clear intention to be found to create a perpetually renewable lease but rather such indications as one can gather from the evidence as to what the intention of the parties was point in a wholly opposite direction. In the result it is unnecessary for me to consider certain other interesting questions which might otherwise have had to be determined.

e At this point it is perhaps convenient to mention that at a late stage I was referred by counsel for the plaintiffs to a recent decision, *Binions v Evans*³, where the Court of Appeal held that an agreement to provide the widow of a former employee with a cottage which she could occupy as tenant at will free of rent until the end of her life or until determined as provided operated, on the sale of the cottage, to create a constructive trust to permit the widow to remain there for the rest of her life. I understood it to be suggested (if somewhat faintly) that the agreement with which I am concerned must be considered as establishing some sort of equitable interest which the plaintiffs are to enjoy in perpetuity. The facts in this case are in no way comparable with the facts in *Binions v Evans*³ and I cannot see that the decision in that case can assist the plaintiffs at all.

f Finally, the plaintiffs, in their reply and defence to counterclaim, claimed that their tenancies of both the premises involved are business tenancies within the meaning of Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 and that no notice to terminate has been served in accordance with the provisions of that Act. [His Lordship then reviewed the evidence on this point, found that the plaintiffs were conducting at the garage premises the business of letting parking or garage space, and concluded:]
g To the extent that the plaintiffs claim that the tenancy is a business tenancy their action succeeds.

h Declarations granted (i) that the notice to quit dated 20th May 1971 was bad in law and of no effect and (ii) that 25 and 39/41 Ashburn Mews were business premises within the meaning of Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 and protected by that Act.

GOULDING J

29th, 30th NOVEMBER, 1ST DECEMBER 1972

Town and country planning – Development – Permitted development – Development by mineral undertakers – Erection, alteration or extension of building, plant or machinery – Development on land ‘in’ quarry or mine – Development on land ‘adjacent to and belonging to’ quarry or mine – Mine – Site on which mining operations are carried out – Mining operations – Winning and working of minerals – Land adjacent to and belonging to mine – Adjacent – Belonging to – Plaintiffs engaged in production of china clay – Crude slurry extracted from clay pits and partly treated on site – Partly treated slurry conveyed by pipeline to second site two miles distant – Process of refining and drying clay completed on second site – Plaintiffs proposing to erect new buildings on second site – Whether second site part of larger site on which ‘mining operations are carried out’ – Whether second site ‘land in . . . a quarry or mine’ – Whether second site ‘land . . . adjacent to and belonging to a quarry or mine’ – Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1963 (SI 1963 No 709), arts 2, 3, Sch 1, class XVIII.

The plaintiff was a large company engaged in the manufacture of china clay in an area for which the defendant was the planning authority. The plaintiff extracted ‘slurry’, a mixture of solid matter and water, from clay pits on a site known as Lee Moor. The slurry was pumped from the pits into tanks where the first separating process took place whereby coarse sand and other impurities were removed. The slurry then went through more separating and dewatering processes on the site eventually entering refining tanks, from which, when refined to the required standard, it went into holding tanks. From those tanks the slurry was pumped into a pipeline through which it passed to another site, known as Marsh Mills, owned by the plaintiff. Lee Moor, which was about 1,500 acres in extent, and Marsh Mills, which was about 80 acres, were separated by approximately two miles at the nearest approach of their boundaries. The centre of Lee Moor was about four miles from the centre of Marsh Mills. Whereas Lee Moor was on high open ground on the edge of Dartmoor, Marsh Mills was in a wooded valley; the agricultural use of much of the valley had been replaced by housing and Marsh Mills itself lay close to the road and railway that approached Plymouth. From the pipeline the refined slurry entered ‘driers’ at Marsh Mills where further dewatering and drying processes were carried out to produce a clay product containing 10 per cent or less of water. No manufacturing process was carried on at the driers which were situated where the final treatment of the slurries could be most economically carried out. The plaintiff wished to replace a building at Marsh Mills containing obsolete driers by a new building to be used as a store and to erect a further building to contain modern driers. It sought a declaration that the proposed development would be development by a mineral undertaker permitted by art 3^a of, and Sch 1, class XVIII^b to, the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1963, contending (i) that the proposed works would be carried out by a ‘mineral undertaker’, i.e. itself, and (ii) that the Marsh Mills site was ‘land in or adjacent to and belonging to a quarry or mine comprised in [the plaintiff’s] undertaking’ within para 2 of class XVIII.

Held – (i) The plaintiff was a ‘mineral undertaker’ within art 2^c of, and Sch 1, class XVIII to, the 1963 order since it was engaged in winning and working china clay. Furthermore the plaintiff was a mineral undertaker in relation to the activities

a carried on at Marsh Mills, even if those activities could not be described as 'mining operations' within art 2 for there was no interruption in the production process between the clay workings on Lee Moor and the driers at Marsh Mills (see p 735 j to p 736 a, post).

(ii) The Marsh Mills land was not part of a 'site on which mining operations are carried on' within art 2 and was not therefore 'land . . . in a quarry or mine' within class XVIII. The word 'site' in art 2 was used in its ordinary meaning and therefore the Marsh Mills site was the relevant unit and was not to be regarded as part of a larger site including also the Lee Moor area. Furthermore the operations at Marsh Mills were not part of the process of 'winning and working' china clay, within class XVIII, for that expression referred to the process of extracting or separation of raw mineral from the solid earth. The activities at Marsh Mills fell outside the description 'winning and working' and were more properly described as the 'treatment' of minerals (see p 736 d and e and p 737 e and g, post).

(iii) Although the functional connection between them showed that the Marsh Mills site could properly be regarded as land belonging to the Lee Moor site and therefore 'land . . . belonging to a . . . mine', within class XVIII, it was not 'land . . . adjacent to' the Lee Moor site. Although 'adjacent' did not necessarily mean 'adjoining' the question whether Marsh Mills was 'adjacent' to Lee Moor within class XVIII was to be determined having regard to all the circumstances and bearing in mind that the word occurred in planning legislation. Having regard to the different types of land use in the vicinity of the two sites, it could not be said that the Marsh Mills site was, in a planning sense, 'adjacent to' the Lee Moor site (see p 737 h and p 738 a d g and h, post); dictum of Sir Arthur Wilson in Wellington Corpn v Lower Hutt Corpn [1904] AC at 775, 776 applied.

(iv) It followed therefore that the proposed development on the Marsh Mills site was not development permitted under class XVIII of Sch 1 to the 1963 order.

Originating summons

By a summons dated 25th May 1972 the plaintiff, English Clays Lovering Pochin & Co Ltd, claimed against the defendant, Plymouth Corporation, a declaration that the erection of a clay drier building and store building together with necessary conveyors and two chimneys at Marsh Mills, Plymouth, as proposed by the plaintiff in a planning application dated 11th February 1972 would be development by a mineral undertaker permitted by Town and Country Planning General Development Orders 1963 to 1969¹ art 3 and Sch 1, class XVIII, subject to the conditions and limitations imposed in Sch 1 in relation to that class. The facts are set out in the judgment. b

Jeremiah Harman QC and Elizabeth Appleby for the defendant.

GOULDING J. In these proceedings the plaintiff is English Clays Lovering Pochin & Co Ltd. That is a large company engaged in the production of china clay. The defendant is the Corporation of the City of Plymouth, and it is sued as the planning authority for that area. d

The question stated by the originating summons for the court's decision is whether the erection of a clay drier building and store building together with necessary conveyors and two chimneys at Marsh Mills, Plymouth, as proposed by the plaintiff in a planning application dated 11th February 1972 would be development by a mineral undertaker permitted by art 3 of, and class XVIII of Sch 1 to the Town and Country Planning General Development Orders 1963 to 1969¹ subject to the conditions and limitations imposed in the schedule in relation to that class. e

In order to understand how the question has arisen between the parties, it is necessary for me to describe the operations which the plaintiff carries on in the neighbourhood of Plymouth. They are sufficiently set out in an affidavit by Mr R F Silverlock, who is the chief estates surveyor to the plaintiff, made in support of the summons. As a result, I think, of criticism in the defendant's evidence, Mr Silverlock subsequently supplemented his account of the relevant processes, in a further affidavit. In my judgment, however, his first affidavit contains all that is really required for present purposes. He said: f

"The Plaintiff is engaged in the winning and working of china clay from a complex of pits situated at Lee Moor, Devon. The clay beds are bared by the removal of surface soil and subsoil and other unwanted overlying material. The clay face is then washed by high pressure water jets and the resultant mixture of water and solid matter, referred to as slurry is composed of china clay, micaceous residue and other impurities. The slurry flows along the bottom of the pits to the first separating and pumping stage, that is to lagoons or tanks with centrifugal sand pumps which elevate the slurry for the separation of coarse sand and other impurities by means of mechanical separators or sand troughs, and those separated impurities are transported to debris tips above ground by skips, belt conveyors or mobile plant. The slurry of clays and finer impurities flows to collecting cisterns whence it is pumped to the surface dewatering tanks, at which point the slurry contains about 5% of solid matter. After some dewatering the slurry is treated either in settling ponds or in centrifugal separators to dispose of the finer sand and micaceous residue which are run off to a dam. The purified and screened slurry then enters refining tanks and thereafter, when g a refined to the required specification, it goes into holding tanks. From the holding tanks the refined slurry is pumped into a pipeline and so passes to the "dries" at Marsh Mills where further processes are carried out to produce the saleable product. The pipeline follows the line of the disused Lee Moor tramway, a strip of land about 25 feet wide fenced off and owned or leased by the Plaintiff and ends within the Marsh Mills works some four miles from the main sand and mica separating plant. At Marsh Mills further dewatering takes place at the holding tanks or buffer storage and a denser suspension of clay containing 15-25% solid matter is then pumped through filter presses consisting of a number of chambers separated by cotton or nylon elements through which the water passes leaving on them cakes of clay. These are then periodically removed from the chambers and dropped on to moving metal belts which feed the cake up to cutters which shred it into pieces of convenient size either for further treatment before drying or else direct on moving belts to the vertical Buell drying kilns or into inclined rotating cylinders where hot air and gases evaporate more water to provide a clay product containing 10% or less of moisture. This is conveyed on moving belts to storage bins whence it is loaded into road or rail vehicles for dispatch to consumer. No manufacturing process is carried on at the dries. The dries are situated where the further and final treatment of the slurries can be most conveniently, economically and efficiently carried out.'

The planning permission which now governs the plaintiff's operations was given by the then Minister of Housing and Local Government in a letter dated 20th November 1958 which contains his decision after a local inquiry. The letter is headed 'Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. Winning and working of china clay and allied minerals. Lee Moor, Wotter and Marsh Mills, Plympton. Appeal by English Clays Lovering Pochin and Company Limited'. It is addressed to the plaintiff's solicitors. The decisive part of the document is para 17. It begins:

f 'In the exercise of his powers under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, the Minister accordingly [and then follow two sub-paragraphs]—(a) refuses permission for the winning and working of minerals in the areas shown cross-hatched on [certain enclosed plans, which are enumerated], and (b) grants permission for the winning and working of china clay and minerals overlying china clay in the areas shown unhatched and unstippled and edged by a bold line on the said plan A, subject to the following conditions . . .'

g The conditions are five in number and I need not refer to them in this judgment except to notice that condition 5 contains the expression 'the permission area', in the singular. The tracts of land described in the permissive part of the Minister's decision as 'the areas shown unhatched and unstippled and edged by a bold line on the said plan A' are, so far as I can see from the copies of plans furnished to me, four in number, consisting of one large area and three small areas. The large area is on an elevated tract of land, referred to as Lee Moor; it contains, I think, about 1,500 acres. Of the smaller ones, two are irrelevant and have not been mentioned in the argument before me; the third is at Marsh Mills and is the area under discussion in these proceedings; it contains approximately 80 acres.

j I have been told, and the exhibited maps appear to confirm, that the large Lee Moor area and the small Marsh Mills area are separated by approximately two miles at the nearest approach of their respective boundaries. From the centre of the one area to the centre of the other is about four miles. The Lee Moor area and the Marsh Mills area are used by the plaintiff for the purposes of a single undertaking for production in a saleable form of china clay, as described in the evidence which I have read, the two areas being connected by a pipeline, as the deponent, Mr Silverlock, indicated.

The plaintiff now wants to reconstruct and modernise the plant and machinery at Marsh Mills so that a larger quantity of china clay can be produced and sold. I need not go into any great detail on the scheme which is contemplated. Briefly, it is as follows. In place of a building at Marsh Mills containing, at the present time, two oil-heated driers of an obsolete type, the plaintiff proposes to erect a new building, which will be used as a large store for vats of dried china clay. That building will adjoin the railway track. In place of the two driers which will thus be displaced, the plaintiff proposes the erection of a further building on part of the site where there is no building at the present time and the installation in such new building of two new driers of a modern oil-fired type. Near to the new building, twin chimneys are proposed for the purpose of carrying away the gaseous emission of the new driers. There is also to be a conveyor connecting the new driers with the store building.

The application of the plaintiff for planning permission to carry out the scheme which I have briefly described has led to a difference between the plaintiff and the planning authority, which is defined by the question in the originating summons, namely, whether the proposed development will have the benefit of certain provisions in the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1963 to which I will refer simply as "the Development Order".

I should refer to art 2 of that order. Paragraph (1) of art 2 contains a number of definitions which are to apply in the order unless the context otherwise requires. Among them are the following:

"mine" includes any site on which mining operations are carried on; "mineral undertakers" means undertakers engaged in mining operations and includes undertakers licensed under the Petroleum (Production) Act 1934 to search and bore for and get petroleum; and for the purposes of this order any land in respect of which a licence is in force under the said Act authorising any undertakers to search and bore for and get petroleum shall be deemed to be comprised in their undertaking; "mining operations" means the winning and working of minerals in, on or under land, whether by surface or underground working.

Paragraph (2) of art 2 provides that the Interpretation Act 1889 shall apply to the interpretation of the Development Order as it applies to that of an Act of Parliament.

Article 3 (1) provides the important enacting part of the Development Order:

'Subject to the subsequent provisions of this order, development of any class specified in schedule 1 to this order is permitted by this order and may be undertaken upon land to which this order applies, without the permission of the local planning authority or the Minister: Provided that the permission granted by this Order in respect of any such class of development shall be subject to any condition or limitation imposed in the said schedule 1 in relation to that class.'

That sends me at once to Sch 1. Part I of the schedule is headed:

'The following development is permitted under article 3 of this order subject to the conditions set out opposite the description of that development in column (2). The references in that column to standard conditions are to the conditions numbered and set out in Part II of this schedule.'

Class XVIII enumerated in the first column of Part I of the schedule is entitled 'Development by mineral undertakers'. It contains three paragraphs or items, of which the second is that now in controversy. It is as follows:

'The erection, alteration or extension by mineral undertakers on land in or adjacent to and belonging to a quarry or mine comprised in their undertaking of any building, plant or machinery, or structure or erection in the nature of plant or machinery, which is required in connection with the winning or working of minerals, including coal won or worked by virtue of section 36 (1) a of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act 1946, but not any other coal, in pursuance of permission granted or deemed to be granted under Part III of the Act, or which is required in connection with the treatment or disposal of such minerals: Provided that permission shall be required for the erection, alteration or extension of a building, but the local planning authority shall not refuse permission and shall not impose conditions upon the grant thereof, unless they are satisfied that it is expedient so to do on the ground that: (a) the erection, alteration or extension of such building would injure the amenity of the neighbourhood and modifications can reasonably be made or conditions can reasonably be imposed in order to avoid or reduce the injury; or (b) the proposed building or extension ought to be, and can reasonably be, sited elsewhere.'

c The development permitted by that paragraph is stated in the second column to be subject to standard conditions 1 and 2 which are conditions relating to access to and use of highways.

It will be seen that if the plaintiff's proposals, on a proper interpretation of the order, fall within item 2 of class XVIII, the powers of the planning authority to refuse permission or impose conditions on permission are very strictly limited, whereas if the proposals are not within that item, then, so far as appears from the evidence and argument, the planning authority will have the same large discretion as in the case of the great majority of ordinary applications.

d It is common ground that the Development Order is to be construed in what has sometimes been called in argument 'a broad or common sense manner', at any rate in the manner appropriate, as counsel say, to a document framed for administrative purposes rather than as an instrument couched in conveyancing language. That has not prevented counsel on either side from spinning elaborate arguments worthy of a more complicated subject-matter and drawn from other provisions of the Development Order itself, from other statutes or statutory instruments and from reported cases on different documents. While I greatly admire and acknowledge the thoroughness of counsel's endeavours, I do not find in the end that I can get any guidance from those illustrative arguments. It appears to me that, having considered all, I have to apply myself to the ordinary meaning of the language used by the Minister in making the Development Order, in the passages from it which I have just read.

e It is not disputed that the relevant works now proposed are required for one or more of the purposes mentioned in item 2 of class XVIII. The argument is therefore centred on the first few lines opening that item. The plaintiff says that the erection of the proposed new works on the Marsh Mills site will be carried out by a mineral undertaker, namely itself. It further says that the Marsh Mills site is land in a quarry or mine comprised in the plaintiff's undertaking, or alternatively is land adjacent to and belonging to such a quarry or mine. Thus, submits the plaintiff, the provisions of item 2 are applicable.

f In answer, the defendant makes four points. First, the defendant says that the erection of the proposed works at Marsh Mills will not be carried out by a mineral undertaker. Secondly, that the Marsh Mills site is not land in a quarry or mine within the meaning of the Development Order. Thirdly, that the Marsh Mills site is not land adjacent to such a quarry or mine. And, fourthly, that the Marsh Mills site is not land belonging to such a quarry or mine. I can conveniently decide the matter by dealing with those four points in order.

g On the first, I accept the plaintiff's submission. It is not contested that china clay is a mineral or that the plaintiff wins and works china clay. Thus, the plaintiff is a mineral undertaker by virtue of the definition in art 2 of the Development Order. Counsel for the defendant says, 'Well, that is all very well, but at Marsh Mills the plaintiff is doing something quite different and is not to be called a mineral undertaker in that connection. At Marsh Mills, the plaintiff is not a mineral undertaker, but an industrialist'. That seems to me to be altogether too refined an interpretation.

There is no interruption, either physical or commercial, in the production process between the clay workings on Lee Moor, and the driers at Marsh Mills. Thus, whether or not the work at Marsh Mills is itself a mining operation within the meaning of the Development Order, it appears to me that the plaintiff is correctly described as a mineral undertaker in the context of the present question.

Now I come to the second point, whether the Marsh Mills site is land in a quarry or mine. For that purpose, the plaintiff fastens on the definitions in art 2 of the Development Order whereby 'mine' includes any site on which mining operations are carried on, and 'mining operations' means the winning and working of minerals in, on or under land whether by surface or underground working. In reply, and only in reply, counsel for the plaintiff—seizing, I think, on observations of counsel for the defendant originally provoked by myself—contended that the Lee Moor area and the Marsh Mills area should be considered as a single site for planning purposes because included in one planning permission as one permission area by the Minister in the letter of decision which I have read. Thus, if the whole permission area is one site there can be no dispute, it is submitted, that mining operations are carried on at Lee Moor. Accordingly, anything done at Marsh Mills is done on part of a site, and therefore on a site, on which mining operations are carried on, therefore on a mine. In my judgment, that argument is not acceptable. There is nothing to give any special or technical meaning to the word 'site' in the definition of 'mine', and, if I followed this late submission of counsel for the plaintiff, very curious and even absurd results might be brought about in cases where different areas differently combined are subject to concurrent planning permission. In my view, the word 'site' must be treated in its ordinary everyday sense, and counsel for the plaintiff is quite right in his earlier approach that the Marsh Mills site is itself a relevant unit for present purposes. The submission which he pressed in opening and supported again in reply on that footing was that the drying and other operations at Marsh Mills are part of the process of winning and working china clay. Consequently, those drying and other operations at Marsh Mills are themselves 'mining operations'. Therefore, the Marsh Mills site is itself a 'mine' within the definition in the Development Order. It is common ground that winning and working is to be treated as a single compound expression and not to be analysed by distinguishing winning from working. The plaintiff says it is a very wide expression and includes everything done by a mineral undertaker until the desired material is produced in a saleable form. In support of that submission, counsel for the plaintiff referred me to two dictionaries, namely, the Shorter Oxford Dictionary and Johnson's Dictionary, to three statutes and to five judicial decisions. The statutes were the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act 1946, the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act 1923, and the Petroleum (Production) Act 1934. Of the judicial decisions, two were in the English courts, namely *Bishop Auckland Industrial Co-operative Society Ltd v Butterknowle Colliery Co Ltd*¹ and *Tylecote v Morton*². The other three were all of them decisions of the High Court of Australia, namely *The Federal Comr of Taxation v Broken Hill South Ltd*³, *The King v Drake-Brockman, ex parte National Oil Pty Ltd*⁴, and *Parker v Federal Comr of Taxation*⁵.

Counsel for the plaintiff also emphasised—and this is nearer home—that the Minister, in giving permission in 1958, included both the Lee Moor site and the Marsh Mills site in a single comprehensive permission for the winning and working of china clay. I recall for a moment the relevant passages. First of all, in the heading at the beginning of the Minister's letter we find the two lines 'Winning and working of china clay and allied minerals. Lee Moor, Wotter and Marsh Mills, Plympton'. And in a the effective part of the letter, the Minister grants permission for the winning and working of china clay and minerals overlying china clay in areas which include both sites, and they are referred to in one of the conditions as 'the permission area', in the singular. Counsel for the plaintiff laid great stress on that document as one embodying an important decision couched in considered language and the work of a functionary charged with the administration of the town planning legislation, and indeed at the time empowered to make orders under the town planning Act in force.

b Therefore, I was pressed by counsel for the plaintiff with the persuasive authority of what he said was really an implied assertion by the Minister that what is done at the Marsh Mill site is comprehended within the term 'winning and working of minerals'.

c Counsel for the defendant submitted that that argument put too much weight on a concise use of language to cover a decision that in the whole document is quite clearly expressed. Counsel for the defendant said that one must not read the decisive paragraph in the Minister's letter except in conjunction with the preceding paragraphs, which describe in some detail the arguments presented at the local inquiry before the Minister's inspector and the Minister's view on those arguments. The arguments all related to the quarrying work done on the Lee Moor site and its effect on the landscape and surroundings, and therefore it was natural for the Minister to use a comprehensive phrase really based on the character of the work on the larger area.

d After considering all that authority and argument, I remain persuaded that I have to apply the ordinary interpretation of language and I remain of opinion that the essential idea in the term 'winning or working of minerals' as it appears in item 2 of class XVIII is that of the extracting or separation of raw mineral from the solid earth in which it occurs. What is done afterwards may be called cleaning or dressing

e or treatment or refining or some other appropriate term according to circumstances, but it is not, in my judgment, within the ordinary meaning of the words 'winning or working of minerals'. My interpretation of the words is strengthened by the distinction which is made in the Development Order itself between winning or working on the one hand and treatment or disposal of the same minerals on the other. On the facts of the present case, I think that 'winning and working' is probably complete

f when the crude slurry passes from the pit to the sand pumps, although it is not necessary to reach so definite a conclusion for the purposes of the originating summons. I feel myself no doubt that what is done at Marsh Mills is outside 'winning or working' and is more properly described as treatment of minerals. Accordingly the definitions in the Development Order do not, in my judgment, modify the usual meaning of 'mine' so far that I can say that the Marsh Mills site is land in a mine.

g It is certainly not land in a quarry, the term 'quarry' not receiving any special definition in the order.

h I must therefore pass to the third and alternative point: is the Marsh Mills site land adjacent to a quarry or mine? It is common ground that the word 'adjacent' does not require actual contiguity. In the Privy Council case, *Wellington Corpn v Lower Hutt Corpn*¹, it is said, in the judgment delivered by Sir Arthur Wilson:

" 'Adjacent' is not a word to which a precise and uniform meaning is attached by ordinary usage. It is not confined to places adjoining, and it includes places close to or near. What degree of proximity would justify the application of the word is entirely a question of circumstances."

i Other cases that were cited to me on the use of the word 'adjacent' were *Lightbound v Higher Bebington Local Board*², a decision of the Court of Appeal, and *Re Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England's Conveyance*³, a judgment of Luxmoore J. Seeing, therefore, that I have to determine what is land adjacent to a mine or quarry, with regard to the circumstances, I bear in mind as the determining factor that the phrase occurs in legislation dealing with town and country planning. I must ask, are the two areas under consideration properly to be considered adjacent, with planning considerations in mind? Town and country planning is concerned, of course, with the control of the neighbourhood in the public interest. It is concerned with amenities in the broadest sense, with the visual appearance of a neighbourhood, with the flow of traffic, with the density of population in relation to the essential services that are available and a proper balance between different types of land use, and other matters of the same kind. I do not intend to give an exhaustive list. a

(i) the two sites are physically connected by industrial equipment, namely, the pipeline, and are used in one continuous process; (ii) in the planning permission given by the Minister in 1958, which counsel for the plaintiff says is a most important document for planning purposes, the two sites are described together, with, I think, the two other small sites, as 'the permission area'; (iii) the distance between the two sites is not of itself great from a planning point of view, bearing in mind, as one must, the scale and areas that are relevant when planning functions are exercised. b

Proceeding to exercise my judgment on that material, I find it is not enough to say that the Marsh Mills site is only two miles from the nearest point of the Lee Moor site and is physically and functionally connected with it. One must observe also that the intervening ground is not a uniform plain occupied by one predominant type of land use. On the contrary, most of the Lee Moor site is high ground on the margin of Dartmoor, whereas the Marsh Mills site is in a wooded valley watered by a stream called the Plym. The agricultural use of much of the land below the woodland has been replaced by an extensive housing estate. Moreover, the Marsh Mills site lies very near the road and railway that approach the city of Plymouth from the east in the lowland part of the area. c

Then I ask myself why the Minister who made the Development Order extended the general permission given by item 2 of class XVIII to work to be done on land in a quarry or mine or adjacent and belonging to a quarry or mine but not to such work on land at a distance. The answer is plainly that an existing quarry or mine will already have had its effect on land in its own vicinity, and therefore fresh building or other works erected either in the existing quarry or mine or on the adjacent and belonging land will merely be intensifying what has already occurred in that neighbourhood. But such an argument is not applicable to land at a greater distance. Bearing all these considerations in mind and particularly the character of the neighbourhood of Marsh Mills, in contrast to that of Lee Moor, I ought not, in my judgment, to say that the Marsh Mills site is, in this planning sense, adjacent to the Lee Moor site. d

Finally, I must deal with the fourth point, and there I think that the plaintiff is right although it will not help the plaintiff in view of my decision on the second and third points. In my judgment, the Marsh Mills site is land belonging to the Lee Moor site. The proper test for that decision is, I think, connection or association of use. Compare *St Thomas', St Bartholomew's and Bridewell Hospitals v Hudgell*¹. On that view, the commercial or industrial connection is relevant. The functional connection is sufficient, in my judgment, to show that the Marsh Mills site belongs to the quarry on Lee Moor. If, however, the proper test were common proprietorship, the result would be the same. It matters not, to my mind, that part of the Marsh Mills site is freehold and part leasehold, while the whole of the other is freehold. Both sites belong, in present title, to the same owner, namely the plaintiff. e

I ought not to leave the case without saying that I do not intend, by this judgment, to cast any doubt on a reported decision of the Lands Tribunal in a rating case in which the tribunal considered these very hereditaments. It is reported under the title *English Clays Lovering Pochin & Co Ltd v Davis, Watts Blake Bearne & Co Ltd v Davis*². f a Both out of respect to the tribunal and in the interests of the plaintiff, I ought to take a few minutes to show why my judgment does not, in my view, in any way conflict with the tribunal's decision. The tribunal was there concerned with the situation for rating purposes of three pipelines, one of which was the pipeline from Lee Moor to Marsh Mills mentioned in the present case and belonging to the plaintiff. The actual decision of the tribunal was that the pipeline was not rateable. But, in reaching that decision and, as I understand it, as an essential part of the ratio decidendi, the tribunal found that the Marsh Mills site belonging to the plaintiff was itself part of a quarry within the meaning of s 180 of the Mines and Quarries Act 1954. It is not necessary for me to go into the referential legislation which made that definition of 'quarry' decisive for rating purposes. I will at once go to s 180 of the Mines and Quarries Act 1954 and read the definition, or the part which is material:

c '(2) In this Act the expression "quarry" means an excavation or system of excavations made for the purpose of, or in connection with, the getting of minerals (whether in their natural state or in solution or suspension) or products of minerals, being neither a mine nor merely a well or bore-hole or a well and bore-hole combined.

d '(3) For the purposes of this Act— . . . (b) there shall be deemed to form part of a quarry so much of the surface (including buildings, structures and works thereon) surrounding or adjacent to the quarry as is occupied together with the quarry for the purpose of, or in connection with, the working of the quarry, the treatment, preparation for sale, consumption or use, storage or removal from the quarry of the minerals or products thereof gotten from the quarry or the removal from the quarry of the refuse thereof . . .'

e It was under that definition that the tribunal decided that the Marsh Mills site was part of the plaintiff's quarry, because, in their view, it was adjacent to the quarry. Their decision on that point was stated as follows¹:

f 'We think that they [i.e. the pipelines] are "equipment" because they are plant essential to the working of the quarries and have not changed that quality because of s. 41 of the Pipe Lines Act, 1962. We accept counsel for the appellants' first contention as to what constitutes the "quarries" in these cases. It seems to us clear on the facts that the installations at Marsh Mills and Heddon are occupied together with their respective clay pits for the purpose of, or in connection with, the treatment and preparation for sale and for the removal of the material gotten there. When that material gets to these installations, it is not in a condition in which it can be sold or removed (except on very rare occasions): it has to be further dewatered, then pumped into pressure filters and go through the other processes we have described. Indeed, as the agreed statement of facts . . . in each case says: "No manufacturing process is carried on at the dries and its sole use is the treatment and preparation for sale of the clay won from the pits." Even if counsel for the [valuation officer] was right in his limited construction of the words "removal from the quarries of the minerals"—and we do not think he is—the installations would still be occupied for the "treatment" and "preparation for sale" of the clay. These installations should therefore be deemed part of the quarries unless they are not "adjacent" thereto. We think that the decision of the Privy Council in the Wellington case² and that of the Court of Appeal in the Lightbound case³ justify us in construing the word in accordance with the "circumstances" and the "apparent scope and object" of the statute. It seems to us that the object of s. 180 of the Mines and Quarries Act, 1954, is to bring within the definition of a "quarry" everything that is comprised in a quarry

"undertaking"; from the "hole in the ground", through the treatment and preparation for sale sections to the despatch section, provided only that a sensible person with an adequate knowledge of the working of quarries, and in these appeals particularly of clay pits, would say that the several parts formed part of a single clay working installation. We do not say that distance is wholly and always irrelevant in the consideration of the word "adjacent": we do say that in the conditions affecting clay pits in Cornwall and Devon it may be, and in these cases is, inevitable that there be a considerable distance between the point of extraction and the point where final treatment, preparation for sale, and despatch can conveniently, efficiently and economically be carried out, and we think that the use of the word "adjacent" instead of "adjoining" or "contiguous" gives colour to the construction we adopt. "Close proximity" may be relevant in considering "adjoining": we think "adjacent" requires a considerably looser application and that the distances involved in these appeals are not such as to make a sensible man say that the dries are not part of, in each case, a single quarry undertaking. To our minds the view that s. 180 was intended to cover the entirety of a mine or quarry undertaking is supported by sub-ss. (4), (5) and (6). These bring within a mine or quarry land used for the deposit of refuse, railway lines serving mines or quarries (if not already deemed part of them under sub-s. (3)) and conveyors and aerial ropeways provided for the removal from a mine or quarry of minerals or refuse. There is no requirement that these must be adjacent nor is there any limitation by distance. It seems to us impossible to believe that the Mines and Quarries Act defined them so as to include every form of transportation used in mines or quarries except a pipeline of this kind. In so far as it is a matter of fact we find that the dries of both companies are in the best position to secure the convenient, economical and efficient final treatment, preparation for sale and removal of the clay, that the pipelines in both cases are an essential and integral part of the equipment required to produce and despatch saleable clay and that the dries and the pipelines in both cases are "adjacent" to their respective quarries. As a matter of law we are of the opinion that upon a proper construction of s. 180, including the word "adjacent", we are not precluded from reaching those findings of fact.

It will be seen that the Lands Tribunal construed the word 'adjacent' with reference to its context in, and the neighbouring provisions of, the Mines and Quarries Act 1954. The long title of that Act is this:

'An Act to make fresh provision with respect to the management and control of mines and quarries and for securing the safety, health and welfare of persons employed thereat; to regulate the employment thereat of women and young persons; to require the fencing of abandoned and disused mines and of quarries; and for purposes connected with the matters aforesaid.'

Thus, in the Mines and Quarries Act 1954 the purpose of the legislature was directed to the management of mines and quarries and the welfare of the employees working therein, and it is natural accordingly to do as the Lands Tribunal did and interpret the word 'adjacent' with reference to the unity of a single mining or quarry-working installation. Wholly different considerations, in my judgment, are applicable, for reasons that I have already fully explained, where the word 'adjacent' has to be tested in legislation relating to town and country planning.

^f S was born in India. In 1967 he obtained an Indian passport. He arrived at Dover on 17th December 1967 and reported to the immigration authorities. He was refused admission. He returned on 9th January 1968 and was again refused admission. A few days later he returned in a small boat and, unknown to the authorities, landed somewhere on the coast. By doing so he committed an offence under s 4 (1)^a of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962. Thereafter he had lived and worked in the United Kingdom.

^g In March 1968 the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1968 came into force, and, by s 3, added a new section, s 4A^b, to the 1962 Act which made it an offence for a Commonwealth citizen to land in the United Kingdom without submitting to an examination by the immigration authorities. In December 1968 K, an Indian, was brought to England by boat and entered the country clandestinely without reporting to the immigration authorities. In January 1970 A, a Pakistani, arrived in England by similar means. Thereafter both K and A lived in the United Kingdom and obtained employment. In December 1971 the police visited K and he admitted to them that he had entered the country illegally. He was informed that further enquiries would be made and his passport was taken. However, he was told subsequently that no police action would be taken and his passport was returned to him. In September 1972 the police visited A who admitted to them that he had entered the country illegally. The police told him that he would not be prosecuted but that the facts would be reported to the immigration authorities.

^b Section 4A, so far as material, is set out at p 755 b and c, post

On 1st January 1973 the Immigration Act 1971 came into force. That Act repealed the 1962 and 1968 Acts and, by s 4 (2)^c and Sch 2^d 'conferred new powers on immigration authorities with respect to, the removal from the United Kingdom of persons . . . entering or remaining unlawfully'. By s 34 (1) (a) the 1971 Act applied to entrants arriving in the United Kingdom before the Act came into force.

In January 1973 A was detained under an order issued by the chief immigration officer under para 16 (2) of Sch 2 to the 1971 Act 'pending the completion of arrangements for dealing with him under the Act'. In February 1973 K and S were detained under similar orders. All three applied for writs of habeas corpus on the ground that their detention was unlawful.

Held – (i) S had entered the United Kingdom 'in breach of . . . the immigration laws', within s 33 (1)^e of the 1971 Act, because his clandestine entry into the country, after having been refused admission, was an offence which, by virtue of s 4 (1) of the 1962 Act, was deemed to continue throughout the period that he was in the United Kingdom. Accordingly, on the date when the 1971 Act came into force, S was in the United Kingdom 'in breach of the immigration laws' within s 33 (2) of the 1971 Act (see p 748 b, p 752 c, p 758 c and g and p 761 b and d, post).

(ii) (Buckley LJ dissenting) A and K had both 'entered' and, on the date when the 1971 Act came into force, were present in the United Kingdom 'in breach of the immigration laws' within s 33 (1) and (2) of the 1971 Act, because they had committed an offence under s 4A (1) of the 1962 Act by 'landing' in the United Kingdom without submitting to examination by immigration officers. For that purpose no distinction was to be drawn between the words 'landing' or 'entering' and therefore a person

^c Section 4 (2), so far as material, provides: "The provisions of Schedule 2 to this Act shall have effect with respect to . . . (c) the exercise by immigration officers of their powers in relation to entry into the United Kingdom, and the removal from the United Kingdom of persons refused leave to enter or entering or remaining unlawfully; and (d) the detention of persons pending examination or pending removal from the United Kingdom; and for other purposes supplementary to the foregoing provisions of this Act."

'8.—(1) When a person arriving in the United Kingdom is refused leave to enter, an immigration officer may, subject to sub-paragraph (2) below [make directions for his removal from the United Kingdom].

'(2) No directions shall be given under this paragraph in respect of anyone after the expiration of two months beginning with the date on which he was refused leave to enter the United Kingdom.

'9. Where an illegal entrant is not given leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom, an immigration officer may give any such directions in respect of him as in a case within paragraph 8 above are authorised by paragraph 8 (1) . . .

'16. . . (2) A person in respect of whom directions may be given under any of paragraphs 8 to 14 above may be detained under the authority of an immigration officer pending the giving of directions and pending his removal in pursuance of any directions given . . .

^e Section 33, so far as material, provides:

'(1) For purposes of this Act, except in so far as the context otherwise requires . . . "entrant" means a person entering or seeking to enter the United Kingdom, and "illegal entrant" means a person unlawfully entering or seeking to enter in breach of a deportation order or of the immigration laws, and includes also a person who has so entered . . . "immigration laws" means this Act and any law for purposes similar to this Act which is for the time being or has (before or after the passing of this Act) been in force in any part of the United Kingdom . . . "limited leave" and "indefinite leave" mean respectively leave under this Act to enter or remain in the United Kingdom which is, and one which is not, limited as to duration; "settled" shall be construed in accordance with section 2 (3) (d) . . .

'(2) It is hereby declared that, except as otherwise provided in this Act, a person is not to be treated for the purposes of any provision of this Act as ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom . . . at a time when he is there in breach of the immigration laws . . .

^a who had landed in breach of s 4A of the 1962 Act had entered 'in breach of the immigration laws'. Furthermore it was immaterial that, after the lapse of six months from the date of their entry, A and K could no longer be prosecuted for an offence under s 4A (1); their presence in the United Kingdom was unlawful and remained so all the time they were there (see p 749 b c and g to j, p 751 f and h, p 761 c, p 762 d and g and p 763 a and b, post).

^b (iii) (Buckley LJ dissenting in part) It followed that, since the applicants were in the United Kingdom 'in breach of the immigration laws', they could not, by virtue of s 33 (2) of the 1971 Act, be treated as being 'ordinarily resident' there; consequently they were not 'settled', within ss 2 (1), (3) (d)^f, and 33 (1), at the date when the 1971 Act came into force and could not, therefore, be treated as having been given indefinite leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom under s 1 (2)^g of the 1971 Act (see p 749 h, p 750 c, p 758 h, p 760 j to p 761 a and p 762 h, post).

^c (iv) Under paras 9 and 16 of Sch 2 to the 1971 Act, a person who had entered the country unlawfully and who had not thereafter been given leave to remain could be detained under the authority of an immigration officer pending his removal or the giving of appropriate directions; the words 'is not given leave' in para 9 were to be construed as meaning 'has not been given leave' or (per Stephenson LJ) as meaning 'is a person not given leave'. The statement made by the police to A that he would not be prosecuted did not amount to the giving of leave to remain in the United Kingdom. Since all the applicants were illegal entrants and none of them had been given leave to remain in the United Kingdom they were, by virtue of paras 9 and 16 of Sch 2, liable to detention if directions for their removal from the country were contemplated (see p 750 d to f, p 751 g and j, p 752 b, p 759 c and d, p 763 j, p 764 a c and h to p 765 a, post).

^e (v) There were no grounds for contending that, by virtue of s 34 (4) (b)^h, the 1971 Act did not apply to S because his removal was 'in pursuance of a decision taken before the coming into force' of the Act, i.e. the decision to refuse him entry. The word 'decision' in s 34 (4) (b) referred to decisions to remove and no decision to remove S had been made before the coming into force of the Act (see p 752 e, p 758 a and p 764 f, post).

^f (vi) It followed therefore (Buckley LJ dissenting in part) that all three applicants as illegal entrants who had not been given leave to remain in the United Kingdom, had been lawfully detained under the power conferred by para 16 (2) of Sch 2 to the 1971 Act, and they were not entitled to writs of habeas corpus (see p 751 g, p 753 d, p 758 j, p 763 j and p 765 a, post).

^g Per Curiam. Under Sch 2 of the 1971 Act the powers of detention and removal only apply in respect of a person who is in truth an illegal entrant. If a person can make out a prima facie case that he is not an illegal entrant he is entitled to a writ

^f Section 2, so far as material, provides:

^h '(1) A person is under this Act to have the right of abode in the United Kingdom if . . . (c) he is a citizen of the United Kingdom and Colonies who has at any time been settled in the United Kingdom . . . and had at that time (and while such a citizen) been ordinarily resident there for the last five years or more . . .

'(3) . . . for the purposes of [sub-s (1)] . . . (d) . . . references to a person being settled in the United Kingdom . . . are references to his being ordinarily resident there without being subject under the immigration laws to any restriction on the period for which he may remain . . .'

^j ^g Section 1 (2) provides: 'Those not having [the right of abode in the United Kingdom] may live, work and settle in the United Kingdom by permission and subject to such regulation and control of their entry into, stay in and departure from the United Kingdom as is imposed by this Act; and indefinite leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom shall, by virtue of this provision, be treated as having been given under this Act to those in the United Kingdom at its coming into force, if they are then settled there (and not exempt under this Act from the provisions relating to leave to enter or remain).'

^h Section 34 (4), so far as material, is set out at p 752 d, post of habeas corpus as of right and is not obliged to rely on the less convenient remedy of appeal under s 16 of the 1971 Act (see p 751 d to f, p 758 h and j and p 759 h to p 760 a, post).

Appeal

Mohammed Azam appealed against a decision of the Queen's Bench Divisional Court dated 23rd February 1973 whereby the court refused to order that a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum should issue to the governor of Pentonville Prison. Gurbax Singh Khara appealed against a decision of the Divisional Court dated 21st March 1973 whereby the court refused to order that a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum issue to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department and the governor of Winson Green Prison, Birmingham. Malkiat Singh Sidhu appealed against a decision of the Divisional Court dated 21st March 1973 whereby the court refused to order that a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum should issue to the Secretary of State and the governor of Pentonville Prison. The appeals were heard together. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

T O Kellock QC and S Kadri for the appellant Azam.

L J Blom-Cooper QC and C Allan for the appellant Khara.

David Turner-Samuels QC and Stephen Sedley for the appellant Sidhu.

Gordon Slynn for the respondents.

3rd May. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING MR. These three cases raise questions of the first importance to many Commonwealth citizens now in this country. Each of the three men is an 'illegal entrant'. Each entered this country clandestinely without any permission to do so. Each has worked here for more than three years. Each has now been a arrested and detained in prison. In each case without trial. Each is about to be removed under the directions of the Home Secretary from this country. Each has brought a writ of habeas corpus claiming that his detention is unlawful.

Other cases await our decision. There must be many 'illegal entrants' wondering whether it will be their turn next. No one can tell the number. They came in secretly. They went to ground for a time. Afterwards they mingled with others.

b They got lost in the crowd. Frequently they have managed to get passports of some kind. They go to their High Commissioners and say that they did have passports which have been lost or damaged. On that plea they have been issued with new ones. There is no easy way of telling a legal from an illegal entrant. They have obtained work. They have been issued with national insurance cards. Now, under the new Act¹, which came into force on 1st January 1973, they are faced with arrest and removal. The situation is shown by the facts in these three cases.

c Mohammed Azam

Mohammed Azam is a young man whose home was in Campbellpur, Pakistan. His father is dead, but his mother and two sisters, aged 12 and nine, still live in Pakistan. He has been here since January 1970. An agent in Pakistan arranged for him to get here. The fee was 15,000 rupees (something over £500). He travelled by air from Pakistan to Paris. He stayed two days in Paris, and eight days in Rotterdam. Then at night he joined a small boat with four or five other Pakistanis. He disembarked at night in England. He went to Birmingham for three weeks. Then to Derby with friends for some four months. He got casual employment. But he afterwards went to South Wales, where he has been in regular work, with a national insurance card. He has worked long hours, and sometimes seven days a week, so as to earn money.

e He has sent £30 to £40 a month home to his family.

After he had been here 18 months, he took steps to get a passport. He got a Pakistani passport issued by the Pakistani authorities at Bradford on 19th August 1971. It was a genuine passport for him with his true name and photograph on. It bore an endorsement to the effect that it was issued so as to replace a passport issued a week earlier in Karachi; but this previous passport was not his or was not genuine. He had paid f £20 for the endorsement.

On 5th September 1972 some police officers went to the factory where he worked. At first he denied that he had come into this country illegally. But afterwards he admitted that he had come in January 1970 by boat from Rotterdam. They went with him to his lodgings and examined his national insurance card and his passport. At the end of the interview the police told him that the facts would be reported to the immigration authorities. They also told him that he would not be prosecuted by g the police.

On 1st January 1973 the Immigration Act 1971 came into force. Three or four weeks later, on 26th January 1973, a chief immigration officer, together with two police officers, went to the factory where he worked. They took him to his lodgings, and then to the police station. He could not speak much English. So they got an interpreter.

h He gave his story substantially as I have told it. At the end the chief immigration officer told him that, as he had entered the country illegally, he was liable to be removed to Pakistan, and that any decision about it would be taken by the Home Office. The chief immigration officer gave the police officers a detention order on these terms:

j 'Mohammed Azam

'The above-named is a person whose detention I have authorised under Paragraph 16 of Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971. I accordingly request you to receive the said person pending the completion of arrangements for dealing with him under the Act.'

In pursuance of that order, Mr Azam was transferred to the prison at Swansea. Afterwards he was transferred to the prison at Pentonville on 3rd February 1973. On 9th February 1973 he applied to the Divisional Court for a writ of habeas corpus. This was refused. He now appeals to this court.

Gurbax Singh Khera

Gurbax Singh Khera is now 33 years of age. He is married, with a wife and small daughter in India. He was born in a village in the Punjab. He lived there all his life until December 1968. His father was then already in England, living in Wolverhampton. His uncle still lives in the same village in the Punjab. The uncle arranged with agents in India to get him to England. The uncle paid the agents about 15,000 rupees (some £500). The son got a valid Indian passport issued by the Government of India in New Delhi. He travelled by air from New Delhi to Paris. Then by car to a port on the French coast. When it was dark he embarked on a small motor-boat with three other Asians. The boat was manned by two white men. He was frightened because it was his first time at sea. They crossed to England. They got out on a sandy shore. The white men led them to hard ground. The Asians were put into the back of a van. They were driven for five or six hours until they arrived at Wolverhampton. Mr Khera was dropped at his father's house. The others went on elsewhere. Mr Khera soon obtained work and has continued at work ever since. Eighteen months later, in August 1970, he got a new passport issued to him by the Indian High Commission in London. The High Commission noted that his former passport was damaged and had been cancelled and retained.

In November 1970 he purchased a house, 243 Willenhall Road, Wolverhampton, for £1,200. He lived there with his father.

On 30th December 1971—when he had been here three years—a police officer called at his home. At first he gave a wrong name, but afterwards he admitted that he had come illegally by boat three or four years ago. The officer took him to the police station and called an interpreter to his aid. At the end the police officer told him that further enquiries would be made. He was bailed to appear at the police station six days later on 5th January 1972. The police officer kept his passport.

But the day before Mr Khera was due to appear, a police officer came to his house. He gave him back his passport and told him there was no need for him to report on the next day. He said: 'There will be no further police action. The full circumstances have been reported to the Home Office.' Soon afterwards Mr Khera's father returned to India. He thought that in the circumstances he could lawfully remain in England. So he made enquiries with a view to bringing his wife and daughter over to England.

On 1st January 1973 the 1971 Act came into operation. Five or six weeks later, on 5th February 1973, a police officer called at his house and took him to the police station. An immigration officer was waiting there for him, together with an interpreter. Mr Khera told him all that had happened. The immigration officer told him that he had entered and remained in this country in breach of the immigration laws. He made out a detention order requesting the police to detain Mr Khera. He was then taken to Winson Green prison and detained there.

His employers were much disturbed by his arrest. They wrote on 12th February 1973 this letter:

'This man has been employed by Ductile Planetary Mill Limited since 17th June, 1969 and has always been a good, cheerful and honest worker. He has responded to training in a way that has allowed us to make him a skilled operative on a finishing process, and at the moment production is affected by his absence ...'

On 22nd February 1973 his solicitor applied to the Divisional Court for a writ of habeas corpus. This was refused. He now appeals to this court.

Malkiat Singh Sidhu

- a Malkiat Singh Sidhu is a man of 43. He was born at Jullunder in India. He has a wife and eight children there. On 24th March 1967 he was issued at New Delhi by the Government of India with a passport. He arrived at Dover on 17th December 1967 and reported to the immigration authorities. He was refused admission. He came again on 9th January 1968 and was again refused admission. A few days later
- b he came in a small boat and landed somewhere on the coast. He travelled by bus to Birmingham. He has lived in Solihull and has been in work here. On 8th October 1970 he went to the Indian High Commission in London, and reported to them that he had lost his passport of 24th March 1967. Thereupon the High Commission issued him with a fresh passport.

- In 1971 he got into touch with the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants. They wrote on his behalf to the Home Office, asking that he should be given 'residential status' in accordance with *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*¹. But the Home Office did not grant it, as the date of his arrival in the United Kingdom could not be confirmed. On 30th October 1972 his wife and eight children applied in New Delhi for an entry certificate. Their application was sent to London. On 26th February 1973 the immigration officers asked Malkiat Singh Sidhu to come and see them. He
- c could not speak English or understand it, so they got an interpreter. It was discovered that he had come on 17th December 1967 and 9th January 1968 and had been refused admission of both occasions. He admitted that he had come back a few days later in a little boat.

- d On that information the immigration officers made a detention order against him. He was detained first at Heathrow and afterwards at Pentonville. On 7th March 1973 he applied for a writ of habeas corpus. This was refused, but he was granted
- e bail pending an appeal. He now appeals to this court.

The three cases affect so many others that I will endeavour to summarise the history of the law on the matter.

Before 1962

- f Before 1962 any Commonwealth citizen could come as of right into this country without the leave of anyone. He could stay here as long as he liked: see *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*². He had the same rights as any native-born Englishman. He could not be detained by the executive without a trial. If he committed a crime, he was liable to be arrested and tried like anyone else. But he could not be deported, not even if he was an habitual criminal, nor even if his presence here was very obnoxious to the rest of the people.

- g In all those respects he was very different from an alien. At common law no alien has any right to enter this country except by leave of the Crown; and the Crown can refuse leave without giving any reason: see *Schmidt v Secretary of State for Home Affairs*³. If he comes by leave, the Crown can impose such conditions as it thinks fit, as to his length of stay, or otherwise. He has no right whatever to remain here. He is liable to be sent home to his own country at any time if, in the opinion of the
- h Crown, his presence here is not conducive to the public good; and for this purpose, the executive may arrest him and put him on board a ship or aircraft bound for his own country: see *R v Brixton Prison (Governor), ex parte Soblen*⁴. The position of aliens at common law has since been covered by various regulations; but the principles remain the same.

who wished to come here, or to remain here—but they left a big gap, as I will show. The obstacles were these. a

(i) If a man came to a port of entry, he could be required to submit to examination within 24 hours. If he had a work permit or other sufficient reason, he would be admitted. If not, he could be refused admission. If he was refused admission, he could be sent back straight away, or at any time within two months. If he afterwards slipped in clandestinely and stayed here (as Mr Sidhu did), then he was guilty of the offence of entering or remaining here, and that offence was deemed to continue throughout any period that he was here: see s 4 (1) (a) of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962. If he was admitted for a limited period, and overstayed that period, then again he was guilty of a continuing offence for the whole period that he was here: see s 4 (1) (b) of the 1962 Act. b

(ii) If a man came here in a ship as a seaman or one of the crew of a ship, and did not return to the ship but stayed here after she had left—or if he came as a stowaway—he was treated just as if he had been refused permission. He could be sent off again by the executive without any time limit—whenever he was picked up and found as a deserting seaman: see para 8 (4) of Sch 1 to the 1962 Act and *Re Abdul Manan*¹. He was also guilty of a continuing offence for the whole period he was here: see s 4 (1) (a) of the 1962 Act. c

The big gap in the 1962 Act was this. If a man did not enter through a recognised port of entry (where there were immigration officers), but came in clandestinely—such as landing on a lonely beach—then, by the decision of the House of Lords, he was guilty of no offence whatever. He was not bound to seek out an immigration officer or to submit himself for examination. If he was not examined within 24 hours—as he rarely was—then he was free to go where he pleased and to remain here as long as he liked: see *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*². He was as free as any Commonwealth citizen who had come before 1962. He could not be sent away. Nor could he be deported unless he committed a criminal offence here and was recommended for deportation. d

This gap, declared legal by the House of Lords, was so large, and so many people entered through it, that it may appropriately be called the 'Bhagwan Gap'. It lasted from 1962 to 9th March 1968. e

From 1968 to 1973

In 1968 Parliament made an attempt to stop the Bhagwan Gap, but it did not succeed very well. This is what was done. It was enacted³ that, if a Commonwealth citizen landed clandestinely (not going through a regular port of entry) he was bound to submit himself to an immigration officer for examination within 28 days; and, if admitted, get his passport stamped accordingly. If he did not submit himself for examination within 28 days, then his clandestine landing was itself an offence: see s 4A of the 1962 Act (which was inserted by s 3 of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1968). The important thing to notice is, however, that it was only the landing here which was made an offence. The Act did not make his remaining here an offence. The landing was a summary offence which was to be tried by justices: see s 14 (1) of the 1962 Act. If a prosecution was to be taken against him, it had to be taken within six months of his landing: see s 104 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952. f

Although he could not, after six months, be prosecuted under the section, nevertheless, he was liable to be prosecuted for conspiracy. In most cases the illegal landing would be made in pursuance of an agreement between him and the agents who brought him in. The agreement would be indictable, at common law, as a conspiracy; and there would be no time-limit for it. Nevertheless, although the agents, who arranged and conducted the illegal landings, were sometimes prosecuted and g a convicted, I believe that the illegal entrants were not often prosecuted. Once they were here, they went to ground. Even if found, it would be difficult to prove that they were parties to a conspiracy.

b So, in practice, it meant that, between 1968 and 1973, if a Commonwealth immigrant landed clandestinely, he was after six months virtually untouchable. He could not be prosecuted for the unlawful landing. He could not be removed. He could not be deported, unless he committed a fresh criminal offence and was recommended for deportation.

c But this does not mean that after six months he was here as of right; or that his presence here was lawful. His presence here was unlawful in its inception. It continued to be unlawful during the six months that he could be prosecuted for it. After the six months, it continued to be unlawful. It is a general rule of law that the expiry of a time-limit does not make that lawful which was previously unlawful. It only bars the remedy in respect of it.

d The Immigration Act 1971 was passed on 28th October 1971 but it did not come into force for the most part until 1st January 1973. Thenceforward, any Commonwealth citizen who enters without leave is guilty of an offence and may be prosecuted, not only within six months, but also within three years of it so long as the prosecution is started within two months of evidence coming to hand: see ss 24 (1) (a) and 28 (1) (a) of the 1971 Act. This applies also to Commonwealth citizens who landed unlawfully since 28th April 1971: see s 35 (3) of the 1971 Act. But those who landed unlawfully before 28th April 1971 cannot be prosecuted for the offence of unauthorised landing, because more than six months have elapsed since they landed. Nevertheless, their presence here remains unlawful.

e Now comes the important point. Under the new Act an 'illegal entrant' can be removed, no matter how long it was since he entered. By contrast, a person who was 'settled' here on 1st January 1973 is treated as having indefinite leave to stay here. It is, therefore, of the first importance to ascertain whether a person is 'settled' here or is an 'illegal entrant'. It would be tedious to go through all the sections in this regard, but I will state the result.

f (i) A person is an 'illegal entrant' if he 'entered in breach of the immigration laws': see the definition in s 33 (1). Those who entered before 9th March 1968 through the 'Bhagwan Gap' did not enter in breach of the immigration laws. So they are not 'illegal entrants'. But those who landed clandestinely after 9th March 1968 are 'illegal entrants'. They 'landed' in breach of s 4A of the 1962 Act (which was introduced as from 9th March 1968). It follows, I think, that they 'entered' in breach of the immigration laws'. Counsel for Mr Azam sought to say that they made only an unauthorised 'landing' and not an unlawful 'entry'. The landing, he submitted, was unlawful but the entry was not. I cannot accept this distinction. It is too fine for words. When a man 'lands' illegally and immediately thereafter 'enters', he makes an unlawful entry. Section 34 (2) proceeds on that footing.

g (ii) A person is only to be treated as 'settled' here on 1st January 1973 if he was 'ordinarily resident' here at that time: see s 2 (3) (d) and the definition in s 33. That means that he must have been lawfully resident here without being at that time in breach of the immigration laws: see s 33 (2) and *Re Abdul Manan*¹. Those who were refused entry and afterwards landed clandestinely were clearly 'in breach of the immigration laws'; because they were guilty of a continuing offence (s 4 of the 1962 Act). Those who landed clandestinely (without being previously refused) were also 'in breach of the immigration laws'. True they could not be prosecuted after six months, but their residence was unlawful and remained so all the time they were here.

(iii) Special provision was made for people who entered lawfully on a permit for a limited period and overstayed their time. They were not 'illegal entrants' within s 33 (1). Having entered lawfully, their subsequent 'remaining' here did not convert them into 'illegal entrants'. But they were not 'settled' here: see ss 2 (3) (d) and 33. Such a person was put into a better position than an illegal entrant. He was specially catered for. He was regarded as ordinarily resident here, even though he had remained here in breach of the immigration laws: see s 7 (2). He could not be deported on the ground that his presence was not conducive to the public good: see ss 7 (1) (a) and 3 (5) (b). But he could be deported on the ground that he had overstayed his time (see s 3 (5) (a)), unless he had been here for five years or more: see s 7 (1) (b).

Applying these considerations, it is plain that the three men here were all 'illegal entrants'. They were not 'settled' here on 1st January 1973; nor did they come on a permit for a limited period. So they are liable to be removed.

The removal of illegal entrants

The 1971 Act clearly contemplates that an illegal entrant can be removed on the direction of the Home Secretary: see ss 4 (2) (c) and 16 (1) (a). It is specifically made retrospective so as to apply to entrants arriving in the United Kingdom before the Act came into force: see s 34 (1) (a) and (b). It follows that a man who entered unlawfully before the Act came into force is liable to be removed after it. The procedure is contained in Sch 2. Summarised, it comes to this: 'Where an illegal entrant is not given leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom' (para 9), he 'may be detained under the authority of an immigration officer pending the giving of directions and pending his removal in pursuance of any directions given' (para 16).

The words 'is not given' must, I think, include 'has not been given'. Otherwise it would mean that no one who entered unlawfully before 1st January 1973 could be detained or removed under this procedure. That cannot have been intended. When you remember that an 'illegal entrant' includes one who has entered unlawfully, para 9 must be read as if it said in full: 'when a person who has entered unlawfully is not thereafter given leave to remain.'

After an immigration officer has given authority for the man's detention, it is for for Secretary of State to consider whether he should be given leave to remain or should be removed. He must give the man notice in writing of his decision: see s 4 (1). If the man is to be removed, the Secretary of State may order any shipping or air line to make arrangements accordingly: see para 10 (1) of Sch 2.

The power to remove an illegal entrant seems to be entirely a matter for the discretion of the Secretary of State. The statute places no limit on his discretion. If he exercises it honestly, I do not think that the court can interfere with his discretion. An illegal entrant in this respect is like an alien. He has no right to be here. He can be removed without reasons given and without a hearing: see *Schmidt v Secretary of State for Home Affairs*¹. We were assured, however, that the Home Secretary does exercise his discretion with the greatest care. He is ready to consider any representations that may be made to him.

Appeal

Once the Secretary of State gives directions that a man is to be removed on the ground that he is an illegal entrant, the man is given a right of appeal to an adjudicator on the ground that, on the facts of the case, he was not in law an illegal entrant: see s 16 (1) of the 1971 Act. He has no right of appeal on any other ground: cf s 13 (4). But there is a very significant provision in the Act. He cannot appeal so long as he is in the United Kingdom: see s 16 (2). He can only appeal after he has been removed, that is, presumably when he has got back to his homeland. Such an appeal would not seem to be a very beneficial remedy if a mistake has been made.

a These provisions as to appeal give rise to a question of the first importance. Do they take away a person's right to come to the High Court and seek a writ of habeas corpus? I do not think so. If Parliament is to suspend habeas corpus, it must do so expressly or by clear implication. Even in the days of the war, when the enemy were at the gate, habeas corpus was not suspended or taken away. When a man was detained under reg 18B¹, he was entitled to apply for a writ of habeas corpus if he could show a prima facie case that he was unlawfully detained. During the war, a man called Budd made an application which was successful, because the prerequisites of a lawful detention had not been complied with. But, in his next application he failed, because the Home Secretary had made a return which could not be faulted: see *R v Home Secretary, ex parte Budd*². Lord Greene MR put an illustration which is appropriate here³:

c '... if, for example, a regulation empowered the Home Secretary to detain any person who was in fact an alien, the court could inquire into the nationality of the applicant, since, if it transpired that he was not in fact an alien, his detention would be ultra vires.'

d Under Sch 2 the power to detain and remove applies in respect to a person who is in truth an illegal entrant. If a man can make a prima facie case that he is not an illegal entrant, he is entitled to a writ of habeas corpus as of right: see *Green v Secretary of State for Home Affairs*⁴ per Lord Wright. The court has no discretion to refuse it. Unlike certiorari or mandamus, a writ of habeas corpus is of right to every man who is unlawfully detained. If a prima facie case is shown that a man is unlawfully detained, it is for the one who detains him to make a return justifying it.

e In my opinion, therefore, if any of these men can raise a prima facie case that he is not an illegal entrant, he is entitled to have a writ of habeas corpus to have the matter determined. He is not to be deprived of it by the process of removing him out of the jurisdiction. That expedient was condemned by s 12 of the Habeas Corpus Act 1679 with severe penalties; and we should not let it be resorted to now.

f These three cases

Mohammed Azam

This young man came in clandestinely to England in January 1970. He was an illegal entrant. He remained here unlawfully in breach of the immigration laws. It was suggested that he was given leave to remain, but the statement made by the police cannot be so construed. In this respect his case is like the case of Khera which I will consider in a moment. He has shown no ground for saying that his detention was unlawful; or that his removal would be. There is no ground for habeas corpus in his case.

Gurbax Singh Khera

h This man came in clandestinely to England in December 1968. He was an illegal entrant. Counsel submitted that Mr Khera was impliedly given leave to remain here or that his illegal entry was waived, or that the Home Office had acquiesced in his remaining here. He made this submission because of the visit of the police officer on 30th December 1971 and what happened afterwards, which I have recounted. I cannot, however, read into this any implied leave or waiver. The police officer only told the man that there would be no police action and that the full circumstances had been reported to the Home Office. That is in no sense a representation that he had leave to stay. I can understand, of course, that Mr Khera thought that when the police officer returned his passport to him, he was out of trouble. So he would have been but for the new Act. But the new Act was expressly made retrospective. Section 34 (1) (a) and (b) said that the Act, as from its coming into force, shall apply in relation to entrants or others arriving in England, at whatever date before or after it came into force. It is clear to my mind that Mr Khera was never given leave to be here. The representation made by the police officer could not be so construed.

Malkiat Singh Sidhu

This man entered the country clandestinely in January 1968; but, unfortunately for him, he cannot avail himself of the Bhagwan Gap. He had previously come in to Dover and to Folkestone and had been refused. When he came in afterwards clandestinely, he was guilty of an offence against s 4 of the 1962 Act; and so long as he remained here he was continually guilty of an offence. He entered unlawfully in breach of the immigration laws and was, therefore, an 'illegal entrant' within s 33 (1).

Counsel for Mr Sidhu sought to escape removal in this way. He said that, by s 34 (4) (b) of the 1971 Act, the Act did not apply—

'in relation to removal from the United Kingdom and matters connected therewith... in any case where a person is to be removed in pursuance of a decision taken before the coming into force of this Act...'

Counsel said that this removal was 'in pursuance of' the decisions taken in December 1967 and January 1968 when he was refused entry at Dover and Folkestone.

I am afraid I cannot accept this argument. Section 34 (4) (b) is dealing with decisions to remove taken before the carrying into force of the Act. These decisions to refuse entry were not decisions to remove. The removal was in consequence of it, but not in pursuance of them.

Conclusion

In setting out the facts relating to these three men, I have done so with some sympathy for them. Coming from a Commonwealth country, where there is desperate poverty, they sought refuge in this country—a country where they can obtain work at good wages; where there are social services beyond compare; and where, above all, the law still protects the freedom of the individual. No doubt they had heard of friends and relatives who had come and settled here, and done well. No doubt there were grasping agents ready to take their money to arrange a passage. Yet, they must have known that their entry was unlawful. No one enters a country by night in a small boat if he is coming in lawfully. They must have known that there was a queue of people waiting to come in lawfully; and that they were jumping the queue. They must have known, too, that their stay here was precarious. So they did all they could to get passports of seeming validity. No doubt they hoped all the time that they would not be found out. To be fair to them, they seem to have behaved well and worked well. After three years, some might think that their wrongdoings could be forgiven, and that there should be an amnesty. But, Parliament has decided otherwise. I think I can see why. These men, if once here by leave, will seek to bring their wives and children over. Two of them have already applied to do so. If the men are allowed to remain, it will be difficult to refuse the wives and children. If this were allowed, the number of immigrants would be increased so greatly that there would not be room for everybody. Again, if an amnesty were granted, it would be an encouragement to others to follow their example; and that simply cannot be permitted. By sending back illegal entrants, it will help to deter others from trying to do the same.

In the circumstances Parliament, as I read the 1971 Act, has decided that illegal entrants can be sent back. It has entrusted this decision to the Home Secretary, and not to the courts. It has left it to his discretion. It is better left there because, after a all, the matter is one of policy which the courts cannot handle. The Home Secretary can take into account all the circumstances. He has to weigh in the balance on the one hand the length of time the man has been here, and his conduct while here; and, on the other hand, the effect on our society if he and others like him are allowed to stay. This is not a justiciable matter for the courts. It is an administrative matter for the Secretary of State. It is very like his discretion to remove aliens, which

 b has never been questioned in all our long history. Illegal entrants cannot expect to be treated better than aliens. Even though they are Commonwealth citizens, they have come into this country in flagrant defiance of our laws. They cannot pray in aid those very laws so as to enable them to remain here. The invasion by them has reached such a scale that Parliament has said: 'This must be stopped. The Home Secretary can send them back.' If he orders their removal, the courts cannot interfere with his decision. But I would emphasise that this power of the Home Secretary c can only be exercised when the man is in truth an illegal entrant. It is very different from the power given in wartime under reg 18B¹. Under that regulation a man could be detained on suspicion—suspicion that he was of hostile association. Here he can only be removed if he was in truth guilty—guilty of having unlawfully entered. Under reg 18B it was dependent on the opinion of the Home Secretary—if he had reasonable cause to believe. Here it is dependent on matter of fact—whether he was
 d an illegal entrant. Under reg 18B the decision could hardly ever be challenged by habeas corpus. Here it can be. The Home Secretary can, if called on, be required to show that the man was an illegal entrant. With these safeguards, none of these men can justly complain if the Home Secretary should decide that he shall be removed. I would, therefore, dismiss these appeals.

e BUCKLEY LJ. Each of the three appellants has been detained by the authority of an immigration officer pursuant to the Immigration Act 1971, Sch 2, para 16 (2). That paragraph empowers an immigration officer to authorise detention of a person in respect of whom directions might be given under any of paras 8 to 14 of the same schedule. The relevant paragraphs are paras 9 and 10, which are applicable to the f appellants only if each of them is an 'illegal entrant' within the meaning of the statute. Section 33 (1) defines 'illegal entrant' as meaning a person unlawfully entering or seeking to enter the United Kingdom in breach of a deportation order or of the immigration laws, including a person who has so entered. None of the appellants has been ordered to be deported. In respect of each of the appellants the question is whether he is a person who has entered the United Kingdom unlawfully in breach g of the immigration laws. By the same section the expression 'immigration laws' is defined as meaning the 1971 Act and any law for purposes similar to that Act which is for the time being or has (before or after the passing of that Act) been in force in any part of the United Kingdom. Each of the appellants entered the United Kingdom clandestinely without submitting to examination by the immigration authorities. Mr Azam came here in January 1970; Mr Khera came in December 1968; Mr Sidhu
 h came in January 1968. It is consequently necessary to consider what the law was at these dates respectively in order to determine whether they entered the United Kingdom unlawfully in breach of the immigration laws then in force.

Each of the appellants is a Commonwealth citizen, that is, a British subject. Before the passing of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962 every British subject had the right at common law to enter the United Kingdom without let or hindrance when and j where he pleased and to remain here as long as he wished: see *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*². That state of affairs was modified by the 1962 Act. The appellants are persons to whom the 1962 Act applies. Section 3 of, and Sch 1 to, the 1962 Act empower immigration officers to examine any person who lands or seeks to land in the United Kingdom for the purpose of ascertaining whether he is or is not a Commonwealth citizen subject to control under the Act, and, if so, for the purpose of determining what action, if any, should be taken in his case under that Act. Section 2 of the Act empowers immigration officers on examination of any Commonwealth citizen to whom the Act applies, who enters or seeks to enter the United Kingdom, to refuse him admission or to admit him subject to conditions. Paragraph 1 (2) of Sch 1 provided that a person should not be required to submit to examination after the expiration of 24 hours from the time when he landed in the United Kingdom. In *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*¹ the House of Lords pointed out that the only restrictions which the 1962 Act imposed on a British subject's right to enter the United Kingdom are those to be found in s 2, and that the powers of an immigration officer under that section were exercisable only on the examination of an immigrant under the Act. Bhagwan, who had not presented himself for examination nor been required to do so within 24 hours of his landing, was prosecuted for conspiring with others to evade examination under the Act. It was contended that by implication the Act imposed on citizens to whom it applied a duty to present themselves to an immigration officer for examination within 24 hours of landing in the United Kingdom. The House of Lords rejected this contention. Lord Diplock said²:

'My Lords, in the face of what the Act states and, even more significantly, what it omits to state, it would, in my view, be quite unjustifiable to attribute to Parliament so devious an intention to impose by implication on Commonwealth citizens a duty in derogation of their common law rights as British subjects which it did not put into express words.'

The House of Lords accordingly held that Bhagwan could not be found guilty of conspiracy.

Accordingly from the commencement of the 1962 Act until the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1968 came into operation the position was that a British subject who came into the United Kingdom without being examined by an immigration officer within 24 hours after he landed in the United Kingdom could not thereafter be refused entry to or removed from the United Kingdom, nor could conditions be imposed on his presence in the United Kingdom; he could not be prosecuted for any offence under the Act and so could not be deported consequent on conviction of such an offence. He was as much entitled to be in the United Kingdom as he would have been if the 1962 Act had never been enacted. In this state of the law an immigrant who submitted himself to examination under the Act and was permitted to enter the United Kingdom without any conditions being imposed could not, in my opinion, be properly said to have entered the United Kingdom by the leave of the immigration officer; he would have entered in the exercise of his common law right to do so. Under para 2 of Sch 1 to the 1962 Act the powers of an immigration officer to refuse admission to the United Kingdom or to admit to the United Kingdom subject to conditions had to be exercised in writing. There is no corresponding provision for leave to enter the United Kingdom being given in writing or at all. This was the state of the law when Mr Sidhu entered the United Kingdom. In December 1967 he had been refused admission at Dover. In January 1968 he was again refused admission. On 14th January 1968 he entered the country secretly without examination. By so doing, having already been refused admission, he committed an offence under s 4 of the 1962 Act. Such offence is by the terms of the section a continuing offence so long as he remains in the United Kingdom. He is accordingly still guilty of that offence today, and could be prosecuted for it, and could be recommended for deportation.

Section 2 of the 1968 Act substituted for s 2 (1) and (2) of the 1962 Act new provisions

a which contain considerable amendments of the subsections in the earlier Act, but none of these amendments is, I think, relevant for present consideration. Section 3 of the 1968 Act introduced into the 1962 Act a new section, s 4A. Subsections (1) and (2) of that section are in the following terms:

b '(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, if any person being a Commonwealth citizen to whom section 1 of this Act applies lands in the United Kingdom and does not fulfil either of the conditions specified in the next following subsection, he shall be guilty of an offence.

c '(2) The conditions referred to in subsection (1) of this section are—(a) that, while on board the ship or aircraft from which he lands in the United Kingdom, he has been examined by an immigration officer; (b) that he lands in accordance with arrangements approved by an immigration officer, and on landing, submits to examination in accordance with those arrangements.'

d These provisions in effect required an immigrant to whom the 1962 Act applied (other than one coming to the United Kingdom by land from the Irish Republic) to reach the United Kingdom either on an authorised ship or aircraft or through an authorised port or airfield. To do otherwise was made an offence. Section 4 substituted 28 days for the period of 24 hours mentioned in Sch 1, para 1 (2), to the 1962 Act. This was the position when Mr Azam and Mr Khera came to the United Kingdom. Each of them entered the country secretly without complying with the requirements of s 4A, but neither of them had been refused admission. They were consequently guilty of offences under s 4A, but not of offences under s 4. An offence under s 4A is not a continuing offence. Consequently an offender under that section cannot be prosecuted for the offence after the end of six months from the time when the offence was committed (Magistrates' Courts Act 1952, s 104). Neither Mr Azam nor Mr Khera was required to submit to examination within 28 days of landing and neither of them has been prosecuted. Consequently since about July 1970 in the case of Mr Azam, and since about June 1969 in the case of Mr Khera, neither of them has been liable to be prosecuted or, on conviction, to be recommended for deportation on account of his irregular entry to the United Kingdom. There was then no other power to remove them from the United Kingdom for any infraction of the immigration laws. True, they might perhaps have been prosecuted for conspiracy but that is a different offence. Accordingly as it seems to me, they were, at any rate so long as they remained in the United Kingdom, in the same position as they would have been if the 1968 Act had not been passed, that is, a similar position to Bhagwan's. They were legally entitled to be here and to remain here.

g The 1971 Act created a new category of British subjects called 'patrials', being persons recognised by the Act as having the right of abode in the United Kingdom. Section 3 of the Act prohibits entry into the United Kingdom by any person who is not a patrial, without leave. Thus, for the first time non-patrial British subjects were deprived of any right to enter the United Kingdom without leave; leave to enter or remain became for them (as it had previously been for aliens) a condition precedent to the acquisition of any right to come or to be here. None of the appellants is a patrial. Under s 1 (2) any person who is not a patrial may live, work and settle in the United Kingdom by permission, and anyone who, when the Act came into operation (which was on 1st January 1973), was settled in the United Kingdom is to be treated as having been given indefinite leave to enter or remain here.

j So if any of the appellants was 'settled' here on 1st January 1973 he is entitled to remain here. By virtue of ss 33 (1) and 2 (3) (d) of the 1971 Act a person is settled in the United Kingdom for the purposes of that Act if he is ordinarily resident here without being subject under the immigration laws to any restriction on the period for which he may remain. Section 33 (2) provides that a person is not to be treated for the purposes of the Act as ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom 'at any time when he is there in breach of the immigration laws'. So the question arises whether the appellants respectively were in this country on 1st January 1973 in breach of the immigration laws. It will be convenient to take first the case of Mr Azam. a

The Divisional Court expressed the view, with which I agree, that Mr Azam was ordinarily resident in this country on 1st January 1973 unless his residence here ceased to qualify for this purpose by reason of s 33 (2). The Divisional Court reached the conclusion on the facts of the case that Mr Azam was in this country in breach of the immigration laws. He came to this country, said Lord Widgery CJ, in flagrant breach of those laws, and the fact that some of the consequences of his illegal entry had spent themselves did not make it possible to say that he was otherwise than here in breach of those laws. With deference to those who think otherwise, I feel unable to agree with this view. b

It is, I think, instructive to compare the language of s 4A (1) of the 1962 Act with the language of s 4 (1) of the Act which is in the following terms: c

'If any person being a Commonwealth citizen to whom section one of this Act applies—(a) enters or remains within the United Kingdom, otherwise than in accordance with the directions or under the authority of an immigration officer, while a refusal of admission under section two of this Act is in force in relation to him; or (b) contravenes or fails to comply with any condition imposed on him under that section or under Part II of the First Schedule to this Act, he shall be guilty of an offence; and any offence under this subsection, being an offence committed by entering or remaining in the United Kingdom, shall be deemed to continue throughout any period during which the offender is in the United Kingdom thereafter.' d

Section 4 speaks of entering the United Kingdom whereas s 4A speaks of landing in the United Kingdom. Section 4 (1) (a) only applies to entering or remaining within the United Kingdom while a refusal of admission is in force. Section 4 (1) (b) relates to contraventions or breaches of conditions attached to entering the United Kingdom. If, on the other hand, an immigrant to whom the Act applies lands in the United Kingdom in contravention of s 4A but submits himself to examination within the prescribed time, he commits no offence under s 4 but remains guilty of an offence under s 4A, whether on examination he is permitted to enter the United Kingdom, or permitted to enter subject to conditions, or refused entry. Section 4 (1) makes an offence under that section a continuing offence throughout any period during which the offender is in the United Kingdom thereafter. Section 4A does not make an offence under that section a continuing offence. e

In my opinion the legislature has made a distinction between the act and the consequences of illegal entry and the act and the consequences of illegal landing. 'Landing' in these Acts, in my view, relates to the physical act of disembarking from a ship or aircraft (the 1962 Act, s 4A (7), Sch 1, paras 1 (1) and (2), 5 (1), 7 (1), 10 (1)). The 1971 Act uses the words 'disembark' and 'embark': see s 11. A would-be entrant may land without being treated as having entered the United Kingdom within the meaning of the Acts. (See for example s 11 of the 1971 Act. Although less clear, I think this is also implicit in the 1962 Act.) Entry is something which occurs, in the case of an entrant who requires leave to enter and comes into the United Kingdom by the authorised means, only after he has been examined and permitted to enter, whether unconditionally or subject to conditions, notwithstanding that he may have landed before he was examined. Conversely a would-be entrant who is refused admission and is removed from the United Kingdom cannot, I think, be said to have entered the United Kingdom notwithstanding that he may have landed for the purpose of examination and may even have spent some days ashore while his examination was proceeding or pending. Entry, in my opinion, involves some degree of participation in the life of the community in the United Kingdom, however temporary it may be. f

a This distinction between landing in the United Kingdom and entering the United Kingdom may seem to be a fine and somewhat artificial one, but it is one which an analysis of the Acts seems to me to indicate as an intentional distinction on the part of the legislature. If Parliament had intended that a secretive entry into the United Kingdom in breach of s 4A but not of s 4 should have similar consequences to an illegal entry in spite of a refusal of admission, it would surely either have made an offence under s 4A a continuing offence, as is an offence under s 4, or it would have provided, as in the cases of seamen and stowaways (see the 1962 Act, Sch 1, paras 8 and 9), that the secretive entrant should be treated as if he had been refused admission.

b Bearing in mind that, as the House of Lords indicated in *Bhagwan's case*¹, the traditional and one might say basic freedom of every British subject to move at will about the Crown's dominions should not be withdrawn or abridged unless by clear language or necessary implication in a statute, I do not think that s 4A should be construed as affecting a Commonwealth citizen's right of entry to the United Kingdom but merely as regulating certain methods of exercising that right. So construed the section did not, in my judgment, render Mr Azam's entry into the United Kingdom illegal, although his method of entry rendered him liable to a penalty. Nor was his entry without prior examination unlawful on that account, for the 1962 Act, as amended by the 1968 Act, did not destroy his common law right to enter the United Kingdom (contrast the language of s 3 (1) of the 1971 Act) but merely rendered him liable to a discouraging penalty if that right were exercised in a particular manner. It might be suggested that s 4A imposed a duty on a would-be entrant to comply with the conditions laid down in that section and so to submit himself for examination, but it remained the law that no one should be required to submit to examination after 28 days from the time when he landed. In these circumstances, in my judgment, if s 4A imposed any duty, it was confined to landing and did not relate directly to submitting to examination.

c This leads me to the conclusion that Mr Azam, notwithstanding his failure to comply with the conditions of s 4A (1), was not a person who 'entered' the United Kingdom unlawfully in breach of the immigration laws: in other words he was not an illegal entrant for the purposes of the 1971 Act.

d But if, as may be the case, I am wrong about that, is Mr Azam to be deemed to have received indefinite leave to remain here pursuant to s 1 (2) of the 1971 Act? This, as I have already indicated, depends on whether he was settled here on 1st January 1973, that is, ordinarily resident here without any restriction on the period for which he might remain (s 2 (3) (d)), which could not be the case if at that date Mr Azam was here in breach of the immigration laws. It is true that Mr Azam's presence here on 1st January 1973 was a consequence of his having earlier committed a breach of the immigration laws by landing without fulfilling the conditions of s 4A, but with the passage of time that breach had ceased to have any significance or substance. Mr Azam was no longer liable to any kind of penalty in respect of it. So far from his presence in the United Kingdom being in breach of any law it was, I think, an exercise of his common law right as a British subject to reside in this part of Her Majesty's dominions, of which right the statutes had not, for reasons which I have already endeavoured to make plain, deprived him. In my judgment, Mr Azam was not in the United Kingdom on 1st January 1973 in breach of the immigration laws, so that he must be taken to have then been settled here and must be treated under s 1 (2) of the 1971 Act as a person to whom indefinite leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom (which I take to mean leave which is unqualified in any way and unrestricted as to duration) had been given. It follows from this, in my judgment, that, even if contrary to my view Mr Azam should be regarded as having been an illegal entrant, he nevertheless is a person who is permitted under the terms of s 1 (2) of the 1971 Act to remain in the United Kingdom. This conclusion appears to me to be consistent with a common sense view of the policy of the 'general principle', as it is called in the marginal note to the section, enshrined in s 1 (2). a

The same considerations apply to the case of Mr Khera, and the same conclusions follow. It is consequently unnecessary for me to consider the point, which is peculiar to his case, relating to his communication with the police which, it is suggested, amounted to an implied grant of permission to remain in the United Kingdom or a waiver of any right to rely in relation to him on the irregularity in his arrival in this country. Nor need I deal with the other point raised by his counsel, that the immigration officer, at whose instance Mr Khera was detained, did not specifically consider the question whether Mr Khera had obtained leave to remain here. I would observe, however, that Mr Khera had an opportunity to raise this point, if it had any substance, which I doubt, and that, as he did not do so, the course taken by the immigration officer does not seem to me to be open to criticism on the ground suggested. b

Mr Sidhu, having entered the United Kingdom in spite of having been refused admission, was indisputably an illegal entrant. The first point taken in this court on his behalf is that since, as is contended, he is to be removed from the United Kingdom, if at all, pursuant to a decision taken before the 1971 Act came into force, he is not a person to whom the 1971 Act is applicable for any purpose connected with such removal (s 34 (4) (b)). In my judgment this premise is a false one. The decision to detain Mr Sidhu was taken after 1st January 1973. Any decision of the Secretary of State that he shall be removed from the United Kingdom will also have been made after that date. Mr Sidhu's removal, if he is removed, will be in pursuance of that decision of the Secretary of State, and not, as has been suggested, in pursuance of the decision in January 1968 to refuse him admission to the United Kingdom. So, in my judgment, the 1971 Act applies to Mr Sidhu for the present purposes. c

The second point taken on Mr Sidhu's behalf is that the powers under Sch 2, para 8, to the 1971 Act are not available in this case because of sub-para (2) thereof; that the powers under para 9 of the same schedule are inappropriate, because nothing is known about the ship or aircraft in which he arrived; and that the Secretary of State has not exercised or indicated any intention to exercise his powers under para 10. We are told that the Secretary of State intends to exercise those powers, if they are available to him. In my judgment, the fact that he has not yet exercised them is no bar to Mr Sidhu's detention under para 16 (2) of the schedule, which expressly provides for detention pending the giving of directions for the removal of the detained person. d

The reasons which, in my opinion, prevail in the cases of Mr Azam and Mr Khera do not apply to Mr Sidhu. Having entered the United Kingdom in spite of having been refused admission, he committed a breach of s 4 of the 1962 Act. That breach constituted a continuing offence which was still continuing at 1st January 1973. No common law right to enter the United Kingdom or to remain here was available to him. At 1st January 1973 he was an illegal entrant who was here in breach of the immigration laws. He is consequently not to be treated as having then been ordinarily resident here and s 1 (2) of the 1971 Act does not apply to him. e

Counsel for the respondents has contended that, disregarding the merits of the appellants' cases, none of them should be granted habeas corpus because the 1971 Act provides an appeal procedure which he suggests should be preferred to habeas corpus proceedings. In my judgment, this argument should not prevail. A litigant should not be refused the ancient remedy of habeas corpus on account of the availability of some less expeditious and advantageous alternative remedy. None of the appellants could appeal under the Act until his removal from the United Kingdom had taken place. In these circumstances not only is the appeal procedure manifestly less convenient and advantageous to the appellants than habeas corpus proceedings, but it is not adequate to maintain intact the right which the appellants assert, namely a right to remain undisturbed in the United Kingdom. f

For these reasons I would allow the appeals of Mr Azam and Mr Khera but dismiss the appeal of Mr Sidhu. g

STEPHENSON LJ. We are concerned with three Commonwealth immigrants who claim that they are unlawfully detained.

An immigration officer has authorised the detention of each of them by detention orders dated 30th January, 5th February and 28th February 1973 respectively under para 16 of Sch 2 to the Immigration Act 1971 pending the completion of arrangements for dealing with them under the Act. They are therefore all persons deemed to be in legal custody by virtue of para 18 (4) of the same schedule. The question is whether the immigration officer who made each of those detention orders was entitled to make it by virtue of para 16 of the schedule or whether he exceeded his statutory powers because for one reason or another the person whom he ordered to be detained was not 'a person in respect of whom directions may be given under any of paras 8 to 14' of the same schedule. Only if he is such a person may he be 'detained under the authority of an immigration officer pending the giving of directions and pending his removal in pursuance of any directions given'. Of those paragraphs, paras 8 to 11 provide for the removal of persons refused leave to enter and illegal entrants. The respondents allege that all these appellants are illegal entrants and para 9 therefore applies. That paragraph provides: 'Where an illegal entrant is not given leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom, an immigration officer may give' directions of the kind referred to in para 16 (2). By s 33 (1) an 'illegal entrant' means—

'a person unlawfully entering or seeking to enter [the United Kingdom] in breach of a deportation order or of the immigration laws, and includes also a person who has so entered'.

Of each appellant the question then has to be asked: is he an illegal entrant? If not, he must be released and the writ must go. If he is, has he been given leave to enter or leave to remain? (I hope to justify the form of the last question without ignoring an argument addressed to us on the use of the present tense in para 9.) If he has, again he must go free. The appellant Sidhu admits that he is an illegal entrant but claims that the 1971 Act, including para 9 of Sch 2, does not apply to him. The appellant Khera, having conceded in the Divisional Court that he was an illegal entrant, would like this court to decide on the arguments of the appellant Azam's counsel that he is not, but also to imply from the facts of his case that he has been given leave and further to hold that the immigration officer failed to consider whether he had been given leave. The appellant Azam maintains that he is not an illegal entrant, or if he is, he has become entitled to remain because he has been given leave.

If any of the points taken on the appellant Azam's behalf were right we should be bound to decide that the appellant Khera's detention was unlawful. It therefore becomes necessary to consider the 1971 Act, what changes it has made in the law and whether and how it affects the appellants.

We cannot get out of deciding whether the detention of any of these three appellants is lawful by finding in the appeals provisions of Part II of the Act an alternative remedy. Where a person is detained in custody pursuant to the sentence of a court of law I agree with counsel for the respondents that he must challenge the legality of his detention by the prescribed procedure for appealing to a higher court or higher courts and not by such an application for habeas corpus: see *Ex parte Corke*¹. But when he is detained in custody pursuant to an order of the executive I am far from satisfied by the authorities on which counsel relies that the principles applicable to the exercise of the court's discretion in granting writs of mandamus or certiorari apply also to habeas corpus or that the existence of an alternative remedy however convenient, beneficial and effectual prevents the issue of the writ. Certainly there is no such alternative remedy here and I agree with Lord Denning MR and Buckley LJ that we must examine the legality of the appellants' detention. a

The Immigration Act 1971 is according to its preamble—

‘An Act to amend and replace the present immigration laws, to make certain related changes in the citizenship law and enable help to be given to those wishing to return abroad, and for purposes connected therewith.’ b

By s 34 (1) it repeals the whole of the Aliens Restriction Act 1914, the whole of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962 with a few exceptions, the whole of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1968 and the whole of the Immigration Appeals Act 1969 as well as parts of three British Nationality Acts: see Sch 6.

The 1962 Act was ‘An Act to make temporary provision for controlling the immigration into the United Kingdom of Commonwealth citizens’; the 1968 Act an Act to amend ss 1 and 2 of the 1962 Act and its first schedule ‘and to make further provision as to Commonwealth citizens landing in the United Kingdom’. By contrast the 1971 Act regulates the entry into and stay in the United Kingdom (Part 1) of all immigrants including aliens and, on its true construction as I think, whenever they ‘immigrated’. c

The Act begins by dividing (s 1) persons into those who have a right of abode in the United Kingdom from those who have not. Section 2 defines those who have that right under the Act and calls them ‘patrial’ (sub-s (6)). If a person is not patrial ‘he shall not enter the United Kingdom unless given leave to do so in accordance with this Act’ (s 3 (1) (a)), but ‘he may be given leave to enter the United Kingdom (or, when already there, leave to remain in the United Kingdom) either for a limited or for an indefinite period’ (sub-s (1) (b)), and the limited leave may be subject to conditions (sub-s (1) (c)); and he is liable to deportation if he satisfies the provisions of sub-ss (5) or (6). The administration of that control on entry and stay is given by s 4 to immigration officers (the power to give or refuse leave to enter) and to the Secretary of State (the power to give leave to remain or to vary any leave), and sub-s (2) of that section introduces the provisions of Sch 2 with respect to among other things ‘the detention of persons pending examination or pending removal from the United Kingdom’. d

The introductory words of s 2 (1), ‘A person is under this Act to have the right of abode in the United Kingdom’, leave open the possibility that persons may have the same or an equivalent right other than under the Act. It may be that the immigrant Bhagwan would fall into that category: see *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*¹. e But I understand the Act to be limiting the right to be ‘free to live in, and to come and go into and from, the United Kingdom without let or hindrance’ to patrials (s 1 (1)), and to be regulating and controlling the entry into, stay in and deportation from the United Kingdom of all persons who are not patrial by s 1 (2). By that subsection they need permission but are treated as having been given indefinite leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom if they are settled there at the coming into force of the Act, i.e., on 1st January 1973. Those who are not patrial have now no right to live in the United Kingdom or to come and go without let or hindrance; they can have only permission to live, work and settle in the United Kingdom indefinitely, which may come to very much the same thing. f

Who then are to be regarded as ‘settled’ in the United Kingdom on 1st January 1973? The answer is any ‘non-patrial’ who is ‘ordinarily resident there without being subject under the immigration laws to any restriction on the period for which he may remain’ (s 33 (1) and s 2 (3) (d)), but subject to this, that he is not to be treated g a as ordinarily resident there 'at a time when he is there in breach of the immigration laws' (s 33 (2)) and that means in breach of 'any law for purposes similar to this Act which is for the time being or has (before or after the passing of this Act) been in force in any part of the United Kingdom and Islands': s 33 (1). That meaning of immigration laws must also be its meaning in the definition of illegal entrants.

b All the appellants entered the United Kingdom clandestinely without encountering an immigration officer. The appellant Sidhu entered on 1st January 1968 (two months before the 1968 Act came into force) after being refused leave by an immigration officer under s 2 of the 1962 Act on 9th January 1968. He indisputably entered in breach of s 4 (1) (a) of the 1962 Act which provided:

c 'If . . . a Commonwealth citizen . . . (a) enters or remains within the United Kingdom, otherwise than in accordance with the directions or under the authority of an immigration officer, while a refusal of admission under section two of this Act is in force . . . he shall be guilty of an offence . . .'

d And indeed he was still guilty of that offence in February 1973 because the offence was by s 4 (1) 'deemed to continue throughout any period during which the offender is in the United Kingdom thereafter'. He is therefore beyond doubt an illegal entrant and unless the 1971 Act or para 9 of Sch 2 does not apply to him for some other reason his detention is lawful.

e The position of the appellants Azam and Khera is at first sight less clear, but I would have had no doubt that the Divisional Court was right in holding them both to be illegal entrants and counsel for the appellant Khera right in conceding them to be so were it not for the contrary opinion of Buckley LJ. They both entered clandestinely after the 1968 Act but before the 1971 Act came into force, the appellant Azam in January 1970 and the appellant Khera in December 1968. In my judgment they both entered in breach of s 4A which was added to the 1962 Act by s 3 of the 1968 Act. That section provided that 'if . . . a Commonwealth citizen . . . lands in the United Kingdom and does not fulfil either of [two] conditions', that he has been examined on board the ship or aircraft from which he lands, or that he lands in accordance with arrangements approved by an immigration officer and on landing submits to examination in accordance with those arrangements, he shall be guilty of an offence. Neither of these two appellants fulfilled either of these two conditions. Why has not each of them entered in breach of this section? The section imposed further restrictions on landing in the United Kingdom: see the sidenote. It plugged the gap left by s 4 of the 1962 Act and made clandestine entry illegal, as Lord Diplock pointed out in Bhagwan's case¹. It did not make such landing an offence which continued throughout the offender's stay in the United Kingdom, although it did (by s 4) extend the time after which he could not be removed for so entering from 24 hours to 28 days (1962 Act, Sch 1, para 1). But that merely had the effect of protecting the offender from prosecution after the six months' time limit for summary offences prescribed by the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952, s 104. As Lord Diplock pointed out, the 1962 Act was an experiment in controlling the numbers of Commonwealth immigrants and I think that the 1968 Act merely tried a different method of achieving the same thing, with one hand making entry without encountering an immigration officer an offence and extending the period for discovering it, with the other reimposing the ban on prosecuting the offender who 'gets away with it' after six months.

j The reasons for imposing the restrictions on persons landing and not on persons entering is not so clear. But it is to be noted that it is not only the Aliens Restriction Act 1914 and the Aliens Order 1953² which treat of landing and impose restrictions on landing and embarkation. The 1962 Act, having provided in s 2 for the Commonwealth citizen who 'enters or seeks to enter the United Kingdom', provides by s 3 (1) that the provisions of Part 1 of Sch 1 to that Act shall have effect with respect to— a

'(a) the examination of persons landing or seeking to land in the United Kingdom from ships and aircraft; (b) the exercise by immigration officers of their powers of refusal of admission ... under section two ...' b

And in Sch 1 will be found in para 5 a provision for landing cards and embarkation cards and in para 10 (1) definitions by which "'immigrant" means a Commonwealth citizen ... who lands or seeks to land in the United Kingdom' and "'land" means ... land from a ship or aircraft'. The definition of 'land' is repeated in the new s 4A (7). You cannot enter the United Kingdom from a boat or aircraft without landing or disembarking, and you cannot enter the United Kingdom except from a boat or aircraft (unless you cross the border from Eire to Northern Ireland). It is said that you can land from a boat (or aircraft) without entering because to enter you must enter the community by living in the United Kingdom if only for a season. I doubt that, but even if it be right I do not see how a person who lands in breach of s 4A (1) or (2) (b) and stays on in the United Kingdom has not entered the United Kingdom in breach of that immigration law. c

The 1968 Act passes from 'entering' in s 2 to 'landing' in s 3 without, I think, intending to draw any distinction between landing and entering by boat or aircraft or perhaps to do more than follow in s 3 the language which the 1962 Act had put into a schedule and anticipate that there may be yet undiscovered or unpractised methods of reaching the United Kingdom—such as by swimming or Channel tunnel. I find nothing in s 11 of the 1971 Act and its instances of what is not to be deemed to enter the United Kingdom which makes me regard the distinction between landing and entry as significant. d

'A person arriving in the United Kingdom by ship or aircraft shall for purposes of this Act be deemed not to enter the United Kingdom unless and until he disembarks' e implies that when he does disembark (or land) he will generally be considered to have entered. And I find no material difference between offences under s 4A which s 35 (3) of the 1971 Act describes as 'unauthorised landing', and offences under s 4, which the sidenote to s 24 of the 1971 Act describes as 'illegal entry'. The material difference between the two sections is that pointed out by Lord Diplock in Bhagwan's case¹ and it turns these two appellants into illegal entrants. On this question I agree with Lord Denning MR. f

Next comes the question whether illegal entrants though all three are, they are nevertheless to be treated under s 1 (2) of the 1971 Act as having been given indefinite leave because ordinarily resident there at a time when they are not in breach of immigration laws past or present. Again I have come to the conclusion, in agreement with Lord Denning MR and in spite of Buckley LJ's dissent, that the Divisional Court was right in holding that they were here on 1st January 1973 in breach of s 4A and are therefore prevented by s 33 (2) of the 1971 Act from claiming to be settled and so to be treated as having been given indefinite leave. g

There is considerable force in the argument that a person is not in breach of a law at a time when he cannot be prosecuted for the offence of breaking it and that the omission from s 4A of words like those in s 4 of the 1962 Act making the offence of unauthorised landing continue points strongly to the appellants no longer being in breach after the expiry of the 28 days and six months from their landing. Suppose one h a of these appellants had been prosecuted before the time expired, convicted and not deported, could he be said to be in breach of s 4A years later?

The answer is not, I think, to be found in analogies, though I do not see why a man may not be in breach of contract after the limitation period for suing him on it has run out. It is in the wording of s 33 (2) which makes the right question not 'is he in breach now?' but 'is he here in breach now?' Persons may be ordinarily resident here now, and since 1st January 1973 either in compliance with the immigration laws or not. There is no third class of persons who are here safe from prosecution or other action for breach of these laws. The appellants are here not in compliance with them but in contravention of them and they are therefore not entitled to be treated as here with indefinite permission to remain. This construction of s 33 (2) may take away from Commonwealth citizens who have been here for years the right to be heard by a court in opposition to a recommendation for deportation which they would have had if they had been prosecuted earlier. But they themselves will still be able to make representations to the Secretary of State in support of their pleas to remain. And if unlawful ordinary residence here is to turn them into persons here with indefinite leave, other 'non-patrials' will be prevented from coming and staying here lawfully.

d I find nothing in Part III of the 1971 Act which deals with criminal proceedings to throw doubt on this construction of s 33 (2). A breach of the immigration laws may be an illegal entry or a similar offence (s 24) or a general offence in connection with administration (s 26). Those and other offences, summary and indictable, are all subject now to prosecution for three years after being committed (provided that not more than two months elapse after the police have enough evidence to justify proceedings (s 28)). Indeed I find some support for my view that liability to prosecution does not affect the question whether an offender is here in breach of the immigration laws in s 28 (4) which provides:

f 'Any powers exercisable under this Act in the case of any person may be exercised notwithstanding that proceedings for an offence under this Part of this Act have been taken against him.'

This would seem to be an unnecessary provision if it referred only to those who after being prosecuted for one offence committed another. It would seem to justify detaining as an illegal entrant a person who had become ordinarily resident here after being prosecuted.

g It was argued last on behalf of the appellant Azam that if he was not to be treated as having an indefinite leave under s 1 (2) of the 1971 Act he was to be treated as having it under s 34 (3) (a), as he was not at the coming into force of the Act subject to a condition limiting his stay in the United Kingdom. He can only be treated as having it thereunder if he is a person treated in accordance with s 34 (2) as having leave to enter the United Kingdom. Is he such a person?

h Section 34 (1) (a) applies the Act in relation to entrants or others arriving in the United Kingdom at whatever date before or after it comes into force, and sub-s (2) provides so far as relevant that a person given leave to land by virtue of the Aliens Restriction Act 1914 shall be treated as having been given leave to enter under this Act 'and similarly with the Commonwealth Immigrants Acts 1962 and 1968'. That means that a Commonwealth citizen given leave to enter under s 2 of the 1962 Act or leave to land under s 4A introduced by the 1968 Act shall be treated as having been given leave to enter under the 1971 Act.

i As the appellant Azam, like the appellant Khera, has not been given any such leave he cannot be treated as having it for an indefinite period and this point too fails. So this appellant's detention is lawful and his appeal fails.

I agree that neither of the two points taken on behalf of the appellant Khera is good.

1. Leave to remain in the United Kingdom can be a matter of implication: see

*R v Secretary of State for Home Affairs, ex parte Soblen*¹ per Lord Parker CJ² and Lord Denning MR³. But it must be given by the Secretary of State or on his behalf and it is not given by a police officer informing an immigrant that he will not be prosecuted, that his passport is in order and that the Home Office have been informed, nor by the supervening months of inactivity on the part of the Home Office with knowledge of his entry in breach of s 4A. Nor do the facts amount to a waiver of the breach by the Secretary of State or any agent of his, or cause s 4A to 'drop away' as counsel for the appellant Khera picturesquely put it.

2. An immigration officer must act fairly: see *Re K (H) (infant)*⁴ per Lord Parker CJ. But the immigration officer who interviewed the appellant Khera was not bound to ask him whether he had been given leave to remain since his illegal entry. The appellant had had a solicitor acting for him, he was given an opportunity to tell the immigration officer about the police visit in January 1972 and if he had told him about it the immigration officer would not have been justified in considering that he was no longer here in breach of s 4A but here with leave actual or implied or presumed under s 1 (2) of the 1971 Act. I agree that his appeal also fails.

Finally I find both points taken in this court by counsel on behalf of the appellant Sidhu wholly unconvincing.

1. His first point is that the removal of this appellant from the United Kingdom and his detention connected therewith are in pursuance of the decision taken in 1968 to refuse him admission to enter the United Kingdom in the sense that there would be no power to remove or detain him if he had been admitted when he was refused. But this far-fetched construction of s 34 (4) (b) ignores the context of this subsection. Subsection (4) is providing that 'Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of this Act, the former immigration laws shall continue to apply, and the Act shall not apply' to certain decisions already taken but not carried out. This subsection is dealing with cases where when the Act comes into force an unimplemented decision has already been made to deport or to remove, or where an appeal is actually pending; in these cases the transitional provisions apply the existing immigration law and not the new Act. No such decision had been taken against this appellant before 1st January 1973. The decision to set in motion the procedure for removal was a decision taken after that and under the powers given by the new Act, and it was in pursuance of the subsequent decision that he was and is detained.

2. Insofar as I understand counsel's second point it is or is connected with that which was rejected by the Divisional Court. It is that the directions which may be given in respect of this appellant are directions under para 10, not para 9, because para 9 only applies to an illegal entrant who is not given leave and the appellant is an illegal entrant who has not been given leave. As the Secretary of State has not given directions in respect of him under para 10 he may not be detained under para 16 (2).

It is true that the Secretary of State has not given directions, although we are told that an order under para 10 has been drawn up for his signature which awaits the results of this appeal. But detention of this appellant is lawful under para 16 (2) if directions may be given in respect of him. Further I share the view of the Divisional Court that the language of para 9 is wide enough to cover the appellant, although I do not share their view that the paragraph must be altered to read 'where an illegal entrant is not given leave or has not been given leave'. Faced with illegal entrants who have entered the United Kingdom and remained here for differing periods, Parliament has used language which naturally and compendiously fits all such persons who have entered or remained without leave, without leave to enter given at the

So this appellant's detention is lawful and I agree that his appeal too fails.

- g S was born in India. He arrived at Dover on 17th December 1967 and reported to the immigration authorities. He was refused admission. He returned on 9th January 1968 and was again refused admission. A few days later he returned in a small boat and, unknown to the authorities, landed somewhere on the coast. By entering after the refusal of admission he committed an offence under s 4 (1)^a of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962. Thereafter he lived and worked in the United Kingdom. In March 1968 the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1968 came into force and, by s 3, added a new section, s 4A^b, to the 1962 Act which made it an offence for a Commonwealth citizen to land in the United Kingdom without submitting to an examination by the immigration authorities. In December 1968 K, an Indian, was brought to England by boat and entered the country clandestinely without reporting to the immigration authorities. In January 1970 A, a Pakistani, arrived in England by similar means. Thereafter both A and K lived in the United Kingdom and obtained employment. On 1st January 1973 the Immigration Act 1971 came into force. That Act repealed the 1962 and 1968 Acts and, by s 4 (2)^c and Sch 2^d, conferred new powers on immigration authorities with respect to 'the removal from the United Kingdom of persons . . . entering or remaining unlawfully'. By s 34 (1) (a) the 1971 Act applied to entrants arriving in the United Kingdom before the Act came into force. In January 1973 A was detained under an order issued by the chief immigration officer under para 16 (2) of Sch 2 to the 1971 Act 'pending the completion of arrangements for dealing with him under the Act'. In February 1973 K and S were detained under similar orders. All three applied for writs of habeas corpus on the ground that their detention was unlawful.

Held – (i) S was an 'illegal entrant' within s 33 (1)^e of the 1971 Act because the offence which he had committed under s 4 (1) of the 1962 Act by entering the country after being refused admission was expressly stated to be a continuing offence and was therefore continuing on the date when the 1971 Act came into force (see p 769 g, p 773 j, p 776 b to e and p 781 f and g, post). Furthermore S was, for the same reason, in the United Kingdom 'in breach of the immigration laws' when the 1971 Act came into force. By virtue of s 33 (2) he could not therefore be treated as being 'ordinarily resident' in the United Kingdom. In consequence he was not 'settled' there, within ss 1 (2)^f, 2 (3) (d)^g and 33 (1), and could not be treated under s 1 (2) as having been given indefinite leave to remain. It followed that, as an illegal entrant who had not been given leave to remain in the United Kingdom, S had been lawfully detained

c Section 4 (2), so far as material, provides:

'The provisions of Schedule 2 to this Act shall have effect with respect to . . . (c) the exercise by immigration officers of their powers in relation to entry into the United Kingdom, and the removal from the United Kingdom of persons refused leave to enter or entering or remaining unlawfully; and (d) the detention of persons pending examination or pending removal from the United Kingdom; and for other purposes supplementary to the foregoing provisions of this Act.'

d Schedule 2, so far as material, provides:

'8.—(1) Where a person arriving in the United Kingdom is refused leave to enter, an immigration officer may [make directions for his removal from the United Kingdom] . . .

'9. Where an illegal entrant is not given leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom, an immigration officer may give any such directions in respect of him as in a case within paragraph 8 above are authorised by paragraph 8 (1) . . .

'16. . . (2) A person in respect of whom directions may be given under any of paragraphs 8 to 14 above may be detained under the authority of an immigration officer pending the giving of directions and pending his removal in pursuance of any directions given . . .'

e Section 33, so far as material, provides:

'(1) For purposes of this Act, except in so far as the context otherwise requires . . . "entrant" means a person entering or seeking to enter the United Kingdom, and "illegal entrant" means a person unlawfully entering or seeking to enter in breach of a deportation order or of the immigration laws, and includes also a person who has so entered . . . "immigration laws" means this Act and any law for purposes similar to this Act which is for the time being or has (before or after the passing of this Act) been in force in any part of the United Kingdom . . . "limited leave" and "indefinite leave" mean respectively leave under this Act to enter or remain in the United Kingdom which is, and one which is not, limited as to duration; "settled" shall be construed in accordance with section 2 (3) (d) . . .

'(2) It is hereby declared that, except as otherwise provided in this Act, a person is not to be treated for the purposes of any provision of this Act as ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom . . . at a time when he is there in breach of the immigration laws . . .'

f Section 1 (2), so far as material, is set out at p 771 b, post

g Section 2 (3), so far as material, is set out at p 771 d, post a under paras 9 and 16 (2) of Sch 2 to the 1971 Act (see p 771 f, p 773 f, p 776 b to e and p 781 f and g, post).

(ii) A and K were 'illegal entrants' within s 33 (1) of the 1971 Act because they had landed in the United Kingdom in breach of s 4A of the 1962 Act. For that purpose no distinction could be drawn between the word 'landing', used in s 4A, and the word 'entering'; a person landing in the United Kingdom in breach of s 4A was a person 'entering . . . in breach of the immigration laws' within s 33 (1) (see p 770 d to f, p 773 j, p 776 b to e and p 779 a to c, post).

b (iii) (Lord Salmon dissenting) At the date when the 1971 Act came into force A and K were in the United Kingdom 'in breach of the immigration laws' within s 33 (2) because they had entered in breach of s 4A of the 1962 Act. It was immaterial that, because the offence under s 4A was a summary offence which was not a continuing offence, they could no longer be prosecuted for the offence when the 1971 Act came into force; in consequence of their illegal entry their presence in the United Kingdom continued to be 'in breach of the immigration laws' even though they could no longer be prosecuted. Accordingly, for the same reasons as S, A and K could not be treated as having been given indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom. They had, therefore, been lawfully detained (see p 772 a to c and f, p 773 j and p 776 b to e, post).

g Appeals

By notice of motion dated 16th February 1973 the applicant, Mohammed Azam, applied to the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division for an order that a writ of habeas corpus should issue to the governor of Pentonville Prison. On 23rd February 1973 the court (Lord Widgery CJ, Cusack and Croom-Johnson JJ) ordered that the application be dismissed. By notice of motion dated 27th February 1973 the appellant, h Gurbax Singh Khara, applied to the Divisional Court for an order that a writ of habeas corpus should issue to the Secretary of State for the Home Department and to the governor of Winson Green Prison, Birmingham. On 21st March 1973 the court (Lord Widgery CJ, James and Nield JJ) ordered that the application be dismissed. By notice of motion dated 12th March the appellant, Malkit Singh Sidhu, applied for an order that a writ of habeas corpus should issue to the Secretary of State for the Home

j Department and to the governor of Pentonville Prison. On 21st March 1973 the court (Lord Widgery CJ, James and Nield JJ) ordered that the application be dismissed. The appellants appealed to the Court of Appeal against the respective orders of the Divisional Court. The appeals were heard together and, on 3rd May 1973, the Court of Appeal¹ (Lord Denning MR and Stephenson LJ, Buckley LJ dissenting in relation to the appeals of the appellants Azam and Khera) dismissed the appeals. The appellants appealed to the House of Lords. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Wilberforce. a

T'O Kellock QC and S Kadri for the appellant Azam.

L J Blom-Cooper QC and Preetam Singh for the appellant Khera.

David Turner-Samuels QC and Stephen Sedley for the appellant Sidhu.

The Attorney-General (Sir Peter Rawlinson QC) and Gordon Slynn for the respondents. b

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

11th June. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD WILBERFORCE. My Lords, the appellants in these three appeals have been detained by authority of an immigration officer acting under provisions in the Immigration Act 1971 to which I shall later refer. Their detention may be followed by their removal from the United Kingdom, if the Secretary of State makes an order to that effect. They have applied unsuccessfully for writs of habeas corpus and the present appeals are against the refusal of their applications. c

Each of the appellants came into the United Kingdom clandestinely before the coming into force, on 1st January 1973, of the Immigration Act 1971. The bare facts and dates relevant for the present purpose are as follows: d

Mohammed Azam, who came from Pakistan, arrived clandestinely in January 1970 in a small boat. He has been here ever since. He was seen by police officers in September 1972 but no action followed. On 26th January 1973, after the Immigration Act 1971 had come into force, he was seen by a chief immigration officer and some officers of police, and a detention order was made against him. He was put in prison and is still there. e

Gurbax Singh Khera, who came from India, arrived clandestinely in December 1968 in a small boat. He was seen by police officers in December 1971 but early in January 1972 he was told by a police officer that there would be no further police action and that the full circumstances had been reported to the Home Office. A detention order was made against him on 5th February 1973: he was taken to prison and is still there. f

Malkit Singh Sidhu was born at Jullundur, India. He arrived at Dover on 17th December 1967 and reported to the immigration authorities. He was refused admission. He arrived again on 9th January 1968 and was again refused admission. Soon after, he arrived in the United Kingdom clandestinely in a small boat and has been here ever since. In 1971 the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants wrote on his behalf to the Home Office asking that he be given residential status, but this was refused. On 26th February 1973 he was seen by immigration officers and a detention order was made. He was put in prison, but later was granted bail pending the hearing of this appeal. g

To these bare facts I would add that there lie behind each case human stories of hardship and struggle of which the learned judges who have heard these applications have been fully aware. They are not directly relevant to these appeals so I do not state them—they are vividly presented in the judgment of Lord Denning MR. But it is right, I think, to bear in mind that the legal provisions, which we have to interpret and apply, operate in their nature on the way of life and basic rights of individuals and their families. We were told that there are a number of other persons in a similar situation, some of whose cases are reaching the courts. Most of these would concern persons clandestinely coming to the United Kingdom between the coming into effect of the 1968 Act and that of 1971. h

The three cases have in common one thing: all three appellants came to the United Kingdom and were resident in the United Kingdom well before the Immigration Act 1971 came into force, so that to apply the provisions of that Act to them involves a measure of retroactivity. But (it is necessary to be clear as to this at the j a outset) this is not one of those cases where the courts are able to refuse to attribute b retroactive effect to legislation. Parliament can, if it uses sufficiently clear words, give c legislation retroactive effect and there is no doubt that it has done so here. The definition of 'illegal entrant' (s 33 (1)), is expressed to include a person who has entered the United Kingdom in breach of the immigration laws: and if there is any doubt whether the words 'has [so] entered' relate to entry before the coming into force of the Act (and not merely to entry before a question as to his entry arises), that is removed by the definition of 'immigration laws' which includes any law which 'has (before or after the passing of this Act) been in force'. So if the appellants are otherwise within the description 'illegal entrant' the Act must apply to them notwithstanding that they entered illegally before the 1971 Act came into force. The contrary (i.e. that the Act has not retroactive force) was not argued in this House and has not been held by any court.

c The machinery which has been used in order to effect the detention of the appellants is set out in a complicated series of provisions in the 1971 Act. I regret that in a matter which affects directly so many individuals, so labyrinthine a path requires to be followed. I shall not attempt to trace its windings, for to do so would obscure the relatively compact points on which the appeals depend. It is sufficient to state d that under paras 9 and 16 (2) of Sch 2—which is introduced through s 4 (2) of the Act —immigration officers have power to authorise detention, pending the giving of directions and pending removal in pursuance of any directions, of 'an illegal entrant'.
The first question therefore is whether these appellants are 'illegal entrants'. Even if they are, however, this is not the end of the matter: for, by virtue of s 1 (2) of the Act, a person is treated as having indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom if, at e the date of the Act coming into force, he is settled there. The second question, therefore, is whether these appellants were 'settled' in the United Kingdom on 1st January 1973. In addition to these main points, there are certain subsidiary points separately invoked on behalf of individual appellants which I will state and deal with later.

f In my opinion all three appellants were, on 1st January 1973, and are, illegal entrants. I have already referred to the definition of this expression: the question depends on whether they entered in breach of the immigration laws. The laws in question include the Commonwealth Immigrants Acts of 1962 and 1968.

g In considering these Acts it is necessary to distinguish between the appellant Sidhu, on the one hand, and the appellants Azam and Khera, on the other. The appellant Sidhu entered clandestinely after being refused entry. By so doing he committed an offence of unlawfully entering and remaining in the United Kingdom under s 4 of the 1962 Act. This offence is expressly stated to be a continuing offence. It was continuing on 31st December 1972. So there is no doubt that he was an illegal entrant:
the contrary was not contended in this House.

h The position of the appellants Azam and Khera is different. They committed no offence under s 4 of the 1962 Act because they never sought permission to enter. In fact nothing in the 1962 Act affected them until the 1968 Act (s 3) amended it by introducing into the former a new s 4A. The relevant portions of s 4A are as follows:

i '(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, if any person being a Commonwealth citizen to whom section 1 of this Act applies lands in the United Kingdom and does not fulfil either of the conditions specified in the next following subsection, he shall be guilty of an offence.

'(2) The conditions referred to in subsection (1) of this section are—(a) that, while on board the ship or aircraft from which he lands in the United Kingdom, he has been examined by an immigration officer; (b) that he lands in accordance with arrangements approved by an immigration officer, and on landing, submits to examination in accordance with those arrangements . . .

'(7) In this section "land" means land from a ship or aircraft . . .'

The section fixed a period of 28 days from the date of landing within which the person concerned was obliged to submit to examination, so that, after the expiry of the 28 days, an offence would be committed if he did not so submit. Any prosecution for this offence must be brought within six months under the general law applicable to summary offences (Magistrates' Courts Act 1952, s 104).

It will be seen that this section did not, as did s 4 of the 1962 Act, create a continuing offence: after the expiry of six months or, it may be, six months and 28 days after an unlawful landing no prosecution could be brought. Nor, it should be added, could any administrative action be taken to remove them. They had acquired, as Lord Widgery CJ has said, some status of irremovability. But the fact that they were irremovable does not mean that their entry was legal.

The question is whether Mr Azam and Mr Khera were illegal entrants as having entered the United Kingdom in breach of the immigration laws. The argument that they were not, rests on a distinction sought to be drawn between 'entering' and 'landing'. The new s 4A, it was said, was a provision of an administrative and limited character whose purpose was to regulate merely the initial step of landing in this country. Once that was accomplished (lawfully or unlawfully), entry into the United Kingdom and remaining there was by virtue of the entrants' constitutional rights as British subjects to enter and remain. This right was not affected by the Act of 1962 or that of 1968. (See *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*¹.)

My Lords, I am unable to accept this distinction. In my opinion, s 4A is not merely an administrative provision if that expression means something without substantive effect on a person's rights. It subjects, as from its coming into effect, the pre-existing right of Commonwealth citizens freely to enter by providing that they must thenceforth do so in a particular manner, failing which their landing is unlawful. In this context there is no distinction between landing and entry, the landing is the entry, and the entry is the landing. I can see no warrant for splitting the process carried out by these appellants into an initial physical act of touching British soil and a later social act of joining the community: any such supposed division would surely astonish the newly arrived as much as it perplexes the lawyer. To suppose that, if a boat arrived clandestinely on a beach conveying these three appellants, Mr Sidhu, who made an attempt to comply with the law, would be an illegal entrant but Mr Azam and Mr Khera, who simply disregarded it or defied it, would not, would attribute a truly arbitrary character to this legislation. In my opinion, all three are 'illegal entrants'.

Then comes the question whether the appellants, or any of them, are to be treated as having indefinite leave to remain. In order to understand this question some more detailed reference to the legislation is required.

Before the 1962 Act, Commonwealth citizens were free to enter and to remain in the United Kingdom as of right. By the 1962 Act, if they arrived at a port of entry, they were required to submit to examination, and entry could be refused. If a man came in clandestinely, without having been refused entry, he committed no offence until the amendment introduced by s 3 of the 1968 Act. Subject to these controls, Commonwealth citizens retained the basic right, as British subjects, to enter and remain in and to leave and re-enter the United Kingdom.

The Immigration Act 1971 introduced as from 1st January 1973 a radical change. British subjects were divided into two categories 'patrials' and others. Patrials, defined in detail in s 2, are free to live in and to come and go into and from the United Kingdom without let or hindrance. Others, which includes, generally, Commonwealth citizens, may 'live, work and settle in the United Kingdom by permission . . .', subject to regulation and control of their entry, stay in and departure.

There were, as Parliament well knew, a large number of Commonwealth citizens in the United Kingdom at the date when the Act came into force. Parliament must have known that many of these persons had entered illegally. It must have known that many of these illegal entrants had been here for a number of years, and had a established themselves in the community by taking employment, acquiring houses, paying taxes and social security contributions. So these cases had to be dealt with. Broadly what Parliament did was to provide that those lawfully here were to be treated as having received indefinite leave to remain. Others, if they did not get permission to remain, and the Act made provision for their doing so, were liable to be removed. The critical question relates to the definition of these categories.

b The relevant provisions (omitting immaterialities) must be set out: s 1 (2) states:

‘... indefinite leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom shall, by virtue of this provision, be treated as having been given under this Act to those in the United Kingdom at its coming into force, if they are then settled there (and not exempt under this Act from the provisions relating to leave to enter or remain).’

c The critical word here is ‘settled’. And it is to be noticed that this section in terms relates to persons already in the United Kingdom when the section came into force.

Section 33 (1) provides that ‘settled’ shall be construed in accordance with s 2 (3) (d), and the latter states that:

d ‘... references to a person being settled in the United Kingdom ... are references to his being ordinarily resident there without being subject under the immigration laws to any restriction on the period for which he may remain.’

‘Ordinarily resident’ is not defined in the Act, so it must be given its normally understood meaning. I think it is clear that, apart from the next provision to be mentioned, all three appellants would be regarded as ‘ordinarily resident’ in the United Kingdom on 1st January 1973. But s 33 (2) declares that:

e ‘... except as otherwise provided in this Act, a person is not to be treated for the purposes of any provision of this Act as ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom ... at a time when he is there in breach of the immigration laws.’

It is on the last 13 words that this point depends.

f There can be no doubt that they prevent the appellant Sidhu from being regarded as ordinarily resident and so from having indefinite leave to remain. As already explained, he was at that date guilty of a continuing offence against s 4 of the 1962 Act. His counsel could not argue that this was not the case. But, again, it was contended that the other two cases (Azam and Khera) were different for the reason already stated—that they were not guilty of any continuing offence. They had, it was true, committed offences against s 4A, but the time limit for prosecution for these offences g had expired: the illegality had ‘dropped away’; they were no longer here in breach of the immigration laws. My Lords, however arbitrary a distinction between the case of Sidhu, on the one hand, and those of Azam and Khera, on the other, might appear to be, your Lordships would, I apprehend, give effect to it if the language of Parliament so directed. For myself, I would be prepared to go further and if there was real doubt to give the two appellants the benefit of it. On 31st December 1972 there were h no administrative means of removing them from the United Kingdom; to apply s 33 (2) against them affects that status, and to some extent affects their liberty. These circumstances call for care in interpretation. But, in my opinion, s 33 (2) admits of no doubt.

j First, as a matter of language. The words ‘at a time when ...’ are at first sight puzzling. But I accept the explanation that they take this form because they had to cover both the case of a continuing breach, and also the case where a person has entered on a condition, or for a limited period, and has broken the condition or outstayed the permission. For these purposes they are appropriate: they do not naturally extend to the case when an admitted breach has ceased to be capable of prosecution; and since they carry a natural and explicable meaning, there is no call to strain them to a meaning they naturally do not bear. So everything depends on the words which follow ‘when he is there in breach of the immigration laws’. These do not, in my opinion, require that there should be subsisting a breach in respect of which sanctions may be imposed. The words are not 'when he is committing a breach': the emphasis is on 'there'. They are apt, if not ideal, to cover the case of a person whose presence there arises from a breach—indeed to cover any case of an illegal entrant. They apply just as much to an illegal entrant as to a person whose presence originally lawful has come to be unlawful. To say, as the appellants must, that a man may be an illegal entrant, because he entered the United Kingdom in breach of the immigration laws, and yet may not be there in breach of the immigration laws is too subtle an argument for me to accept.

But I would not wish to decide this point on a dry interpretation of the words alone. It is necessary to try to understand the Parliamentary intention. In search of this I can find no warrant for introducing a class of persons whose presence was once illegal, but whose illegality has 'dropped away'. If Parliament had intended to confer an indirect amnesty of this kind, it would surely have done so by express words. If the presence here was once 'in breach of the immigration laws' I find difficulty in seeing how, unless Parliament so states, it could change its quality by the mere expiry of a time fixed for summary prosecution.

I would further test the present cases by considering the groups of persons present in the United Kingdom on 1st January 1973, with whom Parliament must have intended to deal. These included (there may be other cases) (i) Commonwealth citizens who arrived before the period of control—i.e. before the 1962 Act; (ii) Commonwealth citizens who arrived after the 1962 Act and before the 1968 Act but otherwise than through ports of entry: until the 1968 amendment these persons were not in breach of any immigration laws; (iii) Commonwealth citizens admitted unconditionally under the pre-1973 control procedure. All of these persons were clearly intended to benefit from s 1 (2) and to be treated as having indefinite leave to remain.

On the other side, there are (i) persons who entered unlawfully after a refusal (such as the appellant Sidhu), (ii) persons whose original entry was lawful but who have remained unlawfully, because the conditions in which they entered have not been complied with. Such persons, however long they have been in the United Kingdom, are evidently excluded from those deemed to have leave to remain. If one asks into which category the Parliamentary scheme places persons in the position of the appellants Azam and Khera, there can be only one answer. They must come within the second.

The argument was used, understandably enough, that a construction of the Act ought not to be accepted which would expose persons who had established themselves long ago in this country to the hardship of uprooting and removal elsewhere. I sympathise with this argument (though I note that if it is valid it applies however short the period of unlawful residence once the six months period has elapsed) but there are answers to it. In the first place, the 1971 Act provides (s 3) for leave to remain being applied for and granted. In the second place, although the procedure of detention can be applied—and I do not wish to minimise the unpleasantness of this—the decision whether to remove or not is made by the Secretary of State. I have no doubt that in exercising his discretion he will give full weight to the record of each case and to human factors. It must not be overlooked what the character of this legislation is. It is concerned with the control of immigration into an overcrowded island: persons who have slipped in outside the controls may well make it more difficult for others to come in. So it is not unreasonable that persons who came in illegally in this way should be denied an automatic right to remain indefinitely and should have the opportunity of applying for leave to remain, and in the final resort should have to have their cases considered on a balance of merits and in relation to other cases by the Secretary of State.

For all these reasons I would hold that the appellants are not able to make good either of their two main points.

a It remains to refer to some special contentions put forward by learned counsel, in discharge of their duty, for individual appellants. I deal with these briefly since they have not found favour with any of the learned judges below.

b (1) For the appellant Azam it was contended that he must be presumed to have been granted leave to remain under s 34 (2) of the 1971 Act. This subsection, as I understand it, means that a Commonwealth citizen given leave to enter by virtue of the 1962 or 1968 Acts is treated as having been given leave to enter under the 1971 Act. Such a person (by s 34 (3)) is treated as having indefinite leave. However, the appellant Azam (and the same is true of the appellant Khera) had nothing 'by virtue of' either previous Act, so that this subsection does not avail him.

c (2) For the appellant Khera, two points were argued. The first can be stated in this way. It was admitted (contrary to the contention put forward on behalf of the appellant Azam) that presence in the United Kingdom originally established in breach of s 4A of the 1962 Act remained unlawful notwithstanding expiry of the period of prosecution. But this character of unlawfulness could be waived so as to permit a person to be treated as ordinarily resident otherwise than in breach of the immigration laws. It was said to have been waived in the appellant Khera's case. Whether or not this argument is soundly based in law, I am of opinion that it wholly fails on the facts. The fact said to give rise to the waiver was the statement by a police officer in d January 1972 (to which I have referred) that there would be no further police action and that the full circumstances had been reported to the Home Office. I can interpret this as doing no more than referring to the indisputable fact that no prosecution could be brought against the appellant. It had nothing to do with the quality of his residence: the statement itself, by reference to the Home Office, signifies the contrary.

e The second point is even less substantial. It was said that the action of the immigration officer, in authorising the detention of the appellant, was invalid, because he had failed to consider, or enquire into, the essential question whether the appellant had been given leave to remain.

f In the first place, I do not accept that the immigration officer had any duty to enquire whether the appellant, an illegal entrant, had been given such leave. But whether he had or not, the evidence of the immigration officer makes it clear that the appellant had every opportunity, which he did not take, of asserting that he had leave to remain. The contention fails in fact and in law.

g (3) For the appellant Sidhu, reliance was placed on s 34 (4) of the 1971 Act which states that the Act shall not apply (b) in relation to removal from the United Kingdom and matters connected therewith (including detention pending removal) in any case where a person is to be removed in pursuance of a decision taken before the coming into force of the Act. The refusal to admit this appellant was said to have been such a decision. The validity or otherwise of this contention does not depend on a distinction, sought to be drawn, between 'in pursuance of' and 'in consequence of' but on the nature of the 'decision' there referred to. It is quite clear from a reference back to s 34 (4) (a) that the decision in question is an unimplemented decision, made before the Act, to deport or remove. No such decision had been made against this h appellant before the Act came into force: he was detained in pursuance of a decision made after that date.

I would dismiss each of the appeals.

i LORD HODSON. My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce. I agree that these appeals should be dismissed for the reasons given by him.

LORD PEARSON. My Lords, before the passing of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962 every Commonwealth citizen had the right at common law to enter the United Kingdom without let or hindrance when and where he pleased and to remain as long as he liked: see *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*¹. But as there was a continuing flow of immigrants from Commonwealth countries into the United Kingdom, which was already densely populated, steps to control the immigration were taken by that Act. As appears from its long title and s 5 (1) it was intended originally as a temporary Act to make 'temporary provision' for controlling such immigration and, though in fact its duration was prolonged by Parliament, its original temporary character helps to account for the incompleteness of the control which it introduced. As Lord Diplock said in *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*²:

'The inference from this is that the method of control enacted was intended to be experimental. Parliament was to have an opportunity of seeing how it worked.'

The gap in the control arrangements, which has been called 'the Bhagwan gap' because its existence was affirmed in *Director of Public Prosecutions v Bhagwan*³ arose in this way. Under s 3 of the Act and paras 1 and 10 of Sch 1, a Commonwealth citizen to whom the Act applied landing in the United Kingdom from a 'ship' (as widely defined) or an aircraft could within 24 hours of his landing be required by an immigration officer to submit to examination. Under ss 2 and 3 (1) (b) of the Act and para 2 of Sch 1, the immigration officer then had power, within 12 hours after the examination, to give notice refusing the Commonwealth citizen admission into the United Kingdom or admitting him subject to conditions. If the immigration officer refused admission, he could under s 3 (1) (c) of the Act and para 3 of Sch 1 give directions for the removal of the Commonwealth citizen from the United Kingdom. Also if the Commonwealth citizen, having been refused admission, entered the United Kingdom, he was under s 4 of the Act guilty of an offence which continued while he was in the United Kingdom and under s 14 he was liable on summary conviction to be fined, or imprisoned. The six months limitation under s 104 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952 would not operate to bar a prosecution because the offence was continuing. He could, therefore, be prosecuted at any time while he remained in the United Kingdom, and, if he was convicted and recommended by the court for deportation under s 7 of the 1962 Act, a deportation order could be made by the Secretary of State under s 9. Thus, in the case of a person who had been refused admission, even if the time for giving directions for removal had passed by, there might still be a prosecution and conviction leading to deportation. In the case of a person admitted subject to conditions, if he remained in the United Kingdom in breach of a condition, there was (apart from the special provisions of Part II of Sch 1 relative to seamen and stowaways) no power for the immigration officer to give directions for removal of such a person, but he could be prosecuted at any time under ss 4 and 14 for the continuing offence, and if he was convicted and recommended by the court for deportation under s 7 a deportation order could be made by the Secretary of State under s 9.

The immigration control under the 1962 Act seems to have been reasonably effective in any case where the necessary first step was taken, that is to say where the Commonwealth citizen was within 24 hours after landing required by the immigration officer to submit to examination. If that necessary first step was not taken, no other steps could follow. Thus, if a Commonwealth citizen landed on a deserted beach and kept out of the way of immigration officers for 24 hours after landing he could not thereafter be required to submit to examination, and therefore, as that essential first step could not be taken, none of the subsequent steps could be taken, and he was not liable to be removed or deported from the United Kingdom (unless he committed and was convicted of some other criminal offence for which he might be imprisoned). That was the gap in the control arrangements.

a The gap was narrowed but not fully closed by the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1968, and s 16 of the Immigration Appeals Act 1969. The 1968 Act made a number of amendments in the 1962 Act and in particular by s 3 it inserted a new s 4A, of which the first two subsections provided:

b '(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, if any person being a Commonwealth citizen to whom section 1 of this Act applies lands in the United Kingdom and does not fulfil either of the conditions specified in the next following subsection, he shall be guilty of an offence.

c '(2) The conditions referred to in subsection (1) of this section are—(a) that, while on board the ship, or aircraft from which he lands in the United Kingdom, he has been examined by an immigration officer; (b) that he lands in accordance with arrangements approved by an immigration officer, and on landing, submits to examination in accordance with those arrangements.'

Section 4 of the 1968 Act amended para 1 (2) of Sch 1 to the 1962 Act by increasing from 24 hours to 28 days the time after landing within which a Commonwealth citizen could be required to submit to examination.

d These provisions did not make the control arrangements complete. It was under s 4A now an offence for a Commonwealth citizen to land in the United Kingdom and not to submit to examination, and there was now a period of 28 days within which he could be required by the immigration officer to submit to examination. But if in fact he did not submit to examination, then (a) as there was no refusal of admission, there was no power for the immigration officer to give directions for removal, and (b) when the six months period for prosecution had expired, as the offence under e s 4A had not been made a continuing offence there was no possibility of a prosecution for this offence leading to conviction and a recommendation and order for deportation. Those Commonwealth citizens who landed clandestinely on deserted beaches and were able to escape detection until the 28 days for requiring examination and the six months for prosecution under s 4A had expired, could not be removed or deported unless convicted of some other offences.

f Section 16 of the 1969 Act empowered the Secretary of State to make a deportation order, not based on a conviction and court recommendation, against a Commonwealth citizen who had been conditionally admitted and had failed to comply with the conditions—subject to an exception if the Commonwealth citizen had been ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom for at least five years. This simplified the procedure but did not radically alter the position.

g Clandestine immigration was not difficult. The person concerned could be landed on a deserted beach and transported in the back of a van to an inland destination. It was common knowledge, or at any rate a widespread popular belief, that clandestine immigration had been and still was taking place on a substantial scale. There was a distinction between two classes of clandestine immigrants. Those who, not having h been refused admission, made their secret entry before the coming into force of the 1968 Act (which was on 9th March 1968) had the benefit of the full 'Bhagwan gap': they lawfully avoided the control, committing no offence. Those who made their secret entry after the coming into force of 1968 Act committed an offence against the new s 4A. If they escaped detection for long enough they became immune from prosecution and deportation for that offence, but, as a matter of ordinary language without statutory definition, they were illegal entrants and they were present in the United Kingdom in breach of the immigration laws. The class of illegal entrants would also j include a person such as the appellant Sidhu who made his secret entry before the coming into force of the 1968 Act but after having been refused admission.

Those were features of the situation with which Parliament had to deal in enacting the Immigration Act 1971. How, then, did Parliament in the 1971 Act deal with the two classes of clandestine immigrants? I do not think there is any real doubt as to the answer to this question. The most material provisions of the 1971 Act are ss 1 (1) and (2), 2 (1) and (3) (d), 4 (2), the definition of 'illegal entrant', 'immigration laws', and 'settled' in ss 33 (1), (2), 34 (1) (a) and paras 9 and 16 of Sch 2. a

The first class, those who in the period before the coming into force of the 1968 Act entered clandestinely but without committing any offence, are protected. They are not 'illegal entrants' into the United Kingdom and also they are ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom and not 'there in breach of the immigration laws' and therefore 'settled' and entitled to the indefinite leave to remain under s 1 (2). The second class, those whose clandestine entry was in breach of s 4A of the 1962 Act as amended by the 1968 Act (or in breach of s 4 of the 1962 Act if they had previously been refused admission) are, in my opinion, 'illegal entrants' to the United Kingdom and 'there in breach of the immigration laws' within the meaning of s 33 (2) and, therefore, not 'settled' and not entitled to the indefinite leave to remain under s 1 (2). Those who when they landed failed to comply with s 4A were illegal entrants because the landing was or formed part of their entry into the United Kingdom. They have been from the beginning and still are in the United Kingdom in breach of the immigration laws: that is a continuing status, as no leave to remain has been given. b

I have had the advantage of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, and I agree with it. For the reasons given by him and for those which I have indicated I would dismiss these appeals. c

LORD KILBRANDON. My Lords, I also have had the opportunity of reading the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce. I agree that these appeals should be dismissed for the reasons given by him. d

LORD SALMON. My Lords, it is generally considered unjust that a statute dealing with substantive rights should operate retrospectively. Hence the rule that such a statute will not be construed as having retrospective effect unless the language of the statute expressly or by necessary implication makes it clear that the legislation intended it to have such an effect: see Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes¹, *Phillips v Eyre*², *Ingle v Farrand*³. e

Prior to the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962 Commonwealth citizens, like all other British subjects, had unrestricted rights under the common law to live and work and remain in the United Kingdom. They also had ancillary unrestricted rights to enter the United Kingdom. That Act was passed as a temporary experimental measure to control immigration. It had become necessary to control immigration because the number of Commonwealth immigrants coming to the United Kingdom was so large that serious social and economic difficulties arose in absorbing them into the community. Section 2 of the Act gave an immigration officer power, in certain circumstances, to refuse a Commonwealth immigrant admission into the United Kingdom or to admit him subject to conditions. Section 4 of the Act made it a continuing offence for a Commonwealth citizen to enter or remain in the United Kingdom otherwise than in accordance with the directions or under the authority of an immigration officer while a refusal of admission under s 2 of the Act was in force in relation to him or to contravene or fail to comply with any condition imposed on him by an immigration officer under the Act. Anyone, however, who entered this country otherwise than at a recognised port of entry could not be refused admission or have any condition imposed on him by an immigration officer because he would not meet one. Accordingly such a person would not be committing a breach of the Act by entering or remaining here. He could lawfully enter and remain by virtue of his ordinary common law rights. a A large number of Commonwealth immigrants took advantage of this gap in the 1962 Act by avoiding recognised ports of entry. They usually came here in small boats, landing at night on lonely parts of the coast. They thus encountered no immigration officers. In order to deal with these cases, the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1968 was passed, which by s 3 introduced a new section into the 1962 Act, namely, s 4A. This new section made it an offence, but not a continuing offence, for a Commonwealth citizen to land in the United Kingdom unless he submitted himself to examination by an immigration officer whilst on board the ship or aircraft from which he landed, and landed in accordance with arrangements approved by an immigration officer. That section, unlike s 4, did not take away the right to be or remain in the United Kingdom but only restricted the right to enter thus putting difficulties in the way of being and remaining in the United Kingdom. Save insofar as the 1962 Act (as amended) restricted the common law rights of Commonwealth citizens to enter or took away the right to be or remain in the United Kingdom, those rights were preserved intact. If a Commonwealth citizen committed a breach of s 4A he was not subject to detention by the executive, nor to being deported otherwise than after conviction. If, however, he were convicted of an offence under that section or, with certain immaterial exceptions, of any other offence for which he was liable to imprisonment, the court convicting him had power to recommend him for deportation and the Home Secretary then, but only then, had power to order him to be deported.

d All the appellants are Commonwealth citizens. The appellants Azam and Khera came to this country in small boats and landed at a lonely part of the coast in January 1970 and December 1968, respectively. They have remained here ever since without ever submitting themselves for examination by an immigration officer. The appellant Sidhu arrived here in a similar fashion in January 1968 after having twice previously been refused admission by an immigration officer at a recognised port of entry. The appellants Azam and Khera accordingly committed offences only under s 4A, which were not continuing offences and affected only the right to enter, whilst the appellant Sidhu (with whose case I shall later deal separately) committed an offence under s 4 which was a continuing offence and affected his right to be in the United Kingdom as well as his right to enter. The appellants Azam and Khera could not be prosecuted for their offences under s 4A (being summary offences) after the end of six months from the time when those offences were committed (Magistrates' Courts Act 1952, s 104). Accordingly, from about the middle of 1970 the appellant Azam was immune from prosecution and deportation under the 1962 Act and the appellant Khera was likewise immune from about the middle of 1969. Ever since those dates they have been resident in this country. They have behaved and worked well and have been highly commended by their employers. Soon after 1st January 1973 when the Immigration Act 1971 came into force, they were thrown into prison on the authority of the chief immigration officer and have remained there ever since awaiting the decision of the Home Secretary whether or not they are to be deported. They applied for writs of habeas corpus, claiming that their detention was unlawful. It is argued on behalf of the Crown that their detention in prison is justified by the provisions of the Immigration Act 1971. The Divisional Court refused the applications for habeas corpus and the Court of Appeal¹, Buckley LJ dissenting, dismissed appeals from those decisions. They now appeal to this House. I should add that the decision of the Home Secretary has very naturally been deferred pending the final outcome of the appellants' applications.

j For some years prior to January 1973 the appellants Azam and Khera had been residing here without any risk of being prosecuted in the courts or interfered with by the executive under the law as it then was. It is true that the breaches of s 4A which they had committed on landing in this country had rendered them liable to prosecution which might have resulted in a recommendation for deportation but, as already indicated, the time during which they might have been prosecuted had long since expired. a

I agree that the 1971 Act may have been retrospective in its effect and that subject to the appellants Azam and Khera being 'settled' here on 1st January 1973 within the meaning of s 1 (2) of the Act, their present detention is lawful and the Home Secretary may make an order and all necessary arrangements for them being sent back from whence they came. There are, of course, many others in the same position as the appellants Azam and Khera. Indeed, we have been told that this is a test case. b
There can be no doubt that the 1971 Act may give the executive power to deprive many of these of their liberty because of an offence long past which at the time it was committed conferred no such power on the executive. Whether or not an Act should be retrospective in its effect is a matter for the decision of Parliament alone. It depends essentially on legislative policy—something with which neither the courts nor this House, sitting in its judicial capacity, are in any way concerned. c
I feel bound, however, to express concern that the draftsmen of this Act should have chosen to achieve its retrospective effect through a labyrinth of verbiage which may well have been as perplexing to many of those who had to consider it in Parliament as it undoubtedly was to those whom it may have deprived of their constitutional rights.

It is not until you turn to paras 8 to 16 of Sch 2 to the Act that you find the first clue that the Act may give a new power to the Home Secretary to give directions for the removal of persons who have in the past entered the United Kingdom in breach of s 4A of the 1962 Act and a new power to an immigration officer to authorise the detention of such persons pending the giving of such directions by the Home Secretary. Paragraph 9 is the critical paragraph and reads as follows: d

'Where an illegal entrant is not given leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom, an immigration officer may give any such directions in respect of him as in a case within paragraph 8 above are authorised by paragraph 8 (1). e

At first sight anyone might be forgiven for thinking that this paragraph is referring to persons entering illegally after the Act comes into force. If, however, you refer to s 33 (1) which is the interpretation section you find: f

'... "entrant" means a person entering or seeking to enter the United Kingdom, and "illegal entrant" means a person unlawfully entering or seeking to enter in breach of a deportation order or of the immigration laws, and includes also a person who has so entered ...'

Again, it would be natural to assume that the words I have emphasised refer to a person who has entered after the Act came into force and 'the immigration laws' mean those laws contained in the Act. If, however, you pursue your study of s 33 you will find: g

'... "immigration laws" means this Act and any law for purposes similar to this Act which is for the time being or has (before or after the passing of this Act) been in force in any part of the United Kingdom ...' h

Accordingly, I am driven to the conclusion that subject to s 1 (2) of the Act, by necessary implication the powers conferred in paras 8 to 16 of Sch 2 may be exercised retrospectively in respect of Commonwealth immigrants who before the 1971 Act came into operation entered the United Kingdom in breach of s 4A of the 1962 Act, but had been lawfully residing there for years, without let or hindrance and free from fear of removal. It would surely have been easier, far more satisfactory and fairer to have made this plain by express language in one of the main sections of the Act. It is impossible to ignore the danger that the unnecessarily circuitous and complicated fashion in which the power to act retrospectively was conferred (if it was conferred by the Act) may have concealed the very existence of that power. j a My Lords, notwithstanding the interesting argument to the contrary, in my opinion, the appellants Azam and Khera were clearly 'illegal entrants' within the meaning of those words in the 1971 Act. It seems to me that the distinction which counsel for the appellant Azam seeks to draw between (a) the word 'entered' in s 4 of the 1962 Act and 'entrant' in s 33 of the 1971 Act and (b) the word 'lands' in s 4A of the 1962 Act is a distinction without a difference for present purposes. I recognise that anyone who disembarks at a recognised port of entry, is refused admission by an immigration officer and is then sent back from whence he came would undoubtedly have landed but may well be said not to have entered the United Kingdom. When, however, a man steps ashore from a small boat on a lonely part of the coast and proceeds inland he has surely entered the United Kingdom and his landing on the shore is necessarily an integral part of his entry.

b I agree, therefore, that the appellants Azam and Khera are now lawfully detained and may be deported unless indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom is to be treated as having been given to them under s 1 (2) of the 1971 Act at the time of its coming into force. This depends on whether they were then 'settled' in the United Kingdom within the meaning of that word in s 1 (2). The word 'settled' means ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom: see s 2 (3) (d) of the 1971 Act. Whether a person is ordinarily resident in a country is a question of fact. No one suggests that, according to the natural meaning of those words, the undisputed evidence shows that both the appellants Azam and Khera were ordinarily resident here on 1st January 1973 and had been so resident for some years. This would seem to resolve the appeal in favour of the appellants Azam and Khera. And so it clearly would but for s 33 (2) which, so far as material, reads:

e 'It is hereby declared that, except as otherwise provided in this Act, a person is not to be treated for the purposes of any provision of this Act as ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom . . . at a time when he is there in breach of the immigration laws.'

f The result of this appeal can, therefore, be seen to turn on whether during the years in which the appellants Azam and Khera were residing and working in the United Kingdom they were there 'in breach of the immigration laws'. I agree with Buckley LJ that they were not. In my view, in spite of having committed a breach of s 4A of the 1962 Act they were here in pursuance of their common law rights, untouched by that Act, to be here as Commonwealth citizens—rights which they enjoyed as British subjects up to 1st January 1973. It is true that as from that date their common law rights were taken away. From then on, a man was either a patrial or a non-patrial. Commonwealth citizens were non-patrials and in much the same position as aliens. They had no right to enter or remain in the United Kingdom without leave (see ss 1 (2) and 3 (1) of the 1971 Act). Even after leave was given, or treated as having been given, they could still be deported under s 3 (5) and (6), subject to the provisions of s 7 of the 1971 Act. Sections 1 (2) and 3 (1) are not, however, retrospective. Those sections do not affect what is vital to this appeal, namely, the status or constitutional rights which Commonwealth citizens had enjoyed prior to 1st January 1973. Those rights included the right to enter and remain here save insofar as any of those rights were taken away by the 1962 Act.

h The only section of that Act affecting the appellants Azam and Khera was s 4A. That section regulated the manner in which they should exercise their common law rights of entry. It did not purport to take away those rights or the right to be or remain here. If they entered in breach of the section (as they undoubtedly did) then, as Buckley LJ has so aptly said, all the section did was to impose a discouraging penalty. Their method of landing and entering constituted an offence but it was not a continuing offence. It was complete at the time of landing or entry. It was then that they committed the breach. They were not committing a breach of s 4A at any time thereafter.

I cannot, with respect, agree that they had only acquired a 'de facto status of irremovability'. Indeed, I find some difficulty in understanding the concept of such a status. Either you have a legal right to remain or you are under a legal liability to be removed. Their status of irremovability was, in my view, clearly de jure. They could not lawfully have been detained or removed by the executive. After the lapse of six months they could not have been prosecuted or recommended for deportation unless they had committed some other offence which was punishable by imprisonment. They had the legal right to live here and go free; and that right would have been vindicated by the courts. Had they been detained in prison pending deportation, they could have applied to the courts for habeas corpus as they have done now. There would then have been no answer to such an application. All this may be considered by some to constitute another gap in the 1962 Act. But if so, it is not a gap which can now be filled by considering into which category of person the appellants Azam and Khera ought to be placed, whether they ought to be placed in that category of persons which includes amongst others those who came here clandestinely prior to 1968 and who are treated as having indefinite leave to remain here under s 1 (2) of the 1971 Act or whether they ought to be placed in that category of persons such as those who came here in breach of s 4 of the 1962 Act and are clearly excluded from those deemed to have leave to remain. The question is not into which category ought they to be placed—a question about which there may be differing views—but whether the legislature by express words or necessary implication has placed them in the second category. I read the words in s 33 (2) of the 1971 Act, 'at a time when he is there in breach of the immigration laws' as only meaning whilst committing a breach and not as also meaning after having committed a breach or in consequence of having committed a breach of the immigration laws. If the legislature had intended it to have the latter meanings as well as the former it would surely have said so in plain English. The language of s 33 (2) is at least as consistent with the restricted meaning which I attribute to it as with the extended meaning for which the Crown contends. It is because this subsection affects the liberty of the subject by cutting down his basic constitutional rights, that I consider that it should be confined to the restricted meaning. So construed, the appellants Azam and Khera, were clearly 'settled' in the United Kingdom and must be treated as having been given indefinite leave to remain there at the time when the Act came into force.

I do not consider that the fact that the 1971 legislation is not criminal in character affords any reason for giving s 33 (2) an extended meaning. If that legislation had created criminal offences, it would, at any rate, have given the appellants Azam and Khera the protection that they could not have been deported except on the recommendation of a court of law. As far as they are concerned, if s 33 (2) is given an extended meaning, the Act did something far worse than creating a criminal offence. It imposed on them the liability to be imprisoned and deported by the executive in place of the right which they had previously enjoyed to live here and go free.

To give s 33 (2) an extended meaning would enable the executive, in the future, to seize and imprison a Commonwealth citizen, long resident in this country and leading a blameless life, because of a summary offence which he had committed in the distant past and for which he had for years been immune from prosecution or for which he may long ago have been tried, convicted and punished. It seems incongruous to describe such a man as being here in breach of the immigration laws. If such a man can properly be so described then he could be kept in prison pending consideration of whether or not he should be deported. He might then have his whole life and that of his family uprooted by being in fact deported. At best, he would be detained in prison for as long as it might take the Home Office to reach a decision. It is not unreasonable to suppose that this might take weeks or even longer. The construction of the subsection which I favour would make this interference with individual liberty impossible. I certainly do not share the view that there is no harm in construing a statute so widely that it gives the executive such a power because the executive can be relied on not to use it or, if they do, to use it fairly.

a If s 33 (2) is confined to its restricted meaning, the 1971 Act confers no power on the executive now to imprison or deport anyone in the position of the appellants Azam and Khera. It is not for us to speculate why Parliament should have distinguished between the consequences of a breach of s 4 and the consequence of a breach of s 4A. Parliament undoubtedly did so in 1968 and, as I think, did so again in 1971.

b To give s 33 (2) its restricted meaning certainly curtails the retrospective effect of the statute. It could not then be applied retrospectively in derogation of the liberty enjoyed by those in the position of the appellants Azam and Khera. Its language is certainly not ideal nor, in my view, apt, expressly or by necessary implication, to include such persons within its ambit.

c I, of course, recognise the importance in the public interest of giving the executive the widest powers effectively to control immigration. Whatever may have been the shortcomings of the previous legislation, the 1971 Act undoubtedly does confer those powers on the executive for the future. By s 3 (5) and (6) it also gives the executive power, in appropriate circumstances, to deport any non-patrial, including, of course, persons who have committed a breach of s 4A of the 1962 Act. No question, however, arises in the present case under that section of the Act.

d The following illustration may be of some assistance in considering the true construction of s 33 (2). A has recently become a member of the House of Lords and has been duly introduced. As a result he has a constitutional right to enter the Chamber and to vote. For security reasons, a regulation having the force of law is promulgated making it an offence to enter the Chamber without first producing a pass to the attendant on duty. It does not, however, take away his constitutional right to be there or to vote. A, who has mislaid his pass, pushes past the attendant who does not recognise him and enters the House. He takes his seat and votes. Surely he is not in the Chamber and does not vote in breach of the law. He is there lawfully and lawfully records his vote in accordance with his constitutional rights although in entering he committed a breach of the law for which he is no doubt answerable. The constitutional right to reside in this country which the appellants Azam and Khera, as British subjects, enjoyed up to 1st January 1973 were surely no less than the constitutional rights which any member of this House enjoys to sit and vote here.

f The appellant Sidhu was not, however, settled here when the 1971 Act came into force because he had committed the continuing offence under s 4 of entering and remaining in the United Kingdom while a refusal of admission under s 2 of the 1962 Act was in force in relation to him. That offence was deemed under the section to be an offence which continued throughout the period during which he was in the United Kingdom. Accordingly, for the whole time during which he resided in the United Kingdom he was 'there in breach of the immigration laws' on any reading of s 33 (2).

g I agree with my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, that for the reasons which he gives none of the other points argued on behalf of any of the appellants can succeed.

h My Lords, I would therefore dismiss the appeal of the appellant Sidhu, but for the reasons I have already indicated, I would allow the appeal of the appellants Azam and Khera.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

7th MARCH 1973

Criminal law – Theft – Handling stolen goods – Informations charging defendant with theft and handling stolen goods – Informations relating to the same goods – Goods stolen – Defendant found in possession of goods – Defendant having come by goods dishonestly and intending to keep them – No evidence as to how goods came into defendant's possession – Whether defendant should be convicted of theft or handling – Theft Act 1968, ss 1 (1), 3 (1), 22 (1).

The respondent was charged on an information alleging that he had dishonestly received a driving licence, knowing or believing that it had been stolen, contrary to s 22 (1)^a of the Theft Act 1968. Subsequently a further information was preferred against the respondent by the same prosecutor alleging the theft of the same driving licence, contrary to s 1 (1)^b of the 1968 Act. The trial proceeded and the magistrate heard the informations together on the basis that the charges were alternative ones. The magistrate found (i) that the licence had been stolen, (ii) that subsequently the respondent was found in possession of the licence, and (iii) that he had come by it dishonestly and that he intended to keep it. The evidence was, however, inconclusive as to how the respondent had come into possession of the licence. Accordingly the magistrate dismissed both informations on the basis that, although he was satisfied that the respondent was guilty of one offence or the other, the prosecutor had failed to discharge the onus of satisfying him which offence it was that the respondent had committed. On appeal,

Held – As it had been found as a fact that the respondent had dishonestly possessed himself of the licence and intended to keep it, it followed that he had dishonestly assumed a right to the licence 'by keeping or dealing with it as owner' within s 3 (1)^c of the 1968 Act; he had therefore dishonestly appropriated property belonging to another with the intention of permanently depriving the other of it within s 1 (1). He should therefore have been convicted of theft. Accordingly the appeal would be allowed and the case remitted with a direction to convict (see p 784 g to j, post).

This was an appeal by way of case stated by John Phipps Esq, one of Her Majesty's metropolitan stipendiary magistrates, in respect of his adjudication at Marylebone Magistrates' Court on 22nd August 1972.

1. On 8th April 1972 an information was preferred at Marylebone Magistrates' Court by the appellant, Robert Stapylton, against the respondent, William Patrick

^a Section 22 (1) provides: 'A person handles stolen goods if (otherwise than in the course of the stealing) knowing or believing them to be stolen goods he dishonestly receives the goods, or dishonestly undertakes or assists in their retention, removal, disposal or realisation by or for the benefit of another person, or if he arranges to do so.'

^b Section 1 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 784 e, post

a O'Callaghan, that on or before 8th April 1972 in the Greater London area he dishonestly handled stolen goods in that he received one stolen driving licence no 6A/1670956, knowing or believing it to be stolen goods, contrary to s 22 of the Theft Act 1968.

2. On 5th June 1972 a further information was preferred at the Marylebone Magistrates' Court by the appellant against the respondent that on or before 8th April 1972 in the Greater London area he stole a driving licence no 6A/1670956, value 25p, the property of Raymond Mitchell, contrary to s 1 of the Theft Act 1968.

b 3. On 22nd August 1972 the magistrate proceeded to the summary trial of both informations after the provisions of s 19 (2) to (5) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952 had been complied with. The respondent agreed to the informations being tried together.

4. The trial was conducted on the basis that the two informations were alternative. No point of law was taken or argued before the magistrate.

c 5. At the conclusion of the trial the only facts which the magistrate was able to find in view of the inconclusiveness of the evidence were: (a) that on 6th April 1972, at some time before 6 p.m., the flat at 22 Enford Street, W1, at which one Raymond Mitchell lived, was broken into and his driving licence no 6A/1670956, together with other property, was stolen; (b) that, when spoken to by a police officer at about 1.20 a.m. on 8th April 1972 at Viceroy Court, NW8, in connection with another matter, the respondent was in possession of the driving licence, that he had come by it dishonestly and that he intended to keep it; (c) that when questioned by the police officer outside Viceroy Court as to his possession of the driving licence, the respondent gave two contradictory explanations, the first being that the licence belonged to a friend who had lent it to him in the Arcade in Edgware Road, W2, and the second that he, the respondent, had found the driving licence near the Arcade at about 6 p.m. on 7th April 1972.

e 6. The evidence put before the magistrate, including the evidence given by the respondent himself in which he adhered to and amplified the second of the explanations, was inconclusive as to how in fact the respondent had come into possession of the licence. In spite of the respondent's evidence the magistrate was not satisfied that it was the truth that he had found the licence, although it may have been so. Equally f the first explanation given by the respondent to the police officer that he had acquired the licence from someone else, which appeared to have been the basis on which the first information was preferred, may have been the truth but the magistrate was not satisfied that it was. Further the magistrate was unable to exclude the possibility that neither account given by the respondent of his possession of the licence was true and that in fact he had dishonestly acquired it in some other way altogether.

g 7. The magistrate was of the opinion therefore that, although he was satisfied that the respondent had committed one or other of the offences charged in the informations, since the prosecution had not discharged the onus of satisfying him as to which offence the respondent had committed it was not open to him to convict the respondent of either offence. Accordingly he dismissed both informations.

h The question on which the opinion of the High Court was desired was whether, in view of the fact that the prosecution had not proved the truth of either information, the magistrate was right in dismissing them both. If he was not right, the High Court was asked to revise or amend the determination and decision, or remit the matter to him with the opinion of the court thereon.

j The respondent did not appear and was not represented.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by one of Her Majesty's metropolitan stipendiary magistrates sitting at Marylebone, who on 5th June 1972 had before him an information laid by the appellant against the respondent that the respondent in the Greater London area on 8th April 1972 handled stolen goods in that he received one stolen driving licence knowing or believing it to be stolen, contrary to s 22 of the Theft Act 1968. There was also before the magistrate on the same occasion a later information laid by the appellant against the respondent that on the date in question, namely 8th April 1972, he stole the particular driving licence of which he had been charged with handling in the earlier information.

The magistrate heard both informations together; he says that the trial was conducted on the basis that the two informations of stealing and handling were alternative, and that at the conclusion of the trial he found these facts (a) that on 6th April 1972 at some time before 6 p m a flat at 22 Enford Street was broken into and the driving licence in question in these proceedings was stolen, with other property, that is at 6 p m on 6th April. He finds secondly that on 8th April 1972 at 1.20 a m, when spoken to by a police officer in connection with another matter, the respondent was in possession of this very driving licence, and the magistrate finds as a fact 'that the respondent had come by it dishonestly and that he intended to keep it'. During the interview between the respondent and the appellant in the early hours of the morning of 8th April, the respondent seems to have given two conflicting explanations of how he came by this licence. The first was that it belonged to a friend who had lent it to him, and the second was that he found it the night before. The magistrate was troubled about this case, and it is quite evident what his trouble was. He thought he had to regard these two charges as not only alternative but mutually exclusive, and on his view of the facts as he found them he was not able to say with any confidence whether the offence committed had been the theft or the handling. He concluded, as one must conclude, on these things, that the respondent was guilty of one offence or the other but being unable to decide to his own satisfaction which offence was the appropriate one, he decided that the charges against the respondent must both be dismissed.

In my opinion there is really a very short answer to this problem, and that is that if one looks at the definition of 'theft' to start with in s 1 of the Theft Act 1968, it reads as follows: '(1) A person is guilty of theft if he dishonestly appropriates property belonging to another with the intention of permanently depriving the other of it', and 'appropriates' is defined in s 3 (1) in these terms:

'Any assumption by a person of the rights of an owner amounts to an appropriation, and this includes, where he has come by the property (innocently or not) without stealing it, any later assumption of a right to it by keeping or dealing with it as owner.'

It seems to me that the findings which I have already read amply justify a conviction of theft, because the magistrate has found that the respondent dishonestly possessed himself of the licence and intended to keep it. That seems clearly to me to be a dishonest appropriation of property belonging to another with the intention of permanently depriving the other of it. At that point one may stop, as it were, and draw a line and say the offence of theft is complete.

Of course, if one looks on to s 22, which is the section charging handling, one finds that activities such as described here if committed otherwise than in the course of stealing may be caught by s 22, and understandably attract a more severe penalty, but if the facts justify the conclusion that the offence of stealing was committed, the right course in my judgment is to convict of stealing and not to go on to consider the possible additional hazard of convicting the accused of handling with the added penalty which might arise. I think that the magistrate, with respect, misdirected himself, and that the proper solution from his finding of fact would have been a conviction of theft, and I would send the case back to him with a direction to enter a conviction accordingly.

Income tax – Trade – Adventure in the nature of trade – Supervening trade – Asset acquired by taxpayer otherwise than for purpose of trade – Asset subsequently becoming the subject of trade whilst in taxpayer's hands – Purchase of property for possible use as taxpayer's residence – Property subsequently found not to be suitable for residential purposes – Taxpayer obtaining planning permission to develop property – Resale of property at a profit – Whether transaction an adventure or concern in the nature of trade – Whether trading covering whole period from purchase to sale – Income Tax Act 1952, ss 123 (1) (Sch D, Case 1), 526 (1).

In July 1959 at an auction the taxpayer bought a 17 room house for £5,100. At the time of the auction the taxpayer had not decided what to do with the property if he bought it, but had in mind the possibility of going with his wife to live in it if that proved feasible. On the evening of the day of the auction the taxpayer took his wife to see the property. She soon realised that it was impracticable to use the property as their residence and in the face of her attitude the taxpayer abandoned the idea of living in it. On 18th September 1959, before completion of the purchase, an application for permission to develop the property was submitted on the taxpayer's behalf. That was refused on 16th November. He appealed to the Ministry of Housing and Local Government and his appeal was allowed. In 1962 detailed planning permission was granted. From then on, although the property was not advertised for sale, a number of offers were made for it. Ultimately a firm of developers offered £54,500. The taxpayer accepted the offer on 21st August 1963, and contracts were exchanged on 17th September. The taxpayer was assessed to income tax under Case I of Sch D in s 123 (1)^a of the Income Tax Act 1952 for the year 1963-64 in the sum of £48,895, representing in substance the difference between his sale price and the purchase price, on the basis that the purchase and resale of the property was an 'adventure or concern in the nature of trade' within s 526 (1)^b of the 1952 Act. On appeal the Special Commissioners affirmed the assessment; in their decision they stated that the question for determination was 'whether the transaction concerning the purchase and sale' of the house was trading and gave as their opinion 'that the transaction which the [taxpayer] ... carried out in connection with the property constituted an adventure or concern in the nature of trade'. Figures were subsequently agreed on the basis of the commissioners' decision. The taxpayer appealed against that decision.

Held – (i) On principle and authority it was clear that an asset which had been acquired by a taxpayer with no thought of trade might afterwards become the subject of trade as defined in s 526 (1). In the instant case, however much the transaction initially lacked the characteristics of trade, once the transactions relating to the obtaining of planning permission had begun, there came into existence material from which it was possible for the Special Commissioners to reach the conclusion that thereafter the transaction as a whole fell within the statutory definition of 'trade' (see p 794 h and p 795 g and j to p 796 a and e f h and j, post). Mitchell Brothers v Tomlinson (Inspector of Taxes) (1957) 37 Tax Cas 224 applied.

^b Section 526 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 790 h, post

(ii) The commissioners' finding that there had been trading during the whole period from the purchase to the sale of the property was nevertheless defective. Although there was evidence that, at some time after its acquisition, the property had become the subject of trading there was no evidence to support the finding of trading at the time of acquisition. It did not follow, however, that the whole determination of the commissioners should be held to have been wrong. In the circumstances the case would be remitted to the commissioners to determine when the trading began and what value the property had when it became the subject of trading so that the true profit derived from the trade might be determined and the figures adjusted accordingly. Subject to that the appeal would be dismissed (see p 799 a to c and e f, post).

Per Megarry J. It is open to counsel on the hearing of a case stated to make admissions or agree additions to the case. If those or other additions are made without objection it then becomes too late to object to them later in the argument (see p 798 b, post).

1. At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on 21st January 1971 Walter Marcus Taylor ('the taxpayer') appealed against an assessment to income tax of £48,895 for the year 1963-64.

2. Shortly stated the question for the commissioners' decision was whether the surplus on realisation from the sale of property known as Marle Hill Court was a a profit derived from a trade or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade, within Case I of Sch D, or a capital increment outside the scope of income tax.

[Paragraph 3 named the witnesses who gave evidence before the commissioners and para 4 listed the documents proved or admitted before them.]

5. As a result of the evidence both oral and documentary adduced before them, the commissioners found the following facts proved or admitted.

b (a) The taxpayer assisted by his wife, carried on two businesses in Cheltenham, one as a retail grocer and the other as a newsagent and post office. The two businesses were conducted in shops nearly next door to each other, and the taxpayer and his wife lived in a two-bedroomed council flat above the grocer's shop. They had three daughters, two of whom were married and (at the relevant time) one grandchild. Until May 1959 the taxpayer had been a councillor of the Cheltenham Council for approximately nine years, and he was chairman of the parks and recreation committee for seven years. As a councillor he had been in a position to see the minutes of other committees including the planning committee. The taxpayer owned six properties which he had acquired since about 1960 for investment.

c (b) Marle Hill Court was a gentleman's residence built in the Regency period, and was occupied until 1958, or early 1959, when it became unoccupied. In the 1920s Marle Hill Court was occupied by a Mr Boulton, who died in 1933 or 1934. The house and curtilage comprised $9\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land. Mr Boulton kept livestock on the land. During Mr Boulton's occupation the property had been well maintained, but after his death the property, which was first occupied by his daughter and her husband, and after her death by her husband, deteriorated considerably. During the second world war the property had been requisitioned by the government and six families were billeted there. Provision had been made for gas stoves in the occupied rooms, but it had never been supplied with electricity. No major structural conversion was made during the time it was requisitioned and there was only one bathroom. The property had approximately 17 rooms, and a garage and outhouses.

e (c) The taxpayer knew the property well; his mother had worked there for Mr Boulton and his father had been employed there as a gardener and general farm hand. The taxpayer and his brothers and sisters had worked there occasionally during their school holidays.

f (d) In July 1959 the taxpayer noticed that Marle Hill Court was advertised for sale by auction. The auction was to take place on 23rd July 1959. Two or three days before the auction the taxpayer went to look around the property but he did not go inside. He decided to bid for it at the auction although he did not expect to be successful and did not take his cheque book with him. At the auction there were about 20 people present, only two of whom bid for Marle Hill Court, the taxpayer and a Mr Martin. The taxpayer and Mr Martin took the bidding to £5,000, at which point the taxpayer hesitated and then bid a further £100 and was somewhat surprised when the property was knocked down to him at that figure. At the time of the auction the taxpayer had not decided what to do with the property if he bought it; but had in mind going with his wife to live in it if that proved to be feasible. It had a sentimental attraction to him in view of his, and his parents', connection with it.

h (e) On the evening of the day of the auction, the taxpayer took his wife to see the property. They could not go inside as they had no key. The taxpayer's bank manager whom he took to see the property was agreeable to the necessary overdraft being allowed to enable the purchase to be completed. The taxpayer and his wife discussed the possibility of living in the property because their flat was too small to accommodate their daughters and grandchild, who visited them from time to time, and they had been looking for somewhere else to live. When, subsequently, the taxpayer and his wife, accompanied by two of their daughters, saw the interior of the property, his wife soon realised that their thoughts of using it as a residence for themselves were impracticable. There was a good deal of rubbish in the house. It had a gas geyser in the bathroom, the decoration was in a very poor state and it had no electricity. The taxpayer assured his wife that the defects could be remedied, but she raised other objections; her daughters did not think it was practical or convenient, she was troubled by its isolation, and its proximity to a local refuse tip. Some vandals had committed damage and boys raided the orchards. The property was a long way from the newsagent and post office which she managed in Cheltenham, and as she did not drive a car she would have found it difficult to get to the shop early in the morning. In face of his wife's attitude the taxpayer abandoned the idea of living in the property. a

(f) The taxpayer and his wife cleaned some of the rooms in the property, began to clear out the rubbish, made curtains and cut the grass and the high hedges round the property. After a time the taxpayer installed his nephew in two or three rooms in the property rent free and, in effect, as a caretaker. The nephew made some minor alterations and decorations, including the installation of a fireplace. The taxpayer rented the grazing of the fields attached to the property to a farmer for a rent of £6 a month. The farmer grazed that land for approximately three years and the taxpayer's nephew occupied the property for approximately the same period. b

(g) In September 1959 the taxpayer consulted planning consultants and on 18th September 1959, before completion of the purchase of the property (which was due to take place on 23rd August 1959, but had been delayed through no fault of the taxpayer), an application for permission to develop the property was submitted on the taxpayer's behalf by Messrs Arthur G Streater & Partners, town planning consultants. The application stated that Marle Hill Court was converted into flats and was then vacant. The taxpayer had not in fact converted Marle Hill Court into flats, and that was an inaccurate reference to the multiple occupation which had taken place during the war above referred to. Mr Streater had advised him that it was not likely that planning permission would be granted because Marle Hill Court was zoned as an area of white land on the Cheltenham town map, but that there was nothing to be lost by applying. Permission was in fact refused by the local authority on 16th November 1959. The taxpayer appealed to the Minister of Housing and Local Government against the local authority's decision to refuse planning permission. A public inquiry was held and the Minister allowed the appeal on 23rd June 1960. Plans were drawn up for the comprehensive development of the property, which included the demolition of Marle Hill Court, and the erection of 90 dwellings on the 9½ acres of land. A fresh application for outline planning permission was made on 23rd November 1961, and after some negotiations with the planning committee planning permission was granted in 1962. The taxpayer did not advertise the property for sale during the period in which he owned it because he did not need to, but several people approached him with offers to buy it. By an offer which was made immediately after the auction he was offered £250 profit on the purchase. He refused that offer. All other offers were made after he had obtained planning permission. The use of Marle Hill Court as a country club was considered merely as a family suggestion and was not proceeded with. No application was made for a liquor licence and no architect was approached. He referred some of the offers to his solicitors who negotiated with developers. A number of offers were made for the property and ultimately a firm of developers offered £54,500, which offer the taxpayer accepted on 21st August 1963 and contracts were exchanged on 17th September 1963. c a 7. It was contended on behalf of the taxpayer that he was not carrying on a trade or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade in connection with the purchase and sale of Marle Hill Court and the assessment should be discharged.

8. It was contended on behalf of the inspector of taxes that the purchase and sale by the taxpayer of Marle Hill Court constituted a trade or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade and the assessment should be confirmed in principle.

b 9. The commissioners who heard the appeal took time to consider their decision and gave it in writing on 16th February 1971 as follows:

‘1. The question for our determination is whether the transaction concerning the purchase and sale of Marle Hill Court (“the property”) constituted a trade or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade.

c ‘2. It was contended on behalf of the [taxpayer] that his motive or purpose in buying the property was to acquire a residence for himself and his wife and, occasionally, his daughters.

d ‘3. The [taxpayer] attended the auction sale on 23rd July, 1959 without thinking it likely that any bid he might make for the property would be successful; he did not even take his cheque book. He was then living in a two-bedroomed council flat which he occupied above his grocer’s shop. There was little competition in the bidding for the property; the [taxpayer] and another man bid against each other up to £5,000. The [taxpayer] hesitated at that figure, then bid £5,100 and secured the property at that figure. Before the auction sale he had not inspected the interior of the property which, however, he was familiar with as he and his parents had worked there for many years previously.

e ‘4. After the auction the [taxpayer] and his wife inspected the property to see whether it was suitable as a residence for them. They found that its interior was dilapidated and in a poor state of decoration and repair, having been neglected since it was in multiple occupation during the war. Vandals had caused some damage to it. The [taxpayer’s] wife, though initially attracted when her husband secured the property by the prospect of living there, soon decided that it was not suitable. She thought it was too large, too difficult to run (it had no electricity); she feared the isolation; she was not qualified to drive a car and would not be able conveniently to travel to the post office which she managed; it was near a rubbish dump and she was afraid of rats. The [taxpayer] acquiesced in his wife’s decision, which was supported by his daughters.

f ‘5. Shortly after the acquisition the [taxpayer], assisted by his family and brothers-in-law, with some domestic help, cleaned up the property, fitted curtains so that it would not appear unoccupied, and cut the grass and hedges. He did not, however, spend any money on renovation and repair and he did not equip it with an electricity supply. His nephew, whom he installed there in effect as a caretaker, put in a fireplace and occupied two or three of the 17 rooms and a garage.

g ‘6. The property was scheduled as “White land” in the town plan. Acting on advice the [taxpayer] applied on 18th September, 1959, that is, before completion, for outline planning permission, which was refused. He appealed to the Minister who, in June 1960, allowed the appeal. At various times after his purchase the [taxpayer] was approached by persons interested in acquiring the property. He also considered using it as a country club. Ultimately, with the co-operation of the owner of adjoining land, he was able to submit a comprehensive plan for development which included a road connecting the property with Taylor's Lane on the East side, thereby permitting development without a cul-de-sac which was disliked by the Planning Authority. When these arrangements had been made he secured on 16th and 22nd January, 1962, planning permission for the erection of 90 dwellings. a

'7. On the evidence before us we have reached the conclusion that the [taxpayer] had at no time a fixed and settled intention of buying the property for use as a residence. He would have liked to be able so to make use of it, but he meant to do so only if he could persuade his wife that going to live there would be acceptable to her, and it very soon became clear that it would not be. After buying it, he had, in our view, no more than a short-lived and doubtful hope or expectation that it might prove to be suitable for them as a residence. Once a detailed inspection had made its defects for habitation apparent he and his wife wholly abandoned any intention of living there. Having bought the property as he did at a low figure, he shortly afterwards proceeded to take steps to enhance its value with a view to development and, ultimately, sale. b

'8. Having carefully considered the whole of the evidence before us bearing on the matter, we are of opinion that the transaction which the [taxpayer] thus carried out in connection with the property constituted an adventure or concern in the nature of trade. We dismiss the appeal and leave the figures to be agreed.' c

10. Figures were agreed between the parties on 16th December 1971 and on 20th January 1972 the commissioners adjusted the assessment accordingly. d

11. The taxpayer immediately after the determination of the appeal declared his dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and on 21st January 1972 required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court. e

12. The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether there was evidence to support the commissioners' finding that the taxpayer carried on an adventure or concern in the nature of trade in respect of the purchase and sale of Marle Hill Court.

Barry Pinson for the taxpayer. f

MEGARRY J. Initially straightforward, this became a somewhat troublesome case. It is an appeal from the Special Commissioners against an assessment to income tax of £48,895 for 1963-64 under Case I of Sch D. It concerns a house called Marle Hill Court on the outskirts of Cheltenham which the appellant taxpayer bought at an auction, on 23rd July 1959, for £5,100 and sold rather over four years later, on 17th September 1963, for £54,500. I am not concerned with the figures, but in substance the assessment is based on the difference of £49,400 between the two prices. g

By the Income Tax Act 1952, s 123 (1), Case I of Sch D imposes a charge of tax 'in respect of any trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere', and by s 526 (1), except so far as is otherwise provided or the context otherwise requires, 'trade' includes every trade, manufacture, adventure or concern in the nature of trade'. 'Manufacture' does not come into the question, and so the essential point is whether the taxpayer's activities in relation to the house fall within the words 'trade, . . . adventure or concern in the nature of trade'. The Special Commissioners held that they did; and from this decision the taxpayer appeals by way of case stated, while counsel for the Crown seeks to uphold the decision of the Special Commissioners. It is indeed understandable that the taxpayer, who has never been a property dealer, should object to being taxed on the fruits of what was in no sense his means of livelihood but was an isolated and somewhat unexpected transaction. h

At the outset I must say something about the form of the case stated. Paragraph 5 i a of the case, which is divided into seven sub-paragraphs and extends over some six pages, sets out the facts proved or admitted. Apart from a failure to indicate either an exact or approximate date for many of the events mentioned, in a case where some of the dates are at least of possible importance, there has been little criticism of the statement of facts. Of course, dates may be absent because of an absence of evidence about them; but where there is a general deficiency of dates for this reason, it would b be helpful if the case said so. In the next paragraph, para 6, there is a list of a dozen cases to which the Special Commissioners were referred, and then follow two paragraphs setting out the contentions of the taxpayer and the inspector respectively. Each consists of a single sentence, and each in effect is merely a simple denial and assertion respectively that the taxpayer was carrying on a trade or an adventure or concern in the nature of trade in the purchase and sale of the house. In view of the c dozen authorities cited and what is said by the Special Commissioners in their decision, as well as what I shall say later, it seems highly improbable that the conflicting arguments were so Spartan. A mere assertion of the terminus ad quem, with no indication of the process of reasoning whereby that terminus is reached, is a poor record of an argument. A case stated should not, of course, record in full every fine point that was taken: but it should at least give some indication of the main reasons

d advanced for reaching the conclusion asserted. If, as I understand often happens, the commissioners simply insert summaries of the argument as drafted by the parties themselves, primarily any shortcomings are the responsibility of the parties: but no matter whose the responsibility, it is important for this court to have a note of the main reasons urged by each side before the commissioners in support of the conclusion put forward.

e The case stated then sets out the decision of the Special Commissioners in para 9, divided into eight sub-paragraphs. The first six of these mainly set out again most of the facts already found, some in a variant form, together with some additional facts. The second sub-paragraph, however, records a contention by the taxpayer which might well have found place in the statement of the taxpayer's contentions. It reads:

f 'It was contended on behalf of the [taxpayer] that his motive or purpose in buying the property was to acquire a residence for himself and his wife and, occasionally, his daughters.'

The eighth sub-paragraph states the conclusion of the Special Commissioners, namely, that the transaction in question constituted 'an adventure or concern in the nature of trade'. That leaves sub-para (7), in which virtually the whole of the process
g of reasoning whereby the Special Commissioners appear to have reached their conclusion is set out. To that sub-paragraph I shall return.

I pause there. I have spent a little time setting out the form of the case stated because it is so important to all concerned, to this court, as well as to the parties, their solicitors and their counsel, that cases should be stated properly. The cost and h in particular the delay involved in remitting a case to the commissioners for amplification are such as to make this often a course of last resort. I appreciate that sometimes there are many difficulties for the commissioners. In the present case, they heard the appeal, with oral evidence, on 21st January 1971, over 11 years after the purchase in question. Their decision was dated 16th February 1971, but not until the figures had been agreed, nearly a year later, were they asked, on 21st January i 1972, to state a case. I appreciate the difficulties; but I express the hope that in future cases it may prove possible to give more dates where dates are important, to set out at least the main headings of the rival contentions, in the shape of the reasoning rather than the mere conclusion, and to avoid making it necessary on appeal to this court for all concerned to compare and contrast two sets of statements of the facts in variant language which overlap but do not coincide.

With that, I turn to the facts in what is a somewhat unusual case. I do no more than summarise those facts necessary for an understanding of my decision, and although I do not repeat all the facts set out in the case stated, I do not forget them. In 1959 the taxpayer and his wife were carrying on two businesses in Cheltenham, one a retail grocery and the other a newsagent and post office, in shops nearly next door to each other. They lived in a two-bedroomed flat over the grocer's shop. They have three daughters, two married and one not, as well as a grandchild. They both knew the house in question, which had been built in the Regency period; for the taxpayer and his parents had all worked there in days gone by. It was a 'gentleman's residence', with some 17 rooms, a garage and outhouses, and it was sold with about one acre of garden and some 8½ acres of pasture. Until about 1934 the property had been well maintained, but it then declined, and during the war six families were billeted there. Gas was laid on, but not electricity. The Special Commissioners found that it had only one bathroom, but the auction particulars attached to the case describe two bathrooms with some particularity, one on the first floor of the principal wing and the other on the ground floor of the secondary wing.

Despite its condition, the house was occupied in some way until 1958 or early 1959. In July 1959 the taxpayer saw that it was up for auction, and two or three days before the auction he looked round it from the outside and decided to bid for it. He did not expect to succeed, and did not even take his cheque book to the auction. At the auction on 23rd July 1959 there was only one other bidder, and after the bidding had reached £5,000 the taxpayer's bid of £5,100 proved to be the last bid: and somewhat to his surprise the house was knocked down to him. His state of mind is stated in the findings of fact as follows:

'At the time of the auction the [taxpayer] had not decided what to do with the property if he bought it; but had in mind going with his wife to live in it if this proved to be feasible. It had a sentimental attraction to him in view of his, and his parents', connection with it.'

In their decision, the Special Commissioners say, in sub-para (7):

'On the evidence before us we have reached the conclusion that the [taxpayer] had at no time a fixed and settled intention of buying the property for use as a residence. He would have liked to be able so to make use of it, but he meant to do so only if he could persuade his wife that going to live there would be acceptable to her ...'

Having thus unexpectedly become the owner in equity of this property, the taxpayer took his wife to see it that evening, though they could not go inside it as they had no key. At some stage (I do not know when) the taxpayer took his bank manager to see the property, though it does not appear whether he saw it inside as well as out: and the bank manager agreed an overdraft to make completion possible. I do not know when completion took place, save that there is a statement that 18th September 1959 was 'before completion'. The Special Commissioners say that the taxpayer and his wife discussed the possibility of living in the house because their flat was too small to have their daughters and grandchild to stay with them. I think this discussion must have been soon after the auction, because the Special Commissioners state that 'subsequently' the taxpayer, his wife and two of their daughters saw the interior of the property, and it seems unlikely that the taxpayer would fail to obtain access to the interior until long after the house had been knocked down to him. When they saw the interior of the house, the taxpayer's wife 'soon realised that their thoughts of using it as a residence for themselves were impracticable'. There was much rubbish in the house: 'the bathroom' had a gas geyser (this, I think, is the first floor bathroom); there was no electricity; and the decoration was in a very poor state. The taxpayer said that all this could be put right, but his wife then raised other objections. Her daughters did not think it was practical or convenient; it was too

a large and difficult to run; she was troubled by its isolation; it was far from the news-agent and post office that she managed, and she could not drive a car; it was near a rubbish dump and she was afraid of rats; and vandals had damaged it, and boys raided the orchards. Her daughters supported her, and, not surprisingly, the taxpayer acquiesced 'in his wife's decision' (which must mean a decision that she would not live in the house), and he 'abandoned the idea of living in the property'. I do not know when this decision was reached, but from both the version in the findings b of fact and the version in the decision of the Special Commissioners I infer that it was within a very few days after the auction.

c 'Shortly after the acquisition', say the Special Commissioners, the taxpayer, helped by his family and brothers-in-law, and with some domestic help, took certain steps in relation to the house. It looks as if these steps were taken after the decision not to live in the house had been made, but before completion. Some of the rooms were cleaned, a start was made on clearing out the rubbish, curtains were fitted so that the house would not appear unoccupied, and the grass and high hedges round the property were cut. 'After a time', say the Special Commissioners, the taxpayer installed his nephew in two or three rooms, rent free and in effect as a caretaker; and the nephew put in a fireplace. Whether this was before or after completion I do not know. The nephew remained there for some three years.

d Again I pause. Up to this point, there had been the taxpayer's initial idea of going to live in the house with his wife 'if this proved to be feasible'. This initial idea had soon foundered on his wife's understandable objections, and the taxpayer had then rendered what I may call 'first aid' to the property. The prospects for the house at this stage may fairly be called indeterminate. However, there then came a somewhat protracted stage which is of considerable importance, relating to planning e permission; for when the taxpayer realised that he could not live in the house, instead of reselling it as it was, with or without improvements to its condition, he took steps to enhance the value of the property by obtaining planning permission. On 18th September 1959, before completion, some town planning consultants acting on behalf of the taxpayer made an outline application for planning permission for f residential purposes in respect of, it seems, part of the property. The consultants advised the taxpayer that the land was 'white' land for planning purposes and that it was unlikely that planning permission would be granted, but that there was nothing to be lost by applying. On 16th November 1959 the local planning authority refused planning permission. The taxpayer appealed, a public inquiry was held at some stage, and on 23rd June 1960 the Minister allowed the taxpayer's appeal. The taxpayer then, in co-operation with the owner of the neighbouring land fronting on to g a road which enabled problems of access to the taxpayer's property to be solved, made a further application on 23rd November 1961. This was for outline planning permission for the erection of 90 dwellings on the whole of the land; and after negotiations with the planning authorities, planning permission was granted in January 1962.

h During this time the taxpayer had not been advertising the property for sale. Immediately after the auction he had refused an offer which would have shown him a profit of £250. He received no other offers until 'after he had obtained planning permission'; and from one of the documents annexed to the case stated this seems to be a reference to the earlier planning permission, granted by the Minister on appeal. But after this, he received a number of offers, some of which he referred to his solicitors, who then negotiated with the developers who had made the offers. Finally, there was the offer of £54,500, for which contracts were exchanged on 17th September 1963; i and doubtless that contract was completed some while later. Apart from a suggestion within the family that the house should be used as a country club, a suggestion that was not pursued, nothing save sale for development seems to have been in mind in any real way once it had been decided not to live in the house.

I now return to sub-para (7) of the Special Commissioners' decision as set out in para 9 of the case stated. This sub-paragraph contains virtually the whole of their expressed reasons for dismissing the appeal. I have already read part of this, but I think I should read it in its entirety. It reads as follows:

'On the evidence before us we have reached the conclusion that the [taxpayer] had at no time a fixed and settled intention of buying the property for use as a residence. He would have like to be able so to make use of it, but he meant to do so only if he could persuade his wife that going to live there would be acceptable to her, and it very soon became clear that it would not be. After buying it, he had, in our view, no more than a short-lived and doubtful hope or expectation that it might prove to be suitable for them as a residence. Once a detailed inspection had made its defects for habitation apparent he and his wife wholly abandoned any intention of living there. Having bought the property as he did at a low figure, he shortly afterwards proceeded to take steps to enhance its value with a view to development and, ultimately, sale'.

The Special Commissioners then, as I have mentioned, held in sub-para (8) that the transaction constituted an adventure or concern in the nature of trade.

Initially, counsel for the taxpayer attacked this conclusion primarily on the ground that the Special Commissioners had misunderstood and misapplied the law: and this attack was in the main directed at the first sentence of sub-para (7). The true question, said counsel for the taxpayer, was not whether the taxpayer had at any time 'a fixed and settled intention of buying the property for use as a residence'. The words 'fixed and settled' were wrong, and formed no part of the taxpayer's argument before the Special Commissioners; for his contention, as recorded by the Special Commissioners in para 7, was essentially that in relation to the transaction in question the taxpayer was not carrying on a trade or adventure or concern in the nature of trade. That, of course, is so: but in para 9 (2), as part of their decision, the Special Commissioners record the taxpayer's contention that his motive or purpose in buying the property was to acquire a residence for himself and his wife, and, occasionally, his daughters. Indeed, it would be surprising if he had not contended this. If a house is bought with the intention of providing a home for the purchaser, that is a valuable element in a contention that in so doing the purchaser was not trading, especially if the intention is fixed and settled. Having recorded the basic contentions, which I may put shortly as trading vel non, and having both reached a decision and stated the case in those terms, I cannot see how the conclusion of the Special Commissioners that there was no fixed and settled intention to buy the house for use as a residence can be fairly read as being more than the rejection of an important argument by the taxpayer to refute the allegation that he was trading within the meaning of the Act.

Even if the house was purchased with no thought of trading, I do not see why an intention to trade could not be formed later. What is bought or otherwise acquired (for example, under a will) with no thought of trading cannot thereby acquire an immunity so that however filled with the desire and intention of trading the owner may later become, it can never be said that any transaction by him with the property constitutes trading. For the taxpayer, a non-trading inception may be a valuable asset: but it is no palladium.

The proposition that an initial intention not to trade may be displaced by a subsequent intention, in the course of the ownership of the property in question, is, I think, sufficiently established by *Mitchell Brothers v Tomlinson (Inspector of Taxes)*¹. In that case the appellants, who were window cleaners and dealers in surplus army stores, decided to set up an investment fund for their old age. By the outbreak of war in 1939 they had acquired 60 houses, and between April 1942 and September 1948 they bought 239 more houses that were available at low prices. Initially, the appellants relet any house when it fell vacant; but in the words² of the General Commissioners, after the war they 'changed their policy and ceased to let houses

b 'I will assume that the principles require that the intention should be established as to what the alleged traders were doing in regard to these matters, that is to say, what the intention and purpose of the Mitchell brothers was at the material time. I am quite prepared to accept that sub-paragraphs (e) and (f) taken together show an original intention to set up land as an investment to support the Appellants in their old age, and that it will no doubt be correct to say, as argued by Mr. Borneman, that that intention having been established, if you say that subsequently, in altered circumstances, if you like, the Mitchell brothers decided to indulge in a business, a trade of selling and buying land, you must establish the facts to support that there was a change in intention. As c has been pointed out in a number of cases, that is a question of fact, which is primarily one for the Commissioners to decide. I am not sitting as a second tribunal to decide matters of fact. I have merely to see whether that decision of the Commissioners is one which they could reasonably have reached upon the facts which they found and the evidence before them.

d 'Now it seems to me that there are in paragraph 3 (h) ample facts upon which the Commissioners could infer an intention to depart from their policy of investment and retaining the houses for purposes of investment, but instead to take advantage of the opportunities provided for making profits in the conditions which existed after the termination of the war and indulge in an adventure in the nature of a trade by making profits out of the purchase and sale of land. It seems to me impossible for me to say there was no evidence on which the Commissioners could reach that conclusion, or that such a conclusion is one which could e not be reasonably reached upon the evidence and the facts found by the Commissioners. Accordingly, it seems to me this is a case in which I ought not to disturb the finding of the Commissioners, which I have not yet read out, but it seems to me it has been perfectly properly expressed. They found as a fact that the Appellants carried on the trade of buying and selling properties and they held that the profits therefrom were assessable to Income Tax. I do not feel at liberty to f interfere with that finding, so the appeal must be dismissed.'

On appeal, the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal without delivering a reasoned judgment, saying² that it was 'a perfectly hopeless appeal'.

g What the appellants in that case had done, as it seems to me, was to build up a large stock of houses with no intention of trading. They then decided that when houses fell vacant they should be sold instead of being let; and as from the change of policy they were held to be trading. This plainly supports the conclusion that what is bought h otherwise than in the course of trade may be sold in the course of trade. The case is not on all fours with the present case, in that here there is only one house whereas there there were many houses; and after the change of policy to selling instead of letting, there seems to have been some purchasing as well: for the changed policy operated 'from 1946 onwards', and some of the houses seem to have been bought up until September 1948. But that, as it seems to me, does not affect the principle. The principle also derives some support from a dictum in *Cooksey and Bibbey v Rednall (Inspector of Taxes)*³; and see also *Lucy & Sunderland Ltd v Hunt (Inspector of Taxes)*⁴ and *Leach v Pogson (Inspector of Taxes)*⁵.

i Quite apart from authority, I would hold that property acquired with no thought of trade may afterwards become the subject of trade. I have, of course, been using 'trade' and 'trading' as shortened references to 'trade' as defined by the Income Tax Act 1952, s 526 (1); and I shall continue to do so. It is significant that this definition includes an 'adventure or concern in the nature of trade'. As Lord Normand, the Lord President, said in *Inland Revenue Comrs v Fraser*¹:

'It would be extremely difficult to hold that a single transaction amounted to a trade, but it may be much less difficult to hold that a single transaction is an adventure in the nature of trade'; and see *Rutledge v Inland Revenue Comrs*²: By itself, 'trade' has a flavour of recurrence which 'adventure' lacks. With Peter Pan one may say 'To die will be an awfully big adventure': but for none will death recur.

Counsel for the taxpayer submitted as part of his argument a useful memorandum setting forth a series of factors which he urged as indicating the absence of the characteristics of trade. These I have considered; but I do not propose to discuss them in detail, for the question is not what I would decide, but whether I could and should reverse the decision of the Special Commissioners. If one takes the celebrated passage in Lord Radcliffe's speech in *Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow*³, then whether one puts it as a question of whether there is any evidence to support the decision of the Special Commissioners, or whether the evidence is inconsistent with or contradicts the determination, or whether the true and only reasonable conclusion contradicts the determination, in my judgment the answer must be the same. However much the transaction initially lacked the characteristics of trade, once the series of transactions relating to the obtaining of planning permission had begun, there came into existence material on which it was possible for the Special Commissioners to reach the conclusion that thereafter the transaction as a whole fell within the statutory definition of 'trade'. Once the slate had been wiped clean of whatever initial residential aspirations the taxpayer had, there was little to displace, and the new intention certainly had some of the characteristics of trading. Action was being taken and money was being spent with a view to enhancing the value of the property for the purpose of selling it. In the taxpayer's hands, the house had never been a residence or home, and never became anything save a source of future profit. True, although he owned a few small properties as investments, he was in no sense a dealer in property. True also, he did not advertise the property for resale, although in fact a sufficiency of offers came in. True, the obtaining of planning permission was unexpected; but then so is success in a number of admittedly trading transactions. True again, there is nothing to show that the taxpayer could not afford to retain the property: but what he did was to pursue a course which would realise the best price on a sale. That by itself does not necessarily establish that there was trading: the owner-occupier of a house may improve it before he sells it without it being held after the sale that he has been engaging in trade. But a process of enhancing the value of a house which the owner has never lived in with a view to selling it at a profit, especially if that enhancement consists not merely of improving the house as it is but of a prolonged process of obtaining planning permission for an entirely new development, certainly provides some evidence which can support a finding of trading.

Accordingly, whatever I might have held myself if I had heard the evidence, it seems to me impossible to say, after examining the facts with 'the decent respect for the tribunal appealed from' that Lord Radcliffe enjoined in *Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow*⁴, that there was not sufficient evidence to support a decision by the Special Commissioners that at some time after the auction the taxpayer was trading.

a After all, it was the Special Commissioners who saw and heard the witnesses and were able to give the evidence appropriate weight.

In his reply, however, counsel for the taxpayer advanced a powerful contention to the effect that to hold that at some time after the auction the taxpayer was trading showed that the Special Commissioners had gone wrong. After much discussion, it came down, I think, to this. Counsel for the taxpayer accepted, as I think he was forced to, that assets acquired with no thought of trading could subsequently become the subject of trading; and for brevity the phrase 'supervening trading' was used for trading of this type, as distinct from cases where assets were both bought and sold with the object of trading, which were referred to as 'trading ab initio'. He also accepted that he could not contend that there was no evidence which could support a finding of supervening trading in this case, although he said that the right conclusion was that there had not even been supervening trading. However, this, he said, was not what the Special Commissioners had held. Their decision was one of trading ab initio, as their references to 'purchase and sale' showed. Indeed, the sole contention of the inspector himself is recorded in para 8 as being one that 'the purchase and sale' of the house by the taxpayer constituted trading. There was in fact no evidence whatever to support a finding of trading ab initio, and counsel for the Crown, said

d counsel for the taxpayer, had not attempted to support such a finding. Furthermore, said counsel for the taxpayer, the contention of supervening trading was never advanced before the Special Commissioners, and counsel for the Crown was trying to take a point which had not been taken below, and without giving any notice of it. This he could not do. Even if the contention of supervening trading had been sufficiently taken below, it was plain that the Special Commissioners had not appreciated it: for in a case of supervening trading, the property traded with had to be e brought into account at its value not when acquired but when appropriated to trading, which might be quite a different time, and there was no trace of the Special Commissioners having considered any question of appropriation or the time of valuation. Indeed, he himself had considered this question of appropriation before he had appeared before the Special Commissioners, wondering whether to raise it, and so, being sensitised to the point, he would have noticed it had it been raised: but it was

f not. Furthermore, when the Special Commissioners had decided the question of principle and the parties had then agreed the figures, this had been done on the footing of trading ab initio, so that if the true conclusion was one of supervening trading, the taxpayer had agreed the figures on a wholly wrong basis. That was the argument.

A procedural difficulty arose out of this argument. Counsel for the taxpayer, who had appeared before the Special Commissioners, made various assertions about what had happened and what had not happened before the Special Commissioners.

g Counsel for the Crown, who had not appeared before the Special Commissioners, on instructions (and without objection at the time by counsel for the taxpayer) read me a passage from a note of the proceedings which, he said, was made shortly after the hearing, in support of his submission that supervening trading was not a new point taken for the first time before me. Right at the end of his reply, counsel for the taxpayer

h said that there was no evidence whatever before me that the point on supervening trading had been taken before the Special Commissioners, so that the passage read to me from the note of the argument ought to be ignored, and that nothing except what appeared in the case stated should be considered.

This is a point on which I must say something. The cases stated that come before i this court vary considerably in quality: and sometimes even the best of them proves inadequate in the face of some unexpected turn of argument or some question by the judge. Often in such cases counsel, doubtless realising the cost and delay of sending the case back to the commissioners, state on instructions such additional facts as may be needed to supply the deficiency. Sometimes they agree, and sometimes they disagree, though only on immaterial points; and in these cases the expense and delay of sending a case back to the commissioners is avoided by the exercise of a little common sense on the technicalities. Sometimes such a course is objected to, or, if not objected to, produces an irreconcilable conflict on essentials; and in such cases the court has to do the best it can on the materials that are legitimately before it. There may indeed be cases in which it is very proper for counsel to object to any informal supplements of this kind being made to the case stated, and to require the court to confine itself within the four corners of the case stated. If, however, counsel does not object, and material is put before the court in this informal way, I do not think that counsel can subsequently object to the material on the score of informality. It is open to counsel on a case stated to make admissions or agree additions to the case, and if these or other additions are made without objection I think that it then becomes too late to object to them later in the argument.

Now in this case it seems to me that the point of supervening trading is one that must have been before the Special Commissioners in some form. *Mitchell Brothers v Tomlinson (Inspector of Taxes)*¹ is recorded in the case stated as being one of the cases cited; and I find it impossible to see why that case should have been cited except to support the concept of supervening trade. I cannot see what other significance that case could have had. Even if I leave on one side the note of the argument based on the Mitchell case¹ that was read to me (and, incidentally, I was told that the Tomlinson of that case was the inspector of taxes who in fact appeared before the Special Commissioners in the present case), and even if I confine myself strictly to the case stated, I think that I would infer that the point had been sufficiently taken: taken, that is, though probably not emphasised or reiterated, or, perhaps, sufficiently appreciated by others. If, as I think, I may consider what was recorded in the note of the argument that counsel for the Crown read out to me without objection, this reinforces my view. Nor do I forget that counsel for the Crown had advanced the whole of his argument on supervening trading before counsel for the taxpayer contended that the point was not open to the Crown because it had not been taken below. I therefore think that this point is open to the Crown.

Next, I cannot see any real indication in the case stated that the Special Commissioners ever reached any decision on supervening trading. The main thrust of the argument below on both sides seems to have been on whether the whole transaction, from purchase to sale, was trading, with supervening trading as what may perhaps be called a subsidiary alternative. The contentions on each side are stated in terms of 'purchase and sale': the question that the Special Commissioners state in para 9 (1) as the question for their determination is 'whether the transaction concerning the purchase and sale' of the house was trading; the question of law stated in para 12 for the opinion of the court is whether there is evidence to support the Special Commissioners' finding that the taxpayer was trading 'in respect of the purchase and sale' of the house. Even para 9 (8), where the Special Commissioners state their opinion that the 'transaction' was trading, may well fall into this category, in view of the meaning given to 'transaction' in the passage I have quoted from para 9 (1) above. The only statement that gets away from the purchase is the Special Commissioners' initial statement, in para 2, that the question for their decision was whether 'the surplus on realisation from the sale' of the house 'was a profit derived from' trading, or was a capital increment.

In those circumstances, counsel for the taxpayer contended forcefully that the only answer to the question of law stated for the opinion of the court, namely, whether there was evidence to support the finding of the Special Commissioners that the taxpayer 'carried on an adventure or concern in the nature of trade in respect of the purchase and sale' of the property, must be No: for quoad the purchase there was no evidence. Literally, I think counsel for the taxpayer is right: but as Coke² observed, qui haeret in litera haeret in cortice. There is a finding of trading: that

2 See Coke upon Littleton 283 b

- a* finding covers the whole period including the initial acquisition: as to the initial acquisition the finding is unsupported by evidence: as to the rest it is supported by some evidence. In those circumstances, to say that the court must say that the whole determination is wrong seems to me unreal. The finding of trading cannot, as it seems to me, be totally destroyed merely because there is no evidence to support the finding during the initial period of acquisition, even though there is evidence to support such
- b* a finding during all subsequent stages. If from a finding of trading throughout one discards the one period which may be said to point against trading, what remains must surely be more, rather than less, strongly supported. Put another way, if the finding is that from purchase to sale the transaction as a whole constituted trading, despite the lack of any indicia of trading in the purchase itself, a finding of trading for a period subsequent to the purchase must be a fortiori. Nevertheless, trading (or an 'adventure') must have a commencement, and I do not see how a finding of trading throughout can stand. A man cannot trade before he begins to trade, nor embark on an adventure before he has thought of it.

- The question, then, is what order I ought to make. I bear in mind that it is for the taxpayer to displace the assessment made on him. I confess that I have been troubled by this case, with some of the problems (though not all) arising from the way in which the case has been stated. Without accepting it as a precedent, counsel for the Crown
- d* very properly said, on instructions, that he would not seek to hold the taxpayer to the figures agreed if there had been some misunderstanding. I think there must have been some misunderstanding on the point of supervening trading, both by the Special Commissioners and by the taxpayer, not least in relation to the figures. I think the least unsatisfactory course would be to remit the case to the Special Commissioners to determine, consistently with this decision, when the trading (as defined in the Act) began, and what value (if not agreed) the property had when it became the subject of trading, so that the true profit derived from the trade may be determined. In doing this, neither side is to be bound by the figures already agreed. Each side must be at liberty to advance further arguments; and I think that each side must be at liberty to adduce further evidence. Any arguments and evidence must, however, be
- e* confined to the matters remitted to the Special Commissioners for determination. I shall, of course, hear any submissions that counsel may wish to make as to these and any other directions that should be given to the Special Commissioners. Subject to that, I dismiss the appeal.
- f*

- Finally, in view of what I have said about the form of the case stated, it seems proper that a copy of this judgment should be sent forthwith to the Special Commissioners for their information. If, as I understand to be the case, the Solicitor of
- g* Inland Revenue does this as a matter of course in all appeals from the Special Commissioners (as distinct from appeals from the General Commissioners), that, of course, will suffice; otherwise I direct the registrar to procure it to be done.

Appeal dismissed. Case remitted to the Special Commissioners.

Road traffic – Driving with blood-alcohol proportion above prescribed limit – Evidence – Provision of specimen – Specimen for laboratory test – Hospital patient – Right of medical practitioner to object – Right a condition precedent to requirement to provide specimen – Right to object to provision of specimen not continuing after requirement made – Road Safety Act 1967, s 3 (2).

Road traffic – Driving with blood-alcohol proportion above prescribed limit – Evidence – Provision of specimen – Breath test – Arrest following test – Right of person arrested to have opportunity of providing a further specimen of breath for a breath test while at police station – Whether person arrested must be taken to police station and given opportunity of providing a further specimen for breath test – Road Safety Act 1967, s 2 (7).

The respondent was the driver of a motor vehicle which was involved in a road accident. He was taken to hospital and became a patient there. Subsequently a police officer in uniform arrived at the hospital. He notified the doctor in immediate charge of the respondent's case that he proposed to require the respondent to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test under s 2 (2) of the Road Safety Act 1967; he also told the doctor that, if the test proved positive, it would be his intention to require the respondent to provide a specimen of blood or urine for a laboratory test under s 3 (2)^a of the 1967 Act after warning him of the consequences that would result from his failure to do so. The doctor replied that he had 'no objection to the giving of the warning formula, or to the requirement to provide a specimen of breath, or to the provision of the specimen'. The breath test was then administered and proved positive. The respondent was then required to provide a specimen for a laboratory test; he agreed to supply a specimen of blood. Before the specimen had been provided the respondent discharged himself from the hospital; as he was walking out, however, the constable arrested him, as he was entitled to do under s 2 (4)^b of the 1967 Act, and prevented him from leaving. Subsequently a police surgeon arrived and took a sample of the respondent's blood at the hospital. On the basis of that specimen, the respondent was convicted of driving a motor vehicle having consumed alcohol in excess of the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 (1) of the 1967 Act. The Court of Appeal quashed his conviction holding (i) that, after his arrest, the respondent should have been taken to a police station and given an opportunity to take a further breath test, in accordance with s 2 (7)^c, before being asked to provide the specimen of blood and (ii) that the specimen could not be provided at the hospital once the respondent had ceased to be a patient there and there was no

- a longer a doctor in charge of his case who could object to the provision of the specimen. On appeal,

Held (Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest dissenting) – The appeal would be allowed and the conviction restored for the following reasons—

- (i) The effect of ss 2 (7) and 3 (1)^d was not that a person who had been arrested had to be taken to a police station and given an opportunity to take a second breath test but only that, if he were taken to a police station, he was to be given an opportunity to take another test (see p 802 a b, p 807 b c, p 808 a to c, p 813 c and f and p 814 d, post).
- (ii) The right of a medical practitioner in immediate charge of the case to object to the provision of a specimen was a condition precedent to the requirement to provide a specimen and not a right which continued after the requirement had been validly made. It was therefore immaterial that, because the respondent had discharged himself after the requirement had been made but before the specimen had been provided, there was no longer a doctor in charge of his case who could object to the provision of the specimen. Accordingly a specimen for a laboratory test which had been required from a person while he was a patient at a hospital did not have to be provided while the person was still a patient there. It followed therefore that the procedure prescribed by the 1967 Act had been correctly followed in that the respondent had been validly required to provide a specimen of blood while a patient in hospital and, in accordance with s 3 (2), the specimen had been provided at the hospital where the requirement had been made (see p 802 b c, p 808 e to j, p 809 b, p 811 d e and f, p 812 g and h j, p 813 h to p 814 a and d, post); dictum of Cooke J in Bosley v Long [1970] 3 All ER at 288 disapproved.

Appeal

- h Alan Robert Bourlet, a superintendent of Kent county constabulary, appealed against a decision of the Court of Appeal, Criminal Division (Orr LJ, Milmo and Phillips JJ) dated 1st December 1972 allowing an appeal by the respondent, Edward Charles Thomas Porter, against his conviction on 10th February 1972 in the Crown Court at Canterbury before Judge Forrest QC of driving a motor vehicle on a road having consumed alcohol in such a quantity that the proportion thereof in his blood exceeded the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967.
- i On the application of the appellant the Court of Appeal certified that a point of law of general public importance was involved in the decision to allow the appeal against conviction, i.e. 'whether in the case of a defendant charged with an offence contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967 a specimen of blood taken from him by a medical practitioner with his consent at a hospital pursuant to a requirement lawfully made of him by a constable while the defendant was at the hospital as a patient can be regarded as a specimen provided by the defendant under s 3 of the said Act, when the defendant, after the requirement made by the constable, and after having agreed to provide the specimen was arrested while at the hospital in consequence of him discharging himself from the hospital and before the specimen of blood was taken'. The court however refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords; on 22nd February 1973 the appeal committee granted leave. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest.

d Section 3 (1) is set out at p 805 g to j, post

11th June. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD REID. My Lords, I would allow this appeal for the reasons given by my noble and learned friends, Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Diplock.

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, this case furnishes yet another example of the infinite and, perhaps, surprising variety of the sets of circumstances which give rise to prosecutions for an offence under s 1 of the Road Safety Act 1967. In all these cases once the facts are ascertained the only safe course is to consider step by step whether the provisions of the Act have or have not been observed. Only if they have been ought a conviction to be obtained or sustained.

The charge which was brought against the respondent was that of driving a motor vehicle having consumed alcohol exceeding the prescribed limit, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. He was the driver of a motor vehicle which was involved in an accident on the road on 13th August 1971. He was taken to a hospital—the Medway Hospital. As was found by the learned judge he became a patient there some time before 11.30 p.m. on 13th August. At 11.30 p.m. a police constable in uniform arrived at the hospital. He wished to require the respondent to take a breath test. As the respondent was in the hospital as a patient (see s 2 (2)) the police constable had to notify the medical practitioner who was in immediate charge (see s 2 (2)) of the respondent's case. The medical practitioner was Dr Banner-Martin. The police constable did notify Dr Banner-Martin. All that he had to do at that stage was to notify the doctor that he proposed to require the respondent to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test. The doctor could object (see s 2 (2)) either on the ground that the provision of a specimen of breath would be prejudicial to the proper care or treatment of the respondent or on the ground that the requirement to provide a specimen of breath would similarly be prejudicial.

In fact the police constable not merely notified the doctor of his proposal to make the requirement of a specimen of breath but also said that if the breath test was positive it would be his intention to require the respondent to provide a specimen of blood or urine for a laboratory test and to give him the warning (see s 3 (10)) of the consequences that would result from a failure so to provide. Such a requirement to provide a specimen (which would be of a person while in hospital as a patient) could only be made (see s 3 (2)) if the medical practitioner in immediate charge of the case, after notification of the proposal to make the requirement, did not object. The objection to the provision of a specimen could be on any one of three grounds, viz (a) that the provision of the specimen would be prejudicial to the proper care or treatment of the respondent or (b) that the requirement to provide it would be similarly prejudicial or (c) that the warning would be similarly prejudicial.

- a Employing a measure of anticipation the doctor at the early stage now reached in the narrative of facts then said—I quote from the ruling of the learned judge:

‘... that he had no objection to the giving of the warning formula, or to the requirement to provide a specimen of breath or to the actual provision of the specimen.’

- b At 12 minutes past midnight the police constable saw the respondent who admitted that he was the driver of the motor vehicle involved in the accident. The proper procedure was then (at 15 minutes past midnight) carried out for taking a specimen of breath. The test proved positive. The police constable then required the respondent (who was at the hospital as a patient) to provide a specimen of blood or urine for a laboratory test (see s 3 (2)). He was first requested (see s 3 (6)) to provide a specimen of blood. He agreed that he would but he asked that his solicitor should
- c be present before he actually provided the specimen. The solicitor was (at 12.30 a m) sent for.

- The next development was somewhat surprising. At 12.45 a m the respondent said to the sister in charge of his case that he wished to be discharged from hospital. The sister tried unsuccessfully to dissuade him. So did Dr Banner-Martin. It was thought that he ought to be kept in hospital for observation for possible concussion.
- d The respondent dressed himself and prior to walking out of the ward he signed a document declaring that he was taking his own discharge from the hospital at his own desire and was doing so contrary to the advice of the medical staff and that having had the risks explained to him he was accepting full responsibility. So he walked out of the ward. Meanwhile the police constable had had news of what was happening. The constable then arrested him and prevented him from leaving.
- e He said: ‘As you have provided me with a positive breath test and have now discharged yourself from this hospital I am arresting you’.

- There is no doubt that the police constable was entitled to arrest the respondent (see s 2 (4)). There had been a breath test carried out under s 2 (2) and the indication was that the proportion of alcohol exceeded the prescribed limit and the respondent
- f was no longer a patient at the hospital.

- What in fact happened thereafter was that at 1 a m the respondent’s solicitor arrived and at 1.20 a m a police surgeon took a sample of blood. On the basis of what that sample showed the respondent was later prosecuted and convicted. After the sample of blood had been taken the respondent apparently abandoned his previous hope of leaving and he was in fact readmitted in the ward. In these somewhat strange circumstances the problem arises whether the conviction can stand
- g or whether, as the Court of Appeal held, it would have to be quashed.

- At the close of the case for the prosecution at the trial a submission was made on behalf of the respondent that there was no case to answer because there had not been compliance with the procedure laid down by ss 2 and 3 of the Road Safety Act 1967. That submission was rejected and it is accepted that it involved a question of law for the learned judge and did not involve any question of fact for the jury. The only
- h question which arose in the Court of Appeal and which now arises is whether the learned judge was wrong in law in rejecting the submission. The Court of Appeal held that he was. At the trial after the rejection of the submission of law there was an issue of fact for the jury to decide whether the respondent had had a drink of vodka after the accident. The jury rejected his evidence on this matter. If therefore the submission of law was correctly rejected the conviction will stand but if, as the
- i Court of Appeal held, it was incorrectly rejected then the Court of Appeal were right in quashing the conviction.

For the prosecution it is urged that the requirement to provide a specimen for a laboratory test was made while the respondent was a patient at a hospital and that it matters not that at the time when the specimen was provided he was no longer a patient at a hospital and further that it matters not that at the time of the providing of the specimen there was no 'medical practitioner in immediate charge' of the case (see s 3 (2)) who would be in a position to object to the provision of a specimen. Furthermore, the prosecution virtually say that the fact of the arrest can be ignored.

My Lords, it seems to me that the only proper course is to follow faithfully the provisions of the Act even if by so doing there results an acquittal which may be unmeritorious. I have related the provisions of the Act to the facts down to the moment when the police constable arrested the respondent. The arrest was validly made under s 2 (4). That subsection is in the following terms:

'If it appears to a constable in consequence of a breath test carried out by him on any person under subsection (1) or (2) of this section that the device by means of which the test is carried out indicates that the proportion of alcohol in that person's blood exceeds the prescribed limit, the constable may arrest that person without warrant except while that person is at a hospital as a patient.'

The breath test had been carried out at the hospital and the procedure appropriate in the case of a patient at a hospital had been followed. The test indicated an excess above the prescribed limit. The respondent had then ceased to be in the hospital as a patient. The arrest was therefore a valid arrest.

In my view, it is clear that the Act makes certain provisions which must be followed if a person is 'at a hospital as a patient' in which event he cannot be arrested and other provisions which must be followed where an arrest may lawfully be made and is made. As was said by the Divisional Court in *Bosley v Long*¹ if one of the two procedures provided for by the Act is not carried to a conclusion the other must be followed.

What, then, was the position at the time when the specimen of blood was given by the respondent? Was there a compliance with s 3 (2) of the Act? That subsection reads as follows:

'A person while at a hospital as a patient may be required by a constable to provide at the hospital a specimen for a laboratory test—(a) if it appears to a constable in consequence of a breath test carried out on that person under section 2 (2) of this Act that the device by means of which the test is carried out indicates that the proportion of alcohol in his blood exceeds the prescribed limit; or (b) if that person has been required, whether at the hospital or elsewhere to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test, but fails to do so and a constable has reasonable cause to suspect him of having alcohol in his body; but a person shall not be required to provide a specimen for a laboratory test under this subsection if the medical practitioner in immediate charge of his case is not first notified of the proposal to make the requirement or objects to the provision of a specimen on the ground that its provision, the requirement to provide it or a warning under subsection (10) of this section would be prejudicial to the proper care or treatment of the patient.'

The requirement addressed to the respondent to provide a specimen for a laboratory test and the request to him to provide a specimen of blood were made while the respondent was at the Medway Hospital as a patient: the requirement and request were to provide the specimen at that hospital. As I have indicated the 'medical practitioner in immediate charge' of the respondent's case had been notified of the proposal to make the requirement and had stated prospectively that he did not object in any of the ways that would be open to him. But, in my view, the Act draws a distinction between a requirement to provide a specimen and the provision of a specimen. Furthermore, the scheme of s 3 (2) is that there are certain safeguards in the case of a person who is at a hospital as a patient. One safeguard is that the medical practitioner in immediate charge of his case could in certain circumstances object (on

- a the specified grounds) to the actual provision of the specimen even though prior to the moment for the actual provision of the specimen he had raised no objection. I agree with the view expressed by the Divisional Court in *Bosley v Long*¹ that the safeguard is a continuing one. This all shows that what s 3 (2) contemplates is that the requirement to provide a specimen may be made to a person while at a hospital as a patient, that the requirement is to provide the specimen at that hospital ('the hospital must refer to the same hospital as designated by 'a' hospital), and that the actual provision must be made in circumstances enabling 'the medical practitioner in immediate charge' of the person's case to veto the actual provision of the sample.
- b Though in the words 'A person while at a hospital as a patient may be required by a constable to provide at the hospital' there is not a repetition after the second mention of 'hospital' of the words 'as a patient' the words which follow, and which enable the medical practitioner in immediate charge of the case to object, clearly contemplate the case of someone who continues to be in hospital as a patient and having a medical practitioner in charge of his case.

- d In the present case the procedure started under s 3 (2) could not be continued once the respondent ceased to be a patient. The specimen was, therefore, not provided under s 3 (2) of the Act. It matters not that in this particular case the respondent does not appear to have been in any condition which would make it prejudicial to him to provide a specimen: nor is the position affected by the fact that Dr Banner-Martin, who had been in charge of the respondent when he was in hospital as a patient, was present. The enquiry is to decide which provisions of the Act were applicable to the fact as found.

- e As it is not doubted that the respondent could only be arrested after he had ceased to be a patient and as it is not doubted that his arrest was valid, the question arises whether the procedure was followed which warranted the conviction of a person who had been arrested. In my opinion, it clearly was not. It is provided by s 2 (7) as follows:

- f 'A person arrested under this section . . . shall, while at a police station, be given an opportunity to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test there.'

- g The word 'shall' is to be noted: the words 'while at a police station' are not synonymous with such words as 'provided he is taken to a police station'. If the question is asked 'Was the respondent while at a police station given an opportunity to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test there?'—the answer clearly must be No. Then regard must be had to the provisions of s 3 (1) of the Act. That subsection is as follows:

- h 'A person who has been arrested under the last foregoing section or section 6 (4) of the [Road Traffic Act 1960] may, while at a police station, be required by a constable to provide a specimen for a laboratory test (which may be a specimen of blood or urine), if he has previously been given an opportunity to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test at that station under subsection (7) of the last foregoing section, and either—(a) it appears to a constable in consequence of the breath test that the device by means of which the test is carried out indicates that the proportion of alcohol in his blood exceeds the prescribed limit; or (b) when given the opportunity to provide that specimen, he fails to do so.'

- j In my view, it is abundantly clear that the procedure applicable in the case of an arrested person was not followed. The arrest of the respondent was definite and deliberate. It cannot just be ignored or conveniently forgotten.

The consequence is that the procedure embarked on under s 3 (2) could not be completed and in any event was positively halted by the arrest. The procedures which must be followed after an arrest were not in any way followed. However regrettable the result may be I think that the Court of Appeal were right in holding that the statutory requirements must be complied with before a conviction can be upheld.

I would dismiss the appeal.

VISCOUNT DILHORNE. My Lords, on 10th February 1972 the respondent was found guilty at Canterbury Crown Court of the offence created by s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967, namely, of driving a motor vehicle, having consumed alcohol in excess of the prescribed limit.

On 13th August 1971, at about 10.30 p m, the respondent was involved in an accident while driving a van. He was taken to Medway Hospital. While a patient there he provided a specimen of his breath. The test indicated that he had in his blood alcohol in excess of the prescribed limit. He was then required to provide a specimen of his blood or urine for a laboratory test. He agreed to supply a specimen of his blood and then, before he had done so, he decided to discharge himself from the hospital. He was advised not to do so. While dressing, he asked the nurse if there was any way of getting out of the hospital without having to pass the policeman. She pointed out that the window was the only way out. He signed a declaration that he was taking his discharge from the hospital at his own desire 'and contrary to the advice of the Medical Staff'. Pc Dale was told of this, and when the respondent sought to leave, prevented him from doing so and arrested him.

After his arrest and at the hospital after he had ceased to be a patient, he provided a specimen of his blood. His solicitor, whom he had wanted sent for, was then there. After providing the specimen, he was readmitted into the hospital as a patient. The laboratory test showed that there were 123 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood so that there was a substantial amount of alcohol in excess of the prescribed limit in his blood.

At his trial the respondent's defence was that he had drunk vodka after the accident and before the breath test so the laboratory test did not show what alcohol he had in his body while driving. This defence was rejected by the jury. It was submitted on his behalf that the provisions of the Road Safety Act 1967 had not been complied with. After his arrest, it was submitted, he should have been taken to a police station and have been asked to take another breath test before being asked to provide a specimen of his blood, and after his arrest, it was contended, it was only at a police station that he could, under the Act, be required to provide a specimen of his blood or urine. The Act does make provision for the provision of such a specimen at a hospital but it was submitted that such a specimen could, under the Act, only be provided while he was a patient at the hospital. These submissions were rejected by Judge Forrest QC but found favour with the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) who quashed the conviction. The prosecutor now appeals with the leave of the House.

Sections 2 and 3 of the Act state not only when a person can be required to provide a specimen of breath, blood or urine but also, save in one instance, where he is to be required to provide one. If he has reasonable cause to suspect a driver of having alcohol in his body or of having committed a traffic offence, a police constable in uniform can require the driver to provide a specimen of breath 'there or nearby' (s 2 (1)). If there has been an accident, he may require the driver of a vehicle involved to provide one 'either at or near the place where the requirement is made or, if the constable thinks fit, at a police station specified by the constable' unless the driver is at a hospital as a patient, in which case the driver may be required, if certain conditions are complied with, to provide it at the hospital.

The conditions to be complied with before a breath test is given at a hospital are that the medical practitioner in charge of the driver must first be notified of the proposal to make the requirement, and also that the medical practitioner does not

- a object to the provision of the specimen 'on the ground that its provision or the requirement to provide it would be prejudicial to the proper care or treatment of the patient'. If the medical practitioner does object on these grounds, then the patient cannot be required to provide a specimen of his breath. Failure without reasonable excuse to provide a specimen of breath when required to do so in accordance with the Act is made a criminal offence by s 2 (3). Unless the driver is in hospital as a patient, the constable may, if he fails to pass the breath test, arrest him (s 2 (4)); and if arrested, the driver 'shall, while at a police station, be given an opportunity to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test there' (s 2 (7)).

I do not think that the respondent's contention that, once an arrest under s 2 had been made, the arrested person must be taken to a police station and there given an opportunity to take another breath test before being required to provide a specimen of blood or urine is well founded. The Act does not say that after an arrest, the arrested person must be taken to a police station. In the vast majority of cases the arrested person will be taken to a police station for it is only at a police station or at a hospital while he is there as a patient that a man can be required to provide a specimen of blood or urine (s 3 (1) and (2)). A patient in hospital cannot be arrested under s 2.

- c
- d A man arrested after an accident and after failing to pass the breath test, may show symptoms which lead a constable to conclude that he should be taken to hospital. If the Act provided that after his arrest he had to be taken to a police station, that would not be permissible.

The obligation to give an arrested man while at a police station the opportunity to have another breath test may have been imposed on account of the possibility that the test taken outside may have been faulty. There is no obligation to give an opportunity for a second breath test if the person from whom one is required is a patient in hospital.

- f While ss 2 and 3 (2) specify the place at which the specimen is to be provided, s 3 (1) does not. That subsection states that the requirement must be made at a police station but does not state where he is required to provide the specimen of blood or urine. The fact that it does not say that he is to be required to provide it at that station has led to a difference of judicial opinion in England and Scotland. In *Butler v Easton*¹ Lord Parker CJ, delivering the judgment of the Divisional Court, said that s 3 (1)—

- 'can only envisage that the breath test, the actual words asking for him to provide a specimen for the laboratory test and the actual provision of the specimen, shall all take place in the same police station.'

g He said¹ that he was influenced by the fact that s 4 of the Act provides that:

- 'Any person required to provide a specimen for a laboratory test under section 3 (1) of this Act may thereafter be detained at the police station until he provides a specimen of breath [which passes the test].'

h If the requirement is made at one police station and the specimen provided at another, which is 'the police station' at which he may be detained under s 4? In Scotland in *Milne v McDonald*² the High Court in Justiciary did not follow *Butler v Easton*³ but held that the requirement could be made at one police station and the specimen provided at another.

- i It is unfortunate that the Act should be differently interpreted in Scotland and England, and tempting though it is to endeavour to resolve the conflict, that question

3 [1970] RTR 109

does not arise in this case and anything said with regard to it will be obiter. I therefore express no opinion on which decision is to be preferred. a

In my opinion, the fact that the respondent was arrested did not mean that the provisions of the Act were not complied with. He was arrested after he had been required to take a breath test in accordance with the provisions of the Act and required to give a specimen of his blood in accordance with the provisions of the Act and arrested after he had consented to give one. The Act does not require that after his arrest, he should be taken to a police station, only that, if he is taken to a police station, he must be given the opportunity of taking a second breath test there and it provides that only if he is arrested and has been given that opportunity and fails the breath test or fails or refuses (s 7 (1)) to provide a specimen of breath can he be required at a police station to provide a specimen for a laboratory test. b

The Act does not require that having been properly required at the hospital to provide a specimen of blood or urine, that in consequence of his arrest he should be taken to a hospital and after another breath test again required to provide a specimen. c

There are only two places where the requirement to provide such a specimen can be made under the Act, at a police station or at a hospital. Section 3 (2) it should be noted, deals with requirement. At a hospital it can only be made while a person is a patient and then only if the person has failed a breath test or has been required to provide a specimen of breath and has failed or refused to do so. It can only be made if the medical practitioner in charge of the case has first been notified of the proposal to make the requirement and does not object to the provision of a specimen 'on the ground that its provision, the requirement to provide it or a warning' in accordance with s 3 (10) 'would be prejudicial to the proper care or treatment of the patient'. d

These conditions precedent to the making of the requirement for a specimen of blood or urine were complied with as were the conditions precedent to the requirement to provide a specimen of breath. The constable notified the medical practitioner of his proposal to require a breath test and at the same time notified him that, if the test proved positive, it was his intention to require a specimen for a laboratory test. The doctor had no objection. I do not think that the Act requires a notification of intention to require a breath test and then, if the test proves positive, a separate notification of intention to require a specimen. I can see no need for separate notifications though a doctor might say 'You can give him a breath test now and I will see how he stands that before consenting to his being required to give a specimen'. e

Section 3 (2) provides that the requirement to be made is that a specimen should be provided 'at the hospital'. It does not say that it is to be provided while the person is a patient at the hospital. The respondent's contention that the provision of a specimen at the hospital after a requirement to provide one there has been properly made, only complies with the Act if at the time when the specimen is provided, the person is still a patient, appears to me to involve reading into the Act words which are not there and for the inclusion of which I can see no justification. f

If such an interpretation is placed on s 3 (2) it means that there is a loophole in the Act through which the respondent and others who are shown by the laboratory test to have had more than the permitted amount of alcohol in their blood can escape conviction. I do not think that there is any such loophole. This Act requires to be construed strictly and though it does provide that the requirement must be made while the person is a patient at a hospital, it does not provide that the specimen is to be provided while he is still a patient. g

In this connection, I must refer to *Bosley v Long*¹ where Cooke J, delivering the judgment of the Divisional Court, made some observations with regard to the last part of s 3 (2) which lend some support to the respondent's contention and with which I am unable to agree. In that case the accused was convicted of the offence created by s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. He was required while a patient in a hospital to h

- a provide a specimen of his blood. He refused to do so there but later gave one at a police station. In my opinion, the decision to quash the conviction was right as the requirement to provide a specimen being a requirement to provide it at the hospital, providing it at the police station did not comply with the requirement and with s 3 (2). Cooke J¹ referring to s 3 (2) read the last part of the subsection as if it provided that the medical practitioner was entitled to object at any time to the provision of a specimen. I do not so read the subsection. The medical practitioner is given power to object on one of the specified grounds to the requirement being made. It does not give him power to object thereafter. Presumably Parliament did not think that it was necessary to do so for a medical practitioner would not consent to the requirement being made if he thought that the provision of the specimen, the making of the requirement and the giving of the warning would be prejudicial to the patient.
- b If, having given his consent, the condition of the patient deteriorated unexpectedly so that it became unwise to provide the specimen, then no doubt a doctor would say so and the constable would not pursue the matter; and a doctor would say so, even had the patient discharged himself contrary to medical advice, if he was at the hospital.

For these reasons, in my opinion this appeal should be allowed and the conviction and the fine and disqualification imposed restored.

- d The appellant asked that an order should be made under the Criminal Justice Act 1972, Sch 3, for the payment of his costs in this House out of central funds. As this case involves a point of law of general public importance, in my view the prosecutor's costs in this House should not be paid out of local funds and an order should be made that they should, after taxation, be paid out of central funds.

- e LORD DIPLOCK. My Lords, Part I of the Road Safety Act 1967, by s 1, makes it an offence for a person to drive or attempt to drive or to be in charge of a motor vehicle on a road or other public place when, as a result of his consumption of alcohol, the proportion of it in his blood, as subsequently ascertained, exceeds the prescribed limit. Proof of any of these offences calls for analysis of a specimen of the offender's blood or urine and this can only be obtained with his consent—if the use of force be excluded, as it has been, as a means of obtaining it.

- f Since no motorist would be likely voluntarily to provide evidence which might lead to his own conviction and consequent disqualification from driving, unless his failure to do so exposed him to a similar penalty, the Act, to be effective, had to provide for an alternative offence of failing to provide a specimen of blood or urine when required to do so. It did this by s 3 (3). This made it necessary to define the circumstances in which the requirement must be made if non-compliance with it were to be an offence. It would have been quite possible for Parliament to enact that the result of the analysis of any specimen of blood or urine obtained from the offender with his consent should be proof of the offence, even though it had been obtained otherwise than in compliance with a requirement made in circumstances such that failure to comply with it would have constituted the alternative offence.
- g But Parliament did not do so. In *Director of Public Prosecutions v Carey*² it was accepted by this House that on the true construction of the Act no offence is committed under s 1 unless the specimen of his blood or urine from which the proportion of alcohol in the defendant's blood has been ascertained was obtained from him in compliance with a requirement made to him in conformity with the provisions of ss 2 and 3 of the Act. These set out the conditions which must be fulfilled if the requirement is to be such that failure to comply with it will constitute the alternative offence created by s 3 (3).

So whether the accused is charged with the substantive offence under s 1 or the

alternative offence under s 3 (3), it is necessary for the prosecution to show that the full procedure laid down in ss 2 and 3 of the Act for obtaining a specimen of his blood or urine has been followed. a

In the instant appeal your Lordships are concerned only with the substantive offence under s 1. The respondent did provide a specimen of blood for a laboratory test. It was taken with his consent by a medical practitioner. Subsequent analysis of the specimen disclosed that the proportion of alcohol in his blood was considerably in excess of the prescribed limit. The only question is whether the correct procedure was followed in obtaining the specimen of blood. In what follows I shall accordingly omit reference to any variations of the procedure in consequence of a suspect's electing to provide a specimen of urine instead of blood. b

My Lords, I shall reserve for later consideration the powers of a police constable under the Act to control the movements of a person from whom he is entitled to require a specimen of breath for a breath test or blood for a laboratory test. The procedure laid down in Part I of the Act involves two separate and consecutive stages which it is convenient to refer to as 'the breath test stage' and 'the blood test stage'. In *Director of Public Prosecutions v Carey*¹ this House was primarily concerned with the breath test stage. In the instant appeal it is primarily concerned with the blood test stage, but the two stages are closely interrelated. c

Each stage involves two separate and consecutive steps, (1) the requirement made by a police constable on the defendant to provide a specimen, in the one stage of breath, and in the other stage of blood, and (2) the provision of the specimen by the defendant when invited to comply with the requirement. The requirement and the provision of the specimen necessarily take place at different times—one precedes the other. The Act also contemplates that the requirement and the provision may take place either at the same place or at different places. It deals with them throughout as separate and distinct steps in the procedure. d

Subsections (1) and (2) of s 2 lay down alternative conditions which must be satisfied before a constable is entitled to require a person to provide a specimen of breath. It was under sub-s (2) that the constable acted in the instant case. That subsection deals with breath tests after accidents and imposes no restriction on the place where the requirement may be made by the constable. He may make it wherever the person to whom it is made happens to be. But if that person happens to be at a hospital at which he is a patient, the constable is not permitted to make it unless his proposal to do so is first notified to the medical practitioner in immediate charge of the case and that medical practitioner does not object to the provision of a specimen by his patient. He may object only on the ground that the communication of the requirement to the patient or the provision of the specimen pursuant to it would be prejudicial to his proper care and treatment. Once the doctor in charge of the patient has been notified of the constable's intention to make the requirement and though given an opportunity to object has not done so, the constable may go ahead and make the requirement. e

Subsection (2) does, however, impose restrictions on the place at which a person may be invited to comply with the requirement by providing a specimen of his breath. This must be at or near the place where the requirement itself is made or, if the constable thinks fit, at a police station specified by him; but while that person is at a hospital as a patient it may only be at that hospital and not elsewhere. f

If the result of a breath test lawfully administered under sub-s (1) or (2) of s 2 is positive the person who has taken it (whom it is now appropriate to call 'the suspect') becomes liable to be required to take a blood test. Subsections (1) and (2) of s 3 lay down conditions which must be satisfied before a constable is entitled to require the suspect to provide a specimen of his blood for a laboratory test. In contrast to the corresponding provisions relating to the breath test stage, these do impose restrictions g a on the places where the requirement to provide a specimen of blood may be made by the constable. It may be made only at a police station at which the suspect is detained or at a hospital at which the suspect is present as a patient. In both cases it must be accompanied by a warning as to the penalties to which the suspect will be liable if he fails to provide a specimen; and, in the case where the requirement is made at a hospital at which the suspect is present as a patient, the constable's right to make it is subject to restrictions as to notification and absence of objection by the doctor in charge of the case, similar to those applicable at the breath test stage.

b In the instant case the requirement to provide a specimen of blood for a laboratory test was made on the respondent at a hospital while he was there as a patient. The provision of the specimen also took place at that hospital, but at a time when the respondent's presence there was no longer as a patient but as a person who had been arrested and detained there by a constable. The relevant subsection is sub-s (2).
c It imposes a restriction on the place where the suspect may be invited to provide a specimen of his blood in compliance with a requirement made on him while he was at a hospital as a patient. The relevant words of the subsection are the opening words: 'A person while at a hospital as a patient may be required . . . to provide at the hospital a specimen for a [blood] test . . .'

d My Lords, this sentence is typical of the economy of language which is characteristic of the draftsman of the Act. On the literal meaning of the words I see no justification for holding that the subsection is not complied with if the person on whom the requirement is made is present at the hospital when he provides the specimen even though his continued presence there is no longer in the capacity of a patient. As a matter of syntax, the words 'while at a hospital as a patient' are used as an adjectival clause. They qualify the noun 'person' which is the subject of the principal verb
e 'may be required'. The requirement may only be made on a person who satisfies that description. The later words 'at the hospital' are used as an adverbial clause to qualify the dependent verb 'to provide'. They impose a restriction on the place where that person is obliged to provide the specimen; it must be provided at the hospital where he was a patient when the requirement was made. But they impose no restriction on the capacity in which he must be there when the provision of the sample
f actually takes place.

The Court of Appeal reached a contrary conclusion, not, as I read their judgment, by construing the express words of the Act, but by applying to the facts of the instant case the reasoning of the Divisional Court in the earlier case of *Bosley v Long*¹. That was a case where the only requirement on the defendant to provide a specimen of blood was made on him while he was at a hospital as a patient; but the specimen
g of blood was actually provided not at that hospital but at a police station to which the defendant had subsequently gone. The actual decision of the Divisional Court that the specimen was not provided in compliance with the provisions of s 3 (2) of the Act was, in my view, right for the reason I have already given; but part at least of the reasoning of the Divisional Court was erroneous. More important, it seems to have encouraged the fallacy which I believe to have misled the Court of Appeal in the h instant case, that the Act provides for two separate and distinct procedures between which the constable must make his election at his peril. These are referred to as 'the hospital procedure' and 'the police station (or arrest) procedure', and the suggestion is that if the constable takes any step under the one procedure he cannot thereafter change over to the other without starting afresh.

i My Lords, I believe the fallacy to be due, at any rate in part, to the unique character of the powers of arrest conferred by the Act. Because of the nature of the offence created by s 1 the power of a constable to require a person to take a breath test is not made dependent on his having reasonable cause to suspect that person of committing an offence under the Act. The constable's power of arrest accordingly does not arise until either the breath test has been taken and the result has proved to be positive or the person whom he has required to take a breath test has refused or failed to do so. The only express limitation on this power of arrest is that a person may not be arrested while he is at a hospital as a patient. Apart from this the power is discretionary not mandatory. The constable has a discretion not only as to whether to make use of it or not, but also as to how to make use of it to achieve the purpose for which the power is conferred. a

That purpose differs fundamentally from that of ordinary arrests in connection with arrestable offences. The arrest is not a step which leads directly to any charge against the person arrested or to any requirement of bail as a condition of his release. Its only purpose is (i) in the first instance to take the suspect to a place where the procedure for requiring him to provide a specimen (of blood or urine) for a laboratory test may lawfully be carried out, and (ii) to detain him while he is being given an opportunity to provide the specimen pursuant to that requirement and has either provided it or refused or failed to do so, and thereafter, but only if the place to which he has been taken initially was a police station, (iii) to detain him there until he takes another breath test of which the result is negative. When these purposes have been served the arrest ends: for no charge of an offence under s 1 can be made until the results of the subsequent laboratory analysis of the specimen are known. b

Since there are only two places where the requirement may be made on a person to provide a specimen for a laboratory test—a police station and a hospital—the constable must take the arrested person to the one place or the other if he is not already there. I see nothing in the language of the Act to debar a constable from exercising his discretion to take an arrested person to whichever he honestly considers is the more appropriate in the particular circumstances of the arrest. If the person who has taken the breath test with positive results at some place other than a hospital, appears to the constable to be in need of medical examination or treatment but refuses to go to a hospital voluntarily the constable is entitled to arrest him and to take him there. If he is admitted as a patient at the hospital, the requirement may be made on him there to provide a specimen for a laboratory test, if the doctor in charge of his case is notified and does not object. But the arrest must be suspended on his admission as a patient. If he is not admitted as a patient, the constable cannot make the requirement at the hospital, but may take the arrested person on to a police station and make the requirement there. c

Similarly, as regards the next part of the purpose of an arrest under the Act. If the requirement to provide a specimen for a laboratory test has been lawfully made on a person while at a hospital as a patient, the opportunity to provide the specimen must be given to him there and he is under no obligation to provide it elsewhere. So long as he remains as a patient of that hospital, the power to keep him under arrest continues to be suspended. Ex hypothesi it is not needed for the purpose of detaining him there while he is being given the opportunity to provide the specimen there and has either done so or refused or failed to do so. But if before this stage is completed he discharges himself or ceases for some other reason to be a patient, there is, in my view, nothing in the Act to debar the constable from arresting or re-arresting him and, in the exercise of the constable's discretion, either (a) detaining him at the hospital until he can be given the opportunity of providing a specimen there pursuant to the requirement already made or (b) taking him to a police station for the purpose of making on him at the police station a fresh requirement to provide a specimen elsewhere than at the hospital. d

If the constable exercises his discretion to take an arrested person to a police station either at the outset (which would be the normal course unless the arrested person appeared to be injured) or after he has been at a hospital as a patient but has ceased to be a patient before providing a specimen for a laboratory test pursuant to a requirement made on him there, in either of these events the combined effect of ss 2 (7) and 3 (1) of the Act is to entitle the arrested person (whether or not he has previously taken a breath test) to be given an opportunity to take a breath test at the police e a station, before any requirement may be made on him there to provide a specimen for a laboratory test. It is only if he fails to avail himself of the opportunity or the result of the breath test taken at the police station is positive, that a requirement may be made on him to the police station to provide a specimen for a laboratory test.

Section 2 (7) is in the following terms:

b 'A person arrested under this section or under . . . section 6 (4) [of the Road Traffic Act 1960] shall, while at a police station, be given an opportunity to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test there.'

These words do not impose in express terms any obligation on a constable to take an arrested person to a police station. All that they do expressly is to say what must be done if he is taken there. To construe them as imposing an obligation to take every arrested person to a police station would involve departing from the literal in favour of a purposive construction of the Act. But if a purposive construction be adopted I find it impossible to impute to Parliament the intention that an arrested person, however much in need of urgent hospital treatment, must be taken to a police station and not to a hospital, when the Act itself provides that the purpose of his arrest, viz the requirement to provide and the actual provision of a specimen for a laboratory test, may be achieved as well at a hospital as at a police station.

d My Lords, ss 2 (7) and 3 (1) are no doubt drafted with the ordinary circumstances in mind in which a person arrested under the Act or under s 6 (4) of the 1960 Act is taken to a police station. Normally he will have been taken there after at best a roadside breath test or it may be no breath test at all. I suggested in *Director of Public Prosecutions v Carey*¹ that the reason for giving an opportunity for a breath test at the police station was that there was less likelihood of error there than in a test taken on the road or other public place where any previous breath test would have been taken. But the requirement is explicit. It applies however free from possibility of error any previous breath test may have been. So if after having taken a breath test but not a blood test while at a hospital as a patient, a person on ceasing to be a patient is arrested and instead of being kept at the hospital is taken, in the exercise of the constable's discretion, to a police station for his blood test, he must be given an opportunity of taking another breath test there. It was this that was omitted in *Bosley v Long*². This omission too would justify the actual decision in that case.

f My Lords, it is no doubt legitimate to describe as 'safeguards' both the opportunity to take a breath test which is a condition precedent to requiring a suspect who is under arrest at a police station to undergo a blood test, and the notifying and acquiescence of the doctor in charge of his case which is a condition precedent to requiring a suspect who is a patient at a hospital to undergo a similar test. But they are imposed for quite different objects: the object of the first is to protect the suspect's liberty by gaining his release from arrest if the breath test has negative results; the object of the second is to protect the suspect's health. They are alternative not cumulative. The suspect is entitled either to the one or to the other according to the category into which he falls. They are conditions precedent to the making of the requirement to undergo a blood test. Once it has been made these conditions precedent are spent. What the suspect is entitled to thereafter is an opportunity to provide a specimen for a blood test in compliance, both as to the place and manner of provision, with a requirement which had already been lawfully made.

h The Divisional Court in *Bosley v Long*³ fell into error in regarding the condition precedent in the case of a suspect who is at a hospital as a patient as being a 'continuing safeguard', which the Court of Appeal in the instant case has taken to mean that the doctor must be given a continuing opportunity to object not only before the requirement has been made but also after it has been made until the specimen has actually been provided. From this they drew the conclusion that the provision of the specimen for the blood test, though it took place at the hospital, would not be in compliance with the Act if, as a result of the doctor's ceasing to be in charge of the suspect's case, that safeguard were withdrawn. a

My Lords, I have already indicated why this conclusion is not warranted by the express words of s 3 (2). What the Court of Appeal has done is not to construe the words of the Act itself, but to start with the concept of a 'continuing safeguard' to which, a passing, though mistaken, reference was made by the Divisional Court in *Bosley v Long*¹ and to carry that concept to its logical conclusion. This is an Act in which, as experience has shown, the express words used by the draftsman sometimes compel the courts to give effect to technical defences by those who drink too much and drive, which it can hardly be supposed that Parliament envisaged when the Act was passed. The express words of the Act do not compel this House to give effect to the technical defence, devoid as it is of any merit, on which the respondent relies in the instant case. And I see no other reason which would justify this House in doing so. b

N Ltd, the original petitioner for the compulsory winding-up of a company, having been paid the debt claimed and costs, including the fee on presentation of the petition and costs of advertising, dropped out, and another creditor, who had appeared to support the original petition and been substituted as petitioner, obtained a winding-up order against the company, but no provision was made at the hearing of that petition for the original petitioner's costs. Motion

- On 16th October 1972 a winding-up order was made against Castle, Coulson & MacDonald Ltd ('the company'), on the petition of the Department of Health and Social Security ('the department'), and it was ordered that the costs of the department and of the company in respect of the petition be taxed and paid for out of the assets of the company. The winding-up petition had originally been presented by Nickeloid Ltd ('the original petitioner') but it had dropped out and the department, another creditor of the company, had been substituted by the court as petitioner on 10th July 1972.
- g* By notice of motion dated 6th April 1973 the original petitioner applied to the court under the slip rule (RSC Ord 20, r 11) for an order that the order made on 16th October 1972 to wind up the company be amended so as to include its costs, such costs to be taxed and paid out of the assets of the company. The application was opposed by the joint liquidators of the company.

TEMPLEMAN J. In this case a petition was presented by Nickeloid Ltd, the original petitioner, to wind up a company, Castle Coulson & MacDonald Ltd. In connection with that petition the original petitioner had to advertise and pay the fee on presentation of the petition. When the case came before the court the company paid the original petitioner the debt claimed and costs, including the fee on presentation and the costs of advertising. a

But another creditor who appeared to support the original petition claimed to be substituted, and he was substituted; and in the event a winding-up order was made at the behest of the substituted petitioner. The result is that the winding-up order dates back to the original petition and all the money which has been received by the original petitioner must be paid back to the liquidators. The original petitioner dropped out of the case when the substituted petitioner was substituted and never subsequently appeared to argue about costs or for any other purpose. Now the original petitioner, having to pay back all the costs and all the debt he had been paid, appears to say: 'Please let me have the costs of advertising the original petition and the fee on presentation of the petition because they were inevitably incurred in order to wind up this company; there has been a winding-up as the result of the petition and the result of the costs I incurred and therefore I ought to have those costs; it is unfair that the other creditors should benefit from my expenditure which was necessary in order to get them the relief which they got at the end of the day, namely, a winding-up.' b

In *Re Bostels Ltd*¹ a similar point arose. There, when the original petitioner dropped out and a substituted petitioner came in, the original petitioner took the precaution of becoming a supporting creditor. At the end of the day there was an argument whether the original petitioner should be allowed any and, if so, what costs. According to the headnote² Pennycuik J held that— c

'In so far as the activities of the original petitioner contributed to the obtaining of a winding-up order the costs of those activities ought to be included in the costs of the petition; that such costs usually comprised the fee on presentation of the petition and the costs of advertisement, but not the costs of preparing and appearing upon the petition, which costs had to be incurred for a second time; and that accordingly the costs of the petition would include the original petitioner's costs limited to the fee on presentation of the petition and the costs of advertising.' d

'Per curiam: Where a company offers a petitioner payment in full of his debts and costs, that offer carries the detriment that on a winding-up order being made at the instance of a substituted petitioner the original petitioner will lose his prospective right to receive the costs already incurred; accordingly, the original petitioner may choose whether to accept or refuse the payment.' e

That proviso of course, applies to the costs which a petitioner loses if he opts out, namely his costs of appearing on the petition. But so far as the costs of advertising and the fee on presentation are concerned, Bostels' case¹ clearly decides that these were activities which enured for the benefit of creditors, they saved money in that there was no need to go again through the process of advertising or presenting a petition, and that it was right and proper that in those circumstances the original petitioner's costs, limited to the fee on presentation of the petition and costs of advertising, should be allowed. f

The only difference between that case and this, which counsel for the liquidators says is a vital difference, is that in Bostels' case¹ the original petitioner, instead of dropping out altogether, became a supporting creditor. That meant that he presumably had to appear by counsel whenever the petition was adjourned from time to time; if ultimately all the creditors had been satisfied and the petition dismissed, then the original petitioner's counsel would have folded up his tent and gone away saying nothing. If on the other hand there was no satisfaction of all the creditors and a winding-up order was made then it was the duty of counsel acting for the original petitioner g

- a on the very last day, after all the adjournments and alterations which one knows take place when companies are fighting to satisfy all their creditors and succeeding in satisfying some but not others, at the very last moment just as the drop fell and the company was executed, to get up and ask in as few words as possible that the original petitioner be allowed the fee on presentation of the petition and the costs of advertising—and the court would automatically make an order accordingly. Of
- b course the original petitioner can ask the substituted petitioner to allow his counsel and solicitor to represent the original petitioner but this takes a little time and some arranging and is not always desirable or possible to effect.

In the present case the original petitioner did not see fit to waste expense or the time of counsel. In the event an order was made on the winding-up which did not provide for the costs of the original petitioner. The original petitioner now appears under the slip rule¹, asking me to correct the order and insert a provision which will enable him to retain those costs which Pennycuik V-C has plainly decided ought, in fairness to original petitioners, to be allowed.

- c Counsel for the liquidators submits that the court has no jurisdiction to accede to the request of the original petitioner because he is not a party. He cited for that proposition one sentence in *Edginton v Clark*². The sentence he cited was in a judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by Upjohn LJ³:

‘The High Court still has in our view a full and ample power to make such order as to costs as between plaintiffs, defendants and third and subsequent parties as the justice of the case may require, and so ex concessis has the county court.’

- e It does not seem to me that that sentence sheds any light on the present problem. The case was not read to me but so far as I can ascertain there was no question there of whether a party was entitled to costs or whether the costs were ordered against a person who was not a party. In the present case the original petitioner was a party. True he dropped out when the substituted petitioner came in but I see no reason why in justice and fairness he ought not to be awarded costs, if he is entitled to them
- f on general principles, incurred while he was a party. It is clear to me that it cannot be said that the mouth of the court is closed merely because an actual order was not made in favour of the original petitioner at a time when he was a party.

- The matter does not end there. The order made did not provide for the costs of the original petitioner. Counsel for the original petitioner accepts that the only way he can now get his costs provided for is under the slip rule¹. He cited to me *Re Inchcape, Craigmyle v Inchcape*⁴ and in particular the passages⁵ where Morton J accepted that the slip rule could be used to correct an accidental omission on the part of counsel to make an application as well as accidental omissions by solicitors engaged in the case and accidental omissions, if any, by the officials of the court themselves. Counsel for the liquidators says that in the present case there was no accidental omission because all that happened was that the original petitioner did not turn up. But
- h in my judgment there was an accidental omission both by the court and everybody concerned in the case. Of course nobody was to blame. But the fact of the matter was that if the judge had had his attention drawn to *Re Bostels Ltd*⁶ he would have said: ‘What about the costs of the original petitioner? Ought we not to provide for them?’ and after a certain amount of observation I have no doubt that an order would have been made.

If counsel for the liquidators is right, then whenever the original petitioner drops out altogether he has to waste the time of his own solicitor and counsel by turning up at every adjournment on every day and make arrangements to protect the original petitioner. It seems to me proper to make an order that the costs of the petition shall include the costs of the original petitioner limited as set out in *Re Bostels Ltd*¹, namely, the costs of the advertising and the fee on presentation, just as in trust cases if anybody dies or drops out his costs can be included in the costs of some other party who is in the same interest. Counsel for the liquidators says that the costs may not have been paid by the company. So be it. All that is required is an order that the costs of the petition are to include the costs of the original petitioner limited to the fee on presentation of the petition and the costs of advertisement so far as they have been paid or have been agreed to be paid by the company. Of course in practice there will be no necessity for another payment if the company have already paid the original petitioner. The original petitioner will simply hang on to the costs he has already been paid by the company. He will not have to pay them back. If the liquidators think they are excessive then they can require a taxation.

Counsel for the liquidators had a further argument: he said that even if I had jurisdiction, which he stoutly denied, I should not exercise my discretion in favour of the original petitioner because there had been delay and the amount involved might be only £16—or, as appears from Bostels' case¹, might in certain cases be up to £30 or £50. In my judgment I am putting right something which ought to have been attended to in accordance with the principles of Bostels' case¹ earlier on. The fact that the amount is small does not affect me. There is nothing in the point on delay. This argument may lead to a certain amount of saving of costs and avoidance of time wasting by counsel. In future where a company is wound up by the court at the behest of a substituted petitioner the term 'usual compulsory order' will, unless the court otherwise directs, contain a provision including in the costs of the petition the fee on presentation and the costs of advertising the petition insofar as these have been paid by the company. No doubt the exact form of the order can be hallowed by the officials of the Companies Court.

In respect of the costs of the present motion I think the proper course is to make no order. The liquidators will get their costs out of the company and the original petitioner will have to bear his own costs. I so decide for these reasons. The original petitioner claimed by his motion much wider relief than he has in fact received. Secondly, he applied under the slip rule. He could have taken the precaution of becoming a supporting creditor. It does not seem to me that he is entitled to his costs. So far as the liquidators are concerned, it is true that they could not have acceded to any request without an order of the court. But the amounts involved in the costs of presenting the petition and advertising are small. There could have been an agreed order which costs little. There has been a useful and wide ranging argument on the principle, and the liquidators thought fit to argue that nothing should be allowed. On that argument I have briefly found against them. In all the circumstances I make no order for costs.

Order accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

STEPHENSON LJ, PARK AND KILNER BROWN JJ

8th FEBRUARY, 16th MARCH 1973

Criminal law – Obtaining pecuniary advantage by deception – Evasion of debt – Meaning of evasion – Evasion of payment – Agreement by creditor to cancel or forgive debt – Worthless cheque – Representation that cheque good and valid order for payment – Acceptance of cheque by creditor as payment – Cheque dishonoured – Whether debt ‘evaded’ although no agreement on part of creditor that debt should be cancelled or forgiven – Theft Act 1968, s 16 (1), (2) (a).

The appellant had a bank account which was overdrawn. The appellant was told by the bank manager not to issue any more cheques. Thereafter the appellant issued five cheques drawn on the account to different people as payment for goods and services supplied to him. The cheques were all dishonoured. The appellant was charged on five counts with obtaining a pecuniary advantage by deception, contrary to s 16 (1)^a of the Theft Act 1968. Each count alleged that the appellant had dishonestly obtained for himself a pecuniary advantage, namely the evasion of a debt, by deception, namely by a false oral representation that the cheque was a good and valid order for payment of the sum in question. The appellant was convicted on each count and appealed, contending, inter alia, that the Crown had failed to establish that he had obtained the ‘evasion’ of the debts as charged in the indictment for, to establish that the debts had been ‘evaded’ within s 16 (2) (a) of the 1968 Act, it had to be shown that he had deceived his victims into agreeing to forgive or cancel those debts altogether and there was no evidence that the victims had done that.

Held – A person ‘evaded’ a debt for which he was liable if he evaded payment of the debt; the word evaded referred to the acts of the debtor not those of the creditor; it was the debtor who evaded the debt, not the creditor. Accordingly a debtor could dishonestly obtain the advantage of having the payment of his debt evaded by falsely pretending that his cheque was a good and valid order to pay without his creditor agreeing to cancel or forgive the debt. All that had to be found was that as a result of the deception the creditor had done, or refrained from doing, something which enabled the debtor to get out of payment even though the creditor did not appreciate that that was the effect of what he was doing or not doing. Accordingly the appellant had been properly convicted and the appeal would be dismissed (see p 825 b c and d e and p 826 a b, c, e and g h, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Eric Baker Fazackerley against his conviction in the Crown Court at Liverpool on 14th July 1972 before Judge Davies QC and a jury on five counts of obtaining a pecuniary advantage (the evasion of a debt) by deception (counts 1, 4, 5, 6 and 7), contrary to s 16 of the Theft Act 1968, and one count (count 3) of obtaining property by deception, contrary to s 15 of that Act. He was sentenced to concurrent terms of two years' imprisonment. It was also ordered that a suspended sentence of six months' imprisonment imposed on 2nd June 1971 for obtaining property by deception should be activated and ordered to run consecutively, making 2½ years' imprisonment in all. He appealed against his conviction by leave of the single judge. His principal ground of appeal was that the trial judge had wrongly rejected a submission made on his behalf that the payment of an existing debt by a cheque which was not met on presentment was not an 'evasion' of a debt within the meaning of s 16 of the Theft Act 1968. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. c

16th March. STEPHENSON LJ. The judgment I am about to read is the judgment of the whole court including Park J, who is unable to be here today. The appellant was convicted on 14th July 1972 at Liverpool Crown Court on five counts of obtaining a pecuniary advantage by deception contrary to s 16 of the Theft Act 1968, and one count of obtaining property by deception contrary to s 15. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment concurrent on each count, and a suspended sentence of six months for obtaining property and pecuniary advantage by deception was activated consecutively. f

He appeals against his convictions by leave of the single judge. Count 1 alleged that the appellant on 13th January 1972 in the county of Lancaster dishonestly obtained for himself a pecuniary advantage, namely the evasion of a debt for which he was then liable to Douglas Bolton, by deception, namely by a false oral representation that his brother Derek Fazackerley was a solicitor in Preston and would that day give to him the sum of £2,500 to be paid into the appellant's bank account and that a cheque for £793·62 drawn on Barclays Bank Ltd which the appellant then handed to Douglas Bolton was a good and valid order for the payment of £793·62. All the other counts charging offences against s 16 were in the same form, except that the only oral representation charged in them was that the cheque was a good and valid order. g

The appellant was the owner of a catering business. In December 1971 he decided to combine that business with 'show' business and on New Year's Eve he put on a 'pop' show at a hall in Southport, running the buffet in conjunction with it. The show was a success and thereafter he and a man named Mahony, who used the stage name h

- a of Brian King, decided to put on some 'pop' shows with the help of £500, which, according to the appellant, King agreed to put into the venture. According to King the payment of £500 was discussed but not finally agreed. The appellant at the time had a bank account at the Formby branch of Barclays Bank in the name of 'Eric Baker Fazackerley, Personal Caterers'. This account was overdrawn and at the end of December 1971 the bank manager telephoned the appellant and told him not to issue any more cheques as his account was without funds. The Crown's case was
- b that in spite of this warning from his bank manager the appellant subsequently issued six cheques amounting in all to £2,118.62 for goods and services with full knowledge that they would not be met, and that thereby the debts for which he was liable were evaded.

- The appellant's case was that he did not himself speak to the bank manager but merely got a message from which he did not understand that his account was empty.
- c His defence to all charges was that he was not dishonest but honestly believed that his cheques would be met either from King's £500 or from the proceeds of 'pop' shows. It was common ground that the appellant was almost illiterate and signed blank cheques to be filled in either by King or a woman employee or by the payee. The facts in chronological order of the offences of which he was convicted are as follows.
- d On 6th January 1972 he gave Miss Webster of Granada Television a cheque for £200 in payment for two seven second television advertisements. The advertisements were transmitted as agreed on 8th January but the cheque was not honoured. The appellant said that when he made out the cheque he thought he had in his account King's £500 and other sums of money received from the sale of tickets and paid into his account by King. King, on the other hand, said that the appellant knew full well that he was unable to raise the £500. On 10th January the appellant purchased a Ford Zodiac motor
- e car for £175 from Robert Farrington and paid for it by cheque. Robert Edwin Farrington, the son of Robert Farrington, gave evidence that he filled in the cheque when he received it from the appellant after questioning the appellant about the cheque and being told by him 'Yes, there is money in my account'. The cheque was dishonoured. This was the subject of count 3 alleging an offence against s 15. The
- f appellant denied that he had obtained this car from the son; he said that he had obtained it from the father. He denied the conversation about the cheque and said that he thought that the cheque was good. On 13th January Mr Bolton of Modcor Ltd demanded payment for goods obtained by the appellant in November and December to the value of £793.62. The appellant gave him a cheque for that amount informing him that his account was low but the cheque would be met by the afternoon because his brother, who was a solicitor, was backing him and would supply
- g the money. The story about the brother being a solicitor was false and the cheque was subsequently dishonoured. The appellant denied that he had said anything about a brother or a solicitor. All he said to Mr Bolton was that his account was low and if he had waited until the following week before presenting the cheque he would get paid because the appellant was expecting to receive money from two shows on 14th and 15th January. On 14th January the appellant gave Mr Durkin, a theatrical agent,
- h a cheque for £250 for supplying the stage artists who were appearing at his shows. Mr Durkin enquired if the cheque was good and the appellant replied: 'It is, my backer is Lord Lilford. He is prepared to back me for £80,000.' (There was no reference to the representation about Lord Lilford and the £80,000 in the indictment.) This cheque was dishonoured. The appellant admitted saying that Lord Lilford was backing him and that it was a lie, but he denied mentioning £80,000. He thought that
- i the cheque would be met and had taken no steps to stop it, although he claimed to have given in to a threatening demand for money from the stage groups by payments of over £250, including £120 in cash. On 15th January the appellant gave Mr Latham a cheque for £400 for the hire and installation of electrical equipment for his shows and Mr Jones, the manager of the Winter Gardens, a cheque for £300 for the hire of the hall. He overcame Mr Latham's reluctance to accept the cheque by assuring him it was good and would, if Mr Latham wished it, be cashed by the manager of Dixieland. The cheque was not cashed by the manager of Dixieland, who was in fact Mr Jones, manager also of the Winter Gardens, and who would have refused to cash the cheque if he had been asked. These two cheques were, like the others, dishonoured. The appellant claimed to have been expecting a great deal of money from his shows from which these cheques would have been met, but the shows on 14th and 15th January were, in fact, financial 'flops', and the Crown claimed that the appellant must have known that when he gave these cheques. a

On 13th February the appellant made a written statement ending with these words:

'I would estimate that from the 7th to the 14th January, 1972 I made out about nineteen cheques for the sum of about £2½ thousand pounds. I was aware that I did not have sufficient money in the bank to meet these cheques.'

Counsel for the appellant first submitted that the jury's verdicts on all counts should be quashed on the ground that the judge had wrongly admitted evidence of the appellant's bad character and previous convictions for offences of dishonesty. Counsel for the appellant has convinced us that he has cause to complain of the manner in which the evidence was introduced by the judge but not that the evidence ought to have been excluded. The evidence was admitted not because the appellant had given evidence of his good character (though that was at one stage canvassed) but because the nature or conduct of his defence was such as to involve imputations on the character of two witnesses for the Crown, Mahoney known as Brian King and Farrington, or to give him his full name, Robert Edwin Farrington. In deciding whether their characters were attacked we have not the help of a transcript of much of the evidence because the shorthand-writer has emigrated; or of complete agreement between counsel as to what all the most material questions and answers were. What is, however, clear is that while the appellant was giving evidence-in-chief the judge himself anticipated an application by counsel for the Crown for leave to cross-examine the appellant on his previous convictions and raised the question with counsel in the absence of the jury. It appears that the appellant had said in chief of King that he had used money, which the appellant expected to be paid over to him, for financing other shows (whether the appellant said for other shows which had nothing to do with him was disputed), and that after it had been suggested to Farrington in cross-examination that he had not himself been concerned in taking the appellant's cheque but the whole transaction had been between the appellant and his father, the judge had himself driven the appellant, while still giving evidence-in-chief, to allege that Farrington's evidence had been a tissue of lies. We are reluctant to criticise the judge without a transcript of what exactly he asked, but we call attention to the observations of the Court of Criminal Appeal in *R v Eidinow*¹, to which counsel for the appellant referred us. Counsel pointed out to the judge that as regards King the appellant had been at pains to disclaim any suggestion that he was dishonest and that as regards Farrington counsel himself had been put in a difficulty when young Farrington entered the witness box instead of his father, and he had to improvise his cross-examination and suggest more about the falsity of his evidence than he was later able to substantiate; Farrington was, in fact, recalled to be cross-examined further not only about his own convictions but also to meet the suggestion that if he had filled in the cheque which the appellant had signed, he had filled it in after the deal with his father had been completed and the appellant had left. c
f

We would not encourage counsel to think that they can attack the honesty of a witness in fact but avoid the damaging consequences of the attack by disclaiming any intention to do so. We cannot, however, on the material we have, safely uphold the judge's admission of the appellant's criminal record on the ground that he had made imputations on King's character, but we can and do uphold it on the ground i a that he had made imputations on Farrington's character before ever the judge drove him to admit that he had in effect done so. We bear in mind that a mere denial of the charge, expressed it may be in emphatic language, will not expose a defendant's bad character to the jury (*Selvey v Director of Public Prosecutions*¹) but we think that counsel is right in submitting for the Crown that what was put to Farrington went beyond such denial into suggestions that his evidence was a complete invention, and that the judge was right in holding that there was no possibility of mistake and this was perjury if it was not true. Farrington gave evidence of, among other things, a specific assurance by the appellant in answer to a question that there was money in his account; but the appellant's case put to Farrington in cross-examination (and we have a transcript of this) was that 'everything you have said about this transaction is wrong, because you weren't there, the whole transaction was carried out with your father'. This ground of appeal therefore cannot succeed.

c We take next two further grounds of appeal which concern all the counts on which the appellant was convicted. First it is said that the judge's direction to the jury on the burden of proof was defective in that having properly told them that they had to be satisfied by the prosecution so that they were sure of guilt, he repeatedly told them thereafter that they had to be satisfied but never repeated that what he meant by satisfied was what he had already told them, or reminded them that they had to be sure. In our opinion, this was quite unnecessary. There was nothing wrong with the judge's direction in this respect. There is nothing in this ground.

d Next it is said that the judge's direction to the jury on corroboration of the witness King was defective; he directed them to treat King as an accomplice, gave them a correct warning of the danger of acting on his evidence unless it was corroborated but never told them what corroboration meant or what matters were capable of corroborating his evidence. All this was true and might in another case be material. But it was only the judge who thought, wrongly, that King was an accomplice. We are told that neither counsel had suggested that he was but the judge unfortunately suggested it for the first time in his summing-up—unfortunately because it is the fate of ideas which come from the Bench without being initiated by the Bar or submitted to the Bar for comment to provide unnecessary and not always unsuccessful grounds for appeal. There is nothing in this ground either.

f We come last to a ground of appeal which does not affect count 3. On the other counts charging offences against s 16 counsel for the appellant submits that what the Crown established was not the obtaining of the evasion of a debt for which the appellant was liable, as charged in the indictment, but as at best the obtaining of the deferment of a debt, of which of course he was not and could not be convicted. The appellant in fact evaded these six debts, that is to say, the payment of these debts: *R v Page*², approved on that point in *R v Locker*³; but he did not, it is submitted, obtain that evasion by giving 'dud' cheques. To obtain that particular pecuniary advantage by deception he had to deceive his victims into agreeing to forgive or cancel those debts altogether, and that was not in accordance with the evidence or with the directions of the trial judge. In effect we are asked to adopt the view of Professor Smith that *R v Page*², a decision on evasion, was wrongly decided, even if it was not impliedly overruled by *R v Locker*³, a decision on deferment which applies to evasion as well: see his *Law of Theft*⁴.

The judge told the jury that they were concerned with—j 'evading a debt, evading the payment of a debt. That is the advantage which the prosecution say the [appellant] obtained' in the case of each of these six offences on this count, with which he is charged. Now, evading a debt doesn't mean cancelling it, it doesn't mean destroying it for ever, indeed, although a debt can be cancelled there are probably only two or three ways in which that can be done—by paying it, of course, by having a creditor let you off, of himself, by limitation—that is by a lapse of time that sort of thing. None of these situations affect us here; what is alleged against the [appellant] here is not that he got the debt cancelled altogether, but that he evaded payment of it, and, of course, as you can see at once, there must be many ways in which you can evade payments, and after all to evade only means, to use a colloquialism, to dodge. In this case [the learned judge went on] it is said the [appellant] evaded payment in each case by presenting a cheque and a cheque which was, in fact, a false cheque, in the sense that at the time that it was presented and indeed, say the prosecution, in the expectation of the [appellant] that it was to be cashed, there would be no money to meet it. So it is what ordinary people would call a 'dud' cheque. The prosecution say that by means of that deception in each case, because obviously to put forward a false cheque, pretending it is a good cheque is deception, by means of that deception in each case, say the prosecution, the [appellant] managed to evade payments of money that he owed to the person who received the cheque.' a

But, says counsel for the appellant, the judge did not tell the jury that before they could convict on any of these counts they must be satisfied that the representations expressly made at the time the cheques were given or implied in the giving of the cheques operated on the mind of the victims or induced them to accept a cheque instead of cash. He is criticised for that, although no point has been taken that some of the representations may have been made by conduct only, yet all were charged in the indictment as oral. But what he did say before reviewing the different charges and with particular reference to the first and fifth counts was that there must 'be proof of deception', and I read from the transcript: d

'... a deception done by the [appellant] and deliberately done. Of course, no accidental deception could possibly give rise to a criminal charge of this kind—deliberately done, that that deception deceived the victim, in this case the representative. And the particular cheque—if you hand a false cheque to someone and he knows it is a false cheque or even strongly suspects it is a false cheque, so as to put him on a serious enquiry, well then, he has not been deceived and this offence has not been proved in that case against the [appellant]. But, if there is a deception and he has deceived and if, as a result of that deception, the [appellant] obtains the advantage even though only temporarily, of evading the payment of the debt, and if you are satisfied that in the course of that transaction the [appellant] was acting dishonestly, and that members of the jury, like all matters of fact, is very much a matter for your common sense, if you are satisfied on all these matters, that the charge in that case is proved.' f

Later he said: '... it will matter, in relation to these offences [including count 3] whether the witnesses were, in fact, deceived or not.' He did not repeat this sort of language in dealing with counts 2 and 7 but dealing with the others he referred either to the victims being deceived or to their questioning the cheques at the time the appellant gave them. For instance in relation to count 4 he asked if Miss Webster, the Granada Television representative, was deceived: h

'Was she given a cheque which she thought was a good cheque? You may think it perfectly obvious that she would never have dreamed of accepting it, had she thought anything else.' j

We think that there was no need for the judge to underline the obvious any further and that the jury must have understood that before they could convict they had to be satisfied that the victims believed the cheques to be good and would not have

- a taken them if they had not. None of the appellant's creditors was in the peculiar position of Locker's landlord¹, who had taken his cheques in payment of rent before, and there was, in our judgment, enough evidence (not much being needed) for the jury to draw the inference that his creditors were in fact and as a matter of cause and effect induced by the appellant's representation that these cheques were good into doing or refraining from doing something whereby he was enabled to evade the debts: *R v Locker*²; *Ray v Sempers*³. Were taking a cheque and refraining from taking immediate payment in cash things which enabled the appellant to obtain the pecuniary advantage of evading (payment of) his debts?

We think that they were and that thereby the appellant did obtain an evasion of his debts. We reconsider with some trepidation the language of s 16, of which the material parts are the following:

- c '(1) A person who by any deception [that is as defined in s 15 (4) of the Act] dishonestly obtains for himself . . . any pecuniary advantage shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.
- (2) The cases in which a pecuniary advantage within the meaning of this section is to be regarded as obtained for a person are cases where—(a) any debt . . . for which he . . . is . . . liable . . . is reduced or in whole or in part evaded or deferred . . .

- This section appears to be concerned primarily with advantage to the debtor obtained from a creditor, more with what the debtor gets than with what the creditor loses, as was pointed out in *R v Locker*². One kind of advantage is the evasion of a debt. A debtor may evade or get out of paying a debt for a time (when it is 'deferred') or in part (when it is 'reduced' or 'in part evaded') or indefinitely and completely (when it is 'in whole evaded'). We would have thought that the word 'evasion' could have covered all those cases and reduction and deferment would then be simply particular species of evasion. If that is right a cheque may be a means of evading payment of a due debt altogether, where there are no funds and no likelihood of there ever being funds in the bank on which it is drawn to meet it and no authority from the bank to overdraw; or of deferring payment, where there is authority to overdraw or there are funds or will be by or soon after the date on which it is given or presented; or of reducing payment, where there is authority to overdraw or there are funds but not to an amount large enough to meet the cheque in full. Where in fact one of these results is achieved by a debtor pretending that his cheques will be honoured, why does he not obtain an evasion, deferment or reduction? Why should he not be convicted of thereby obtaining an evasion, as in *R v Page*⁴, or a deferment, as in *R v Plunkett*⁵, unless the circumstances, including the creditor's state of mind, are as peculiar as they were in *R v Locker*⁶.
- e
- g

- We know that this view conflicts with the opinion already noticed that the creditor must agree to the evasion, deferment or reduction before the debtor can offend against the section, and that it may be inconsistent with the reasoning in *R v Locker*⁶, although it seems to be in accord with the observations of this court in R v Aston, *R v Hadley*⁷.
- h

- As we have to decide whether the appellant obtained the advantage of evading a debt by deception, not of deferring it, we do not have to say whether in what circumstances a debt may be deferred by a worthless cheque. We can see good, though perhaps not conclusive, grounds for holding that there must be an agreement by the creditor to defer—or to reduce. It is the creditor who defers—or reduces—a payment, as it is the creditor who allows the debtor to borrow or take out a policy under s 16 (2) (b) and the creditor who gives the debtor the opportunity to earn remuneration or win money under s 16 (2) (c). But it is the debtor who evades the debt. It is only by a most unnatural stretch of language that the creditor can be said to evade the debt. If what was meant by 'in whole or in part evaded' was not 'evaded by the debtor' but 'forgiven or cancelled by the creditor', it seems odd that the section does not say so and substitute remission or cancellation for evasion. And if 'cancelled' is substituted for 'evaded' how does 'in part cancelled' differ from 'reduced'? It is perhaps significant that in equating evasion with cancellation Professor Smith never refers to 'in part evaded' but appears to confine his discussion of evasion to total evasion.

We start by giving 'evaded' its ordinary meaning, so familiar in connection with liability for tax, and we see no reason why a debtor cannot dishonestly obtain the advantage of having the payment of his debt evaded by his deception of falsely pretending that his cheque is a good and valid order to pay without his creditor agreeing to cancel or forgive the debt, either in whole or in part. That may have been this court's approach in *R v Page*¹. We do not see anything inconsistent with it in what this court said in *R v Locker*² about deferment or evasion. About deferment the court said that there must be a deception which is intended by the debtor to induce the creditor to refrain from requiring or enforcing the payment of the debt on the due date and that the deception has in fact been effective in causing or inducing the creditor so to refrain. About evasion the court, invited to say whether *R v Page*¹ was correctly decided, said that it was correctly decided on the point that evasion of a debt meant evasion of the payment of the debt, but by its silence declined to express any view on the correctness of the decision that Page had, by giving worthless cheques to a car hirer, obtained the evasion of a debt.

Even if there must, therefore, be an agreement by the creditor to defer (or reduce) a debt we are not bound to hold that there must be an agreement by the creditor to evade it—or to let the debtor evade it—in whole or in part. Indeed to do so would do violence to the English language, would make 'in part evaded' a tautologous repetition of 'reduced' and would restrict the application of this part of the subsection to kind-hearted creditors taken in by 'hard luck' stories and to such odd cases as that suggested by counsel for the appellant of a passenger deceiving an official by brandishing a bogus pass into letting him travel by public transport without paying his fare. In our judgment, all that must be found is that as a result of the deception the creditor has done or refrained from doing something which enables the debtor to get out of payment, even without the creditor appreciating that that is the effect of what he is doing or not doing.

On the facts of this case there can be no question that the appellant evaded or 'dodged' all payment of the debts referred to in the indictment (although no creditor agreed to cancel any of them) and in our opinion the jury were entitled to find that the evasion was caused or achieved by the appellant's deception of his creditors into believing that his cheques would be met. We are, therefore of opinion that this ground of appeal fails.

It was argued also that there was no proper direction that young Farrington must have been induced to part with the motor car which was the subject of count 3 before the jury could convict the appellant of an offence against s 15, in that the judge had told the jury in effect that it did not matter whether it was young Farrington or his father who was deceived. In his summing-up the judge said:

'... he gave it [his cheque] to old Mr Farrington and he got the car from old Mr Farrington, but is there any doubt at all that he did pass the cheque? It was,

- a* in fact, a useless cheque, and he did obtain the motor car by means of that cheque—was that a deception? Well, members of the jury, what else could it be; is there any possible way in which you could consider that either old Mr Farrington or young Mr Farrington would have allowed their motor car to pass out of their possession if they had known or even really suspected that that cheque was anything but what it seemed? You are entitled to use your common sense
- b* in drawing inferences at that time. You must ask yourselves specifically in relation to that count, as you did in relation to the others, did the [appellant] know, are you satisfied he knew that his account was not there to meet the cheque, and was that his intention? Was his intention dishonest?

- We think that this direction correctly directed the jury's minds to the real issue on this part of the case and could not have misled the jury into thinking that they could
- c* convict the appellant if they disbelieved young Farrington's evidence. This was a plain case on the facts. The appellant in his statement had virtually pleaded guilty to what would once have been offences of obtaining property by falsely pretending that his cheques were good. There was no misdirection on the law on our view of it. The appeal against conviction on all counts fails.

- d* We would add that there were 34 other charges of obtaining the evasion of debts by worthless cheques which ultimately the appellant refused to have taken into consideration. If *R v Page*¹ was wrongly decided and *R v Plunkett*² was rightly decided, if we are wrong and counsel for the Crown is right, we see no reason on what we have been told why the Crown should not proceed to prosecute the appellant for obtaining the deferment of a debt in respect of those other cheques.

- e* Appeal dismissed. The court certified that the following point of law of general public importance was involved in the decision: 'whether the dishonest offering of a worthless cheque purporting to satisfy a debt for which the drawer is then liable, there being no deception made to the creditor other than the implied representation that the cheque is a good and valid order, and which thereby induces the creditor to believe that he has been paid, constitutes an offence of obtaining a pecuniary advantage by deception in that a debt for which the drawer is then
- f* liable is evaded within s 16 (1) of the Theft Act 1968.' The court, however, refused leave to appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
LORD WIDGERY CJ, JAMES LJ AND NIELD J
20th, 29th MARCH 1973

Criminal law – Obtaining pecuniary advantage by deception – Evasion of debt – Meaning of evasion – Antecedent debt – Worthless cheque – Accused having already incurred liability for debt before cheque handed over – Cheque dishonoured – Whether debt ‘evaded’ – Theft Act 1968, s 16 (2) (a).

The appellant employed B to do decorating work for him. It was agreed that the appellant should pay B £24 per week for the work. At the end of the first week the appellant owed B £24 and a further £14 to B's brother who had assisted B. He gave B a cheque for £38, and B paid his brother £14. At the material time the appellant knew that he had insufficient funds in his account at his bank to meet the cheque. He was convicted of dishonestly obtaining a pecuniary advantage, i.e. the evasion of a debt, by deception, contrary to s 16^a of the Theft Act 1968. On appeal against conviction, Held – Where an accused was liable to his creditor for an antecedent debt the handing over of a worthless cheque to the creditor did not amount to an ‘evasion’ of the debt, within s 16 (2) (a) of the 1968 Act, unless the creditor was shown to have had the opportunity of taking cash but had been induced by deception to take the cheque instead. For that purpose no distinction could be drawn between the ‘evasion’ and the ‘deferment’ of a debt. Accordingly since B and his brother had already furnished the consideration for the appellant's debt when the appellant handed over the worthless cheque, the appellant could not be said to have ‘evaded’ the debt and the appeal would be allowed (see p 830 a b and c to g, post).

Appeal

On 17th May 1972 at Liverpool Crown Court before Judge Nance and a jury the appellant, John Eric Turner, was convicted on four counts of obtaining property

^a Section 16, so far as material, is set out at p 829 h j, post

- a* by deception (counts 1 to 4) and one count (count 7) of obtaining a pecuniary advantage by deception. He was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment concurrent on counts 1 to 4 and to six months' consecutive on count 7, making two years' imprisonment in all. He appealed against his conviction on count 7, on the following grounds: (i) that the trial judge had been wrong in law in rejecting his counsel's submission that there was no case to answer on that count, the ruling being incorrect in the light of *R v Locker*¹; (ii) that the trial judge had been wrong in law in holding that 'to evade a debt' meant 'to evade the payment if only temporarily of the debt for which he was then liable'; that construction did not arise, nor had it been approved in *R v Page*²; further, the construction given was a more accurate description of the term 'defer'; (iii) the trial judge had failed to direct the jury on the meaning of the word 'evasion'; and (iv) the trial judge had failed to direct the jury on the distinction between the evasion and the deferment of a debt; on the facts it was open for them to conclude that the payment of the debt had been deferred and not evaded. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court:

- 29th March. LORD WIDGERY CJ read the following judgment of the court. The court will now give its reasons for the conclusion already announced that the appeal in this case will be allowed and the conviction quashed. On 17th May 1972 the appellant was convicted at the Liverpool Crown Court on five counts of an indictment including one (count 7) charged as follows:
- e*

'At Liverpool in the county of Lancaster dishonestly obtained for himself a pecuniary advantage, namely, the evasion of a debt for which he was then liable to Charles Richard Black and another, by deception, namely, that he presented a cheque to Charles Richard Black for the amount of £38 . . . when he well knew that there were insufficient funds in his bank account to meet the said cheque.'

f

- The evidence relevant to this count may be summarised as follows. At the end of July 1971 Black met the appellant who asked Black to do some decorating work on his behalf. It was agreed that Black should receive £24 per week. It was further agreed between the appellant and Black's brother that the latter should do similar work for the appellant. At the end of the first week the appellant owed Black £24 and his brother £14. The appellant gave Black a cheque for £38 and Black paid his brother £14. The appellant knew that he had not sufficient funds to meet the cheque.
- g*

- The charge was laid under s 16 of the Theft Act 1968 which, so far as material, provides as follows:
- h*

'(1) A person who by any deception dishonestly obtains for himself or another any pecuniary advantage shall on conviction be . . . liable [to a penalty].

- '(2) The cases in which a pecuniary advantage within the meaning of this section is to be regarded as obtained for a person are cases where—(a) any debt or charge for which he makes himself liable or is or may become liable (including one not legally enforceable) is reduced or in whole or in part evaded or deferred
- j*
- ...

The sole question in this appeal is whether the admitted deception practised by the

1 [1971] 2 All ER 875, [1971] 2 QB 321

appellant in tendering the worthless cheque resulted in the debt of £38 being 'evaded'. a

One of the earlier decisions on this section was *R v Page*¹. There, however, the worthless cheques passed by the accused were not given in respect of an antecedent debt, but were given in return for cash or kind. In one instance the accused hired a car and paid the deposit by cheque, and in others he had exchanged the cheque for cash. The Court of Appeal held that he was properly convicted in the case of each cheque of 'evading' a debt by deception. b

In *R v Locker*², a tenant who owed rent to his landlord gave the latter a cheque for the amount due, knowing that he had no funds to meet it. He was convicted under s 16 of deception whereby payment of this debt was 'deferred', but this conviction was set aside by a full court of five judges. It was argued by the prosecution that the handing over of the cheque had deferred the debt, even though the cheque (being a worthless piece of paper) had in no way affected the existence of the debt or the rights or liabilities of the parties in respect thereof. The court held, however, that an antecedent debt cannot be deferred by deception unless the deception had been effective so as to operate on the mind of the creditor and cause him to refrain from requiring payment on the due date. c

Since the decision in *R v Locker*² a number of unreported cases and comment by academic writers show considerable difference of opinion about the effect of these two decisions. We regard ourselves as bound by *R v Locker*² and do not think that the fact that the present charge refers to 'evasion' of the debt, rather than deferment, makes any difference. We do not think that the handing over of a worthless cheque 'evades' a debt unless the creditor is shown to have had the opportunity of taking cash but was induced by deception to take the cheque instead. If a penniless man owes a debt of £100 which he has no prospect of being able to pay, how does he evade that debt by giving the creditor a worthless cheque. In *R v Fazackerley*³, however, another division of this court appears to have decided otherwise. It is much to be hoped that this short but vital question may soon be considered by the House of Lords. d

We need not express any view on *R v Page*¹ save to say that we recognise a clear distinction between the passing of a worthless cheque as consideration for some contemporary advantage, and the giving of such a cheque in payment or reduction of an antecedent debt when the creditor has already furnished the consideration moving from him. The former was normally a criminal offence before the passing of the Theft Act 1968 whereas the latter was not. In the present case we regard *R v Locker*² as authority for the proposition that the appellant was wrongly convicted, and we have allowed the appeal and quashed the conviction. e

Appeal allowed. Conviction quashed. The court certified under s 33 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 that a point of law of general public importance was involved, i.e. whether the dishonest offering of a worthless cheque purporting to satisfy a debt for which the drawer was then liable, there being no deception made to the creditor other than the implied representation that the cheque was a good and valid order and which thereby induced the creditor to believe that he had been paid, constituted an offence of obtaining a pecuniary advantage by deception in that the debt for which the drawer was then liable was evaded within s 16 (1) of the Theft Act 1968. Leave to appeal was given. f

At his trial he contended that he had a reasonable excuse for not supplying the specimen in that, after he had ceased to drive but before being asked to supply either a specimen of blood or urine, he had consumed a substantial quantity of alcohol. Appeal

On 13th September 1972 in the Crown Court at Manchester before Judge Bailey and a jury, the appellant, Michael Lennard, was convicted of failing to supply a specimen of blood or urine for a laboratory test, contrary to s 3 (3) of the Road Safety Act 1967. He was fined £50 and disqualified from holding a driving licence for three years. He appealed against his conviction by leave of the single judge on the following grounds: (a) the trial judge had refused to allow the appellant to put his defence before the jury; (b) the judge had directed the jury to convict him without his defence being put; (c) the judge was wrong in ruling that the fact a driver had taken alcohol since driving or since an incident giving rise to a request for a specimen under s 3 of the 1967 Act could not be a reasonable excuse for a refusal by such driver to give such a specimen; and (d) the appellant was not guilty of the offence charged. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. c

8th March. LAWTON LJ read the following judgment of the court. On 13th September 1972 at the Manchester Crown Court the appellant was convicted after a trial before Judge Bailey and a jury, of failing to supply a specimen of blood or urine for laboratory tests and was fined £50 and disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for three years. He now appeals against that conviction by leave of the single judge. e
f

He was charged under s 3 (3) of the Road Safety Act 1967 which provides as follows:

‘A person who, without reasonable excuse, fails to provide a specimen for a laboratory test . . . , shall be guilty of an offence . . .’

The sole question in this appeal is whether the excuse put forward by the appellant was capable in law of being a reasonable one. This excuse was that after ceasing to drive and before being asked to give a specimen of either breath or blood he had consumed a substantial quantity of alcohol. The jury were never asked to decide whether the appellant had consumed alcohol as he alleged because of the unusual, and in the judgment of this court, untoward course which the trial took. The judge ruled that this excuse was incapable in law of being a reasonable one and he directed the jury to convict. g

On 30th March 1972 the appellant whilst driving a motor vehicle was involved in a minor accident. When the police arrived he smelt of drink and in answer to their questions he was alleged to have said that he had just drunk a bottle of brandy. He refused to take the breath test. He was arrested and taken to a police station. There he again refused to take the breath test or to provide a specimen of blood or urine. i

It was accepted at the trial that the appellant had been properly arrested and that the requirements of ss 2 and 3 of the Act had been complied with. No evidence was called. That unusual situation came about in this way. Outside the court, counsel for the appellant told counsel for the Crown that his client admitted that the statutory conditions for requiring a blood or urine test had been complied with a and that the defence would be that his client's drinking of alcohol after ceasing to drive was in law a reasonable excuse. Both counsel were anxious that the court's time should not be wasted and counsel for the appellant intended that his opponent should accept his statements as admissions for the purpose of s 10 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, and they were. Counsel on both sides do not seem to have appreciated that the police evidence about the appellant's alleged consumption of brandy was nothing more than evidence of what he had said he had done. The fact that b he had consumed alcohol after ceasing to drive could only be established by his own evidence or that of someone who had seen him drinking. There could not be the beginnings of an argument that the drinking of alcohol provided a reasonable excuse until that drinking had been proved.

c Relying on what the appellant's counsel had said outside the court, counsel for the Crown opened the case to the jury on the basis that the appellant was not contesting the facts which had to be proved in order to justify the police requiring the appellant to provide a specimen of blood or urine; and he told the jury that in the Crown's submission it was not a reasonable excuse in law for the appellant to say, as he had said to the police, that he had been drinking since ceasing to drive. We were informed by counsel that towards the end of the opening speech the judge raised his eyebrows d implying that he wanted to know whether the appellant was making the admissions referred to by counsel for the Crown. Thereupon counsel for the appellant said that he was. As this all happened during the opening speech, nothing got on to the shorthand note. As soon as the opening had finished the judge referred to the Crown's submission that the taking of drink after ceasing to drive was no excuse for failing to provide a specimen and indicated that he agreed with it. Some discussion with counsel followed: counsel for the Crown said that if the judge ruled to that effect, there would e be no issue of fact for the jury to try. The following exchange then took place between the judge and counsel for the appellant: Judge: 'Is the refusal conceded to?' Counsel: 'Yes, your Honour. It seems to me that my friend is quite right. If your Honour is intending to give that direction to the jury, then there is no issue of fact before the jury.'

f Counsel then asked to be allowed to argue the point and did so. At the end of the argument the judge ruled as follows:

'I am quite satisfied that in law, as well as in common sense, even if he had consumed post hoc alcohol, that could not form any reasonable excuse of any kind for his refusal to supply any form of specimen . . . That being so, if the case proceeds I must tell the jury that there is no defence open to the [appellant].'

g Counsel for the Crown then said once again that there was no issue of fact for the jury to determine. The judge agreed and asked if there was any point in calling evidence. Counsel for the Crown said there was not. The judge asked if the appellant wanted to reconsider his plea. His counsel said he did not and went on to say: 'I think that it is necessary for your Honour to direct the jury in the circumstances.' h This the judge did and on his direction, the jury returned a verdict of guilty. This court does not approve of the informal way in which this trial was conducted. We appreciate that counsel were trying to save the time of the court; but experience has often shown that forensic short cuts do not always result in justice being done. If this case had been tried as it should have been, the jury might have decided that the appellant had not consumed alcohol after he had ceased to drive. The story he was alleged to have told the police was highly improbable and the one we were told by i his counsel he would have told had he given evidence was only a little more probable: he would have said that he had drunk a bottle of wine, not brandy. Statements by those suspected of driving with too much alcohol in them to the effect that they have drunk alcohol between ceasing to drive and being asked to take the breath test are easy to make and should be carefully tested in court unless the prosecution is prepared to make an admission. We would add, too, that the way the appellant's admissions were dealt with was unsatisfactory. Admissions can be made in many ways and it is not for this court to issue a practice direction; but we do say that whenever admissions are made, the manner of doing so should be such that what has been admitted should appear clearly on the shorthand note. a

Whatever irregularities there were in the trial did not amount to a mis-trial nor did they cause a miscarriage of justice. The appellant benefited from them because the issue on which the judge ruled was whether the excuse foreshadowed by the appellant, but not proved to have had any factual basis, was capable of being a reasonable one. b

The problem whether an excuse such as that put forward by this appellant is capable of being a reasonable one necessitated the court construing s 3 (3) in its context and considering a number of authorities.

Part I of the Road Safety Act 1967 was clearly intended to overcome the problem of proof which often arose when a motorist was charged under s 6 of the Road Traffic Act 1960 with driving, or being in charge of, a motor vehicle when under the influence of drink or drugs. By s 1 of the 1967 Act Parliament established a limit to the amount of alcohol which a motorist could drink if he was going to drive, and this limit was to be fixed by reference to the proportion of alcohol in his blood when he was driving. Provision had to be made for getting evidence of this proportion. This was done by means of the statutory requirements for breath and blood or urine tests: see ss 2 and 3. The motorist who refuses to take the breath test or to provide a specimen of blood or urine obstructs the gathering of the evidence which Parliament has decreed is the reliable evidence for the purpose of establishing whether an offence has been committed under s 1. A motorist, however, may not be able to take the breath test or provide a specimen because of his physical or mental condition. The Act made provision for refusals which were excusable. Thus in *R v Kelly*¹, this court expressed the opinion (albeit obiter) that a man with a permanent tracheotomy would have had a reasonable excuse for refusing to take the breath test; and in *Scoble v Graham*² the Divisional Court expressed the opinion that a man who was in pain and confused might have a reasonable excuse for failing to provide a specimen. A state of affairs which does not affect ability to take a breath test or supply a specimen does not seem, on the authorities, to amount to a reasonable excuse. Thus, a motorist who declined to give a specimen saying that he wanted to see his solicitor was adjudged by the Divisional Court not to have had a reasonable excuse: see *Law v Stephens*³. The Court of Appeal gave judgment to the same effect in the case of an overseas visitor who wanted to speak to the diplomatic representative of his country before giving a specimen: see *R v Seaman*⁴. In our judgment no excuse can be adjudged a reasonable one unless the person from whom the specimen is required is physically or mentally unable to provide it or the provision of the specimen would entail a substantial risk to his health. c

This being, in our judgment, the right test, how does the appellant's excuse stand up to it? It was submitted on his behalf that he was entitled to take up the stand that he should not be called on to provide a specimen when the result of his doing so would be useless for the purposes of a s 1 prosecution having regard to the decision of the House of Lords in *Rowlands v Hamilton*⁵. Why the appellant refused to provide a specimen is not known because of the course the trial took. His refusal may have been the result of alcoholic confusion; it may have been based on a lie; but for the purposes of this appeal we are prepared to deal with the problem on the basis of the stand suggested by his counsel. Our attention was drawn to *Glendenning v Ball*⁶. In h a that case the motorist had been involved in an accident and he drank some brandy whilst in the ambulance taking him to hospital. Later he refused to take either a breath test or to provide a specimen. The Divisional Court adjudged that the refusal to provide a specimen which would eventually be unreliable because alcohol had been drunk after he had ceased to drive was capable of being a reasonable excuse. Lord Widgery CJ delivered the leading judgment to which Melford Stevenson and Brabin JJ agreed. No reason was given for the conclusion which was reached.

b We find ourselves unable to agree with it. As we have already pointed out the object of requiring a motorist to provide a specimen is to provide evidence. Once that evidence has been provided the prosecuting authority can decide whether there will be a prosecution. If the alcohol proportion in the blood exceeds the prescribed limits, there will almost certainly be a prosecution; and when prosecuted the accused can try to establish in any way available to him that the evidence put forward by the prosecution is unreliable because after ceasing to drive he had consumed alcohol. That will be his defence and it will be for the court to decide whether, having regard to it, the prosecution have proved the offence charged. It is pertinent to remember that the Act seeks to expose the motorist who refuses to provide a specimen to the same penalties as if he had been convicted of an offence under s 1: see s 3 (3) (a) and (b). It would be a strange result if the motorist who refuses to provide a specimen could decide for himself whether the evidence which would be provided by a laboratory test was likely to be unreliable whereas one who did not refuse would have to submit himself to the judgment of a court on the results of a test which was made. In our judgment an excuse which would make a motorist the judge in his own cause is not a reasonable one. *R v Downey*¹ is in line with our judgment. In that case a motorist who had refused to provide a specimen sought to excuse himself by saying that he had not committed a traffic offence whilst his vehicle was in motion. The Court of Appeal adjudged that this could not be a reasonable excuse; but the reasons for judgment were different from ours. Nevertheless, this case and that both go to show that excuses which do not arise out of an inability to provide evidence, or a substantial risk to health by providing it, are not reasonable ones. The appeal is dismissed.

The parties were married in April 1972 and in March 1973 the wife applied ex parte for an injunction restraining the husband from molesting her. The affidavit in support of the application set out a history of extreme and continuing physical violence on the part of the husband. At the time of the application the wife intended to take out an originating summons under s 2^a of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 for leave to present a petition, notwithstanding that three years had not expired from the date of the marriage, on the ground of exceptional hardship suffered by her or of exceptional depravity on the part of the husband.

Held – (i) The court had jurisdiction to grant an injunction in proceedings under s 2 of the 1965 Act since those proceedings constituted a ‘matter’, within s 225^b of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, and, under RSC Ord 29, r 1 (1)^c, the court had jurisdiction to grant an injunction to a party in any ‘cause or matter’. In any event, since the enactment of s 10 (1)^d of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1967, the expression ‘matrimonial cause’ had included proceedings under s 2 of the 1965 Act (see p 838 h j, p 840 e and p 841 g h, post).

(ii) The injunction would be granted on the wife undertaking to issue proceedings under s 2 of the 1965 Act forthwith because in the circumstances there was amply sufficient nexus between the application under s 2, which necessarily raised questions of the husband’s conduct, and the relief sought by the injunction, to entitle the court to exercise its jurisdiction to prevent molestation (see p 840 d and p 841 j, post).

Ex parte application

The wife applied ex parte for an injunction restraining the husband from molesting her. The parties had been married for under three years and at the time of the application the wife intended to take out an originating summons under s 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 for leave to present a petition for divorce within three years of the marriage. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Betty Knightly for the wife.

14th March. FINER J read the following judgment. In this matter counsel applies on behalf of the wife, Maria Eva McGibbon, ex parte, and as a matter of urgency, for an injunction to restrain the respondent husband from molesting her.

f The parties were married on 1st April 1972 and, in the circumstances which are described in the wife's affidavit, she intended at the time of the application to take out an originating summons under s 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 for leave to present a petition for divorce, notwithstanding that three years had not expired from the date of the marriage, on the ground that the case is one of exceptional hardship suffered by the wife, or of exceptional depravity on the part of the husband.

g The affidavit in support of the application for the injunction sets out a history of extreme physical violence by the husband towards the wife. It is not necessary for me to repeat what is in the affidavit. The violence alleged is gross and continuing and, apart from the particular legal problem to which the case gives rise, I would without hesitation grant ex parte, on the evidence as it stands, an injunction to restrain such behaviour. However, as counsel for the wife pointed out when making the application, there are authorities which cast some doubt on the power of the court to grant injunctions ancillary to proceedings under s 2 of the 1965 Act. Having considered the authorities, I concluded that it was open to me to grant the injunction sought, albeit in s 2 proceedings; and accordingly, on the wife's undertaking to issue such proceedings forthwith, I yesterday granted an injunction restraining the husband from molesting her. I now give my reasons.

i It is to be stressed that the injunctive relief sought and granted is confined to an order restraining the husband from molesting his wife. Injunctions of this kind are commonly, but not invariably, associated with a claim by the applicant that the respondent should quit the matrimonial home, or be kept out of the matrimonial home; but there is no claim in the present case—it would not arise on the facts—for relief of that particular kind. The wife simply asks the court to restrain the husband from committing assault and battery on her.

I will first state what the position in law would seem to myself to be, irrespective of authority. Section 2 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 provides: a ‘Subject to the next following subsection, no petition for divorce shall be presented to the court before the expiration of the period of three years from the date of the marriage . . .’

By s 2 (2): b

‘A judge of the court may, on an application made to him, allow the presentation of a petition for divorce within the specified period on the ground that the case is one of exceptional hardship suffered by the petitioner or of exceptional depravity on the part of the respondent . . .’

That subsection goes on to require the judge, in determining the application, to have regard to certain matters, including whether there is a reasonable probability of a reconciliation between the parties. c

The procedure for obtaining leave under s 2 is governed by r 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules 1971¹, which provides:

‘(1) An application under section 2 of the Act of 1965 for leave to present a petition for divorce before the expiration of 3 years from the date of the marriage shall be made by originating application . . .’ d

The respondent can, of course, defend the application. There is procedure established under the rule for that purpose; and there is no doubt that a s 2 application involves a lis just as much as any other issue which comes before the court for determination. e

The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925 provides by s 45 (1):

‘The High Court may grant . . . an injunction . . . by an interlocutory order in all cases in which it appears to the court to be just or convenient so to do.’

Section 225 of the same Act defines ‘Matrimonial cause’ as meaning: ‘any action for divorce, nullity of marriage, judicial separation, jactitation of marriage or restitution of conjugal rights’; and it defines the word ‘Matter’ for the purposes of the 1925 Act as including ‘every proceeding in court not in a cause’. Hence, although proceedings under s 2 of the 1965 Act are not a ‘matrimonial cause’, within the meaning of the 1925 Act, they certainly are a ‘matter’ within the meaning of that Act. f

Then, by RSC Ord 29, r 1 (1), it is provided:

‘An application for the grant of an injunction may be made by any party to a cause or matter before or after the trial of the cause or matter, whether or not a claim for the injunction was included in that party’s writ, originating summons, counterclaim or third party notice, as the case may be.’ g

It follows, in my judgment, that there must be jurisdiction in appropriate circumstances to grant an interim injunction in proceedings under s 2 of the 1965 Act. On any showing, such proceedings constitute at least a ‘matter’ in which RSC Ord 29 expressly provides that an injunction may be granted. However, apart from the basic jurisdiction, other conditions must be present before the court will grant an injunction. One of these conditions is that the injunction as asked shall bear some sensible relationship to the cause of action. To take a crude illustration, a plaintiff is unlikely to obtain an injunction against trespass in an action in which his claim is for the price of goods sold and delivered. So, in addition to the existence of jurisdiction in the strict sense, there has to be a connection between the plaintiff’s claim and the injunction sought. h a Now, in a 'matrimonial cause', in the nature of a suit for divorce or for judicial separation, there is unquestionably power in this Division to grant interim relief during the pendency of the cause to prevent one party from molesting the other. We often grant injunctions of this nature. Both of the necessary conditions exist, that is to say, first, the basic jurisdiction to grant an interim injunction in the cause; and secondly, a sufficient connection between the substantive relief and the ancillary relief being sought. The court, in dealing with such a cause, is essentially concerned with enquiring into and regulating the personal relationship of the parties to each other. It is seized of that relationship; and gross acts of interference by one spouse with the other, against his or her will, invade the very area within which the court is operating. Moreover, as was said in *Silverstone v Silverstone*¹ by Pearce J:

c 'This Division of the High Court deals with problems somewhat different from those of other Divisions, and the position pending trial is one of its particular problems. To protect the position of a wife pending trial this court may order a husband to pay her alimony pendente lite and give security for her costs even although she appears to have little chance of success in her litigation. It is desirable, if its powers allow, that it should prevent her being bullied out of her remedy or deterred by pressure from seeking the help of the court.'

d In fact, recent authority shows that the power of the court to regulate the conduct of the parties towards each other may, in appropriate circumstances, be exercised even after the making of the decree. I refer, for example, to *Stewart v Stewart*², a decision of Sir George Baker P, to *Robinson v Robinson*³ and *Montgomery v Montgomery*⁴. However, for the present purpose there is no need to explore the limits of the doctrine so far as it applies to a matrimonial cause such as a suit for divorce. It is enough to say that it is beyond doubt that during the pendency of such causes there is jurisdiction to restrain molestation and a sufficient nexus between the substantive relief being sought and the ancillary relief by way of the injunction against molestation to justify the exercise of that jurisdiction if the facts of the case require it.

f Now, apart from authority, I can for myself see no reason why the rules which I have just described should not in principle be just as applicable in s 2 proceedings as they are in other matrimonial proceedings. I ask: what possible distinction of principle can there be? A s 2 application may only be a preliminary to the presentation of a petition, but in the circumstances governed by s 2 it is an essential preliminary, and an indispensable and integral part of the process of obtaining the full relief which the petitioner seeks to obtain. It brings the material jurisdiction directly into play. g Indeed, so far as the conduct of the parties towards each other is concerned (and the consequent possibility that one will need protection from the other), there are many situations in the modern law of divorce in which, for the purposes of obtaining substantive relief, conduct may be irrelevant or of small importance; whereas in most s 2 applications this question of conduct will be the matter with which the court is most directly concerned. Then there is the risk of the would-be petitioner being bullied out of the assertion of her rights. That is certainly no less, it seems to me, in a s 2 situation than in other cases; and indeed, seeing that the wife will often, in the s 2 situation, be young and inexperienced, it may be a greater risk than it generally is. h i Then again, in a case of the kind which I am considering, one asks: What is the alternative to the court intervening by way of injunction at this stage? The wife could petition for a judicial separation. She needs no leave of the court to present such a petition, notwithstanding that three years have not elapsed from the date of the marriage, and once such a petition were on the file, there could be no doubt that, for the reasons I have already explained, she could properly move for an injunction. But why should a wife who sincerely wants a divorce have to present an insincere petition for judicial separation as a means of obtaining protection from this court against being menaced and beaten by her husband? a

Another expedient, I suppose, might be for the wife to sue her husband in the Queen's Bench Division for the tort of assault and battery, and to claim an injunction there as an adjunct to the claim in tort. Even then it is doubtful whether she would obtain an injunction, because that is rarely granted at common law against an assault: see Clerk and Lindsell on Torts¹. The proper remedy, it is said, is to resort to the magistrates to obtain an order binding over the husband to keep the peace. So that a wife who wants a divorce, and protection from assault while she goes about the business of getting one is, on this view, to be driven to invoke a quasi-criminal remedy; and invoke it, I may add, in a situation where in the s 2 proceedings, which would be on foot at the same time, this court has to enquire into the reasonable probability of reconciliation. b

Authority apart, I can see no justification for compelling an applicant to such an undesirable and, indeed, grotesque performance. I see nothing to prevent the wife from adopting the straightforward course of asking this court to protect her against the ill-treatment of her husband in the course of s 2 proceedings. It would seem to me both that the court has a jurisdiction, and that there is amply sufficient nexus between the s 2 application and the relief sought by the injunction to entitle the court to exercise that jurisdiction to prevent molestation. c

So far, I have dealt with the matter on the footing of the definitions of 'matrimonial cause' and 'matter' in the 1925 Act. However, in the Family Division the expression 'matrimonial cause' now also includes an application under s 2 of the 1965 Act: see the Administration of Justice Act 1970, s 1 (2) and Sch 1; the Matrimonial Causes Act 1967, s 10 (1); r 2 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules 1971. A good illustration of the point occurs in r 8 of the 1971 Rules, which begins: '(1) Every cause other than an application under section 2 of the Act of 1965 shall be begun by petition.' So that if there ever was any relevant distinction between a matrimonial cause and a matter—and, for the reasons I have already stated, I do not understand why there should have been—that distinction is relevant no longer. d

I now have to consider *Winstone v Winstone*². That was a decision of Winn J given in vacation, but on consideration after full argument. A wife who had been married for less than three years sought leave, under s 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1950 (corresponding to s 2 of the 1965 Act), to present a petition for dissolution of marriage. While this summons was pending, she applied for an injunction to restrain her husband from interfering with her occupancy of the matrimonial home. It is to be observed that the application was for an injunction to restrain the husband 'from interfering with or molesting the wife in her occupation of the matrimonial home'. The wife did not apply, as she does here, merely for protection against assault and battery. Winn J said³: e

"The question which troubles me, and the question on which I invited counsel to help me, is whether, before the filing of a petition for divorce, the court has become so seised of the control of the matrimonial relations of these two parties that it has jurisdiction to grant such relief as is asked for today. It is said by counsel for the wife that, according to *RAYDEN ON DIVORCE*⁴ . . . "When a matrimonial suit is pending . . . the court will restrain one spouse from forcing his or her society upon the other, and from other acts of molestation"; It is plain, however, f a under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, that a matrimonial cause is commenced by the filing of a petition which is before the court.'

Pausing there, that, as I have mentioned, is no longer the exclusive position because the filing of an originating summons under s 2 of the 1965 Act also commences a 'matrimonial cause'. Winn J continued¹:

b 'That means that a matrimonial suit cannot be considered to have been commenced until a petition is filed under the rules. By analogy, it is plain that no action is pending in the Queen's Bench Division until a writ is at least issued; therefore, in the special circumstances where an individual is required by some statutory provision to obtain leave before he issues a writ, that individual cannot commence and cannot be regarded as having commenced an action until he
c has with the leave of the court issued a writ.'

Then further:

d 'I find myself unable to accede to the cogent and helpful submissions of Mr. Hunter that, once any proceedings have been competently and effectively commenced, as these proceedings for leave to file a petition within three years have been commenced, an injunction may be granted for relief on a subject-matter falling outside the ambit, scope and effect of the proceedings in which the injunction is sought. Here the pending proceedings have as their only object the obtaining of the leave of the court to file a petition within three years. Once that leave is obtained, then of course the whole matrimonial relations of the e parties will be the subject-matter of any petition which is filed.'

The judge went on to express regret that he had to take that view of his jurisdiction, because he recognised that it led to most inconvenient results.

It will be observed that Winn J in that case made two different approaches to the problem. First, on what I have called the question of basic jurisdiction, he took the f view that, since (as was indeed the case at that time) the issue of an originating summons for leave to present a petition did not involve the commencement of a 'matrimonial cause', there were no proceedings within which he was entitled to grant any injunctive relief: 'no action, no injunction'. With respect, it appears to me that this overlooked the fact that at the time when the decision was given, the application for leave constituted a 'matter', and the rule of court then corresponding to RSC
g Ord 29, r 1, in terms conferred jurisdiction to grant an interim injunction during the pendency of a 'matter'. However, I have already explained that the situation today is different, in that even if there is any relevant distinction between granting an injunction in a 'matter' and granting an injunction in a 'cause', s 2 proceedings now fall within the extended definition of 'matrimonial cause'.

The second grounds of decision in *Winstone v Winstone*² were that Winn J considered h that there was not a sufficient nexus between the principal relief being sought, namely leave to file a petition, and the ancillary relief, namely an injunction to restrain the husband from interfering with the wife's occupancy of the matrimonial home. The judge put it that the injunction fell outside the ambit, scope and effect of the proceedings in which the injunction was being sought. On this point, *Winstone v Winstone*², in my judgment, is to be distinguished from the case before me, for reasons which j I have already explained. I am dealing only with an injunction against physical molestation and there is, to my mind, an amply sufficient nexus between the principal and the ancillary relief claimed.

2 [1959] 3 All ER 580, [1960] P 28

*Winstone v Winstone*¹ was cited in the Court of Appeal in *Des Salles d'Epinoix v Des Salles d'Epinoix*². The circumstances there were that the wife issued an originating summons claiming maintenance under s 22 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 on the grounds of the husband's wilful neglect to maintain her. The matrimonial home was on joint tenancy; and before the wife had issued the originating summons, the husband had left the home. While the summons was pending, the husband attempted to return to the matrimonial home. The wife refused to admit him; and the judge at first instance made an order permitting the husband to return to the matrimonial home and restraining the wife from preventing him from doing so. On appeal, it was held that the husband's claim for relief—namely, to return to the matrimonial home—did not arise out of the wife's cause of action under s 22, nor was it incidental thereto. In my judgment, the decision in *Des Salles d'Epinoix v Des Salles d'Epinoix*² was not based on a finding of lack of intrinsic jurisdiction, but on the finding that on the facts there was no sufficient connection between the substantive relief being sought by the wife and the injunctive relief being sought by the husband to justify the grant of the injunction. I refer in particular to the passages in the judgments where Willmer LJ said³:

'... I do not think that it is either necessary or desirable to express any view on the question whether there is jurisdiction to grant an injunction in circumstances such as those of the present case. What I do say is that I am abundantly satisfied that on the authorities it would be contrary to well established principle to grant any such injunction.'

He then referred to *Winstone v Winstone*¹ in terms which indicate that he approved *Winstone*¹ so far as it had been decided that there was insufficient nexus between the substantive and ancillary reliefs that were being sought. Similarly, Willmer LJ said⁴:

'It seems to me that, when one comes to apply that principle to the facts of the present case, it simply cannot be contended that the husband's claim to relief by way of injunction arises in any way out of the wife's cause of action, or is in any respect incidental to it.'

Sachs LJ said⁵:

'I have come unreservedly to the conclusion that, even if there were jurisdiction, and if in addition it was in principle open to the husband to seek the remedy that he claims in the course of these proceedings which originated under s. 22 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, I would regard the granting of relief as a wrong exercise of judicial discretion... Clearly any injunction sought by a defendant or respondent to proceedings initiated by a plaintiff or applicant must bear some appropriate relation to the subject-matter of the relief claimed in the proceedings already initiated, proceedings which may either have been commenced, or in certain cases may be in course of being commenced. That relationship may naturally include, for instance, that of being molested simply by reason of having started proceedings, but the relationship must be material and must exist.'

He then referred to *Winstone v Winstone*¹ and said⁶:

'One of the later authorities on the subject is that already mentioned of *Winstone v. Winstone*¹. There WINN, J., referred to the need for any injunction

Finally he said¹:

- b 'The result is that in principle this application by the husband cannot be entertained by the court in these proceedings. Whether the correct phraseology is that of LINDLEY, L.J., in *Carter v. Fey*², where he referred to its not being competent for the defendant to make such a motion, or whether the correct phraseology is that of LOPES, L.J., in the same case, where he refers to the matter as an important question of practice, or whether one should look on the matter from the point of view of WINN, J., in the Winstone case³, where he dealt with it as a matter of jurisdiction, it does not seem to be necessary to decide. It is enough
- c to say that on principle, I . . . consider the position to be clear that this court cannot entertain the husband's application.'

- On this state of the authorities, I consider that it open to me to grant the wife an injunction against molestation in proceedings for leave to file a petition for divorce, brought under s 2 of the 1965 Act. Had I also been asked to exclude the husband
- d from the matrimonial home, I should have felt considerably more difficulty. It is true that *Des Salles d'Epinoix v Des Salles d'Epinoix*⁴ is not itself a s 2 case, but the Court of Appeal there refers to *Winstone v Winstone*³, which was a s 2 case, in terms which plainly indicate approval of the result. I doubt whether it is possible to read *Des Salles d'Epinoix*⁴ otherwise than as indicating that the Court of Appeal agreed with Winn J that a s 2 application could not support an injunction relating to occupancy of the
- e matrimonial home for lack of a sufficient connection between the principal and subsidiary reliefs. The practical consequences can be most inconvenient, but the remedy, if there is one, does not fall to be considered in the present case.

Injunction granted to wife on her undertaking to issue proceedings under s 2 of the 1965 Act forthwith.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
LAWTON, SCARMAN LJ AND EVELEIGH J
9th MARCH 1973

Road traffic – Dangerous driving – Causing death by dangerous driving – Sentence – Disqualification for driving – Principles of sentencing – Categories of offences and offenders – Conviction because of momentary inattention or misjudgment – Relevance of driving record to period of disqualification – Cases in which custodial sentence appropriate.

Where a driver is convicted of causing death by dangerous driving and the accident was due to momentary inattention or misjudgment on the part of a driver who has a good driving record, he should normally be fined or disqualified for driving or obtaining a licence for the minimum statutory period, or a period not greatly exceeding it, unless there are special reasons for not disqualifying. If his driving record is indifferent, the disqualification should be longer, perhaps two to four years, and if it is bad he should be put off the road for a long time. For those who have shown a selfish disregard for the safety of other road users or of their passengers or a degree of recklessness, a custodial sentence with a long period of disqualification may well be appropriate, and if the driver has a bad driving record the period of disqualification should be such as will relieve the public of a potential danger for a very long time (see p 845 h j, post).

For the penalty for causing death by reckless or dangerous driving, see 33 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 624, 625, para 1053.

Appeal

On 14th December 1972 the appellant, John Kenneth Guilfoyle, was convicted in the Crown Court at Wakefield before Mr Recorder Walker of causing death by dangerous driving. He was fined £75, disqualified for four years and his licence was endorsed. He was further ordered to pass a driving test before his licence could be restored. He appealed against sentence on the ground that the sentence was too severe in all the circumstances of the case having regard to the facts that (a) he had lost his job as a lorry driver as a result of his disqualification; (b) he had no previous convictions; (c) he was only 19 years old; and (d) he was guilty of an error of judgment rather than of taking any deliberate risk. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court delivered by Lawton LJ.

M R Swift for the appellant.

LAWTON LJ. On 14th December 1972 at Wakefield Crown Court, after a trial before Mr Recorder Walker and a jury, the appellant was convicted of causing death by dangerous driving and was fined £75 to be paid at the rate of £1.50 per week. He was disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for four years and his licence was endorsed. It was further ordered that he must pass a driving test before his licence could be restored. He now appeals against sentence by leave of the single judge.

The facts are of a very common kind. On 13th July 1972 at about 5.30 p m the appellant was driving his employer's flat-backed motor lorry along Durkar Low Lane in Wakefield. At the junction of that lane with Denby Dale Road, which was an unrestricted, two-lane dual-carriageway, the appellant stopped at the 'Give Way' sign. At that moment a Ford motor car and a motor van, both coming from the a direction of Wakefield, turned left from Denby Dale Road, which was of course the major road, into Durkar Low Lane. A mini car containing three passengers and driven by a Mr Senior came along the major road, at the rear of the two vehicles turning left and in the centre of the traffic lanes. It was approaching the junction of the major road and Durkar Low Lane at a speed of about 50 m p h.

b It would appear both from a written statement which the appellant made after the accident and his evidence that he did not appreciate the presence of that mini car on the road, and the court can understand how that could come about; but it is no answer for the appellant to say, as he did, that he did not see the mini car. It was his duty, before coming out of the minor road on to the major road, to make sure that it was safe for him to do so, and as long as that mini car was there it clearly was not safe.

c The appellant brought his lorry out of the minor road, across the carriageway of the major road, intending to turn to his right towards Wakefield. Unfortunately that manoeuvre brought him into the path of the oncoming mini car. There was a collision and all the occupants of the mini car were hurt, and the driver of it died later from his injuries.

d As I have said, that is a very common type of accident. Clearly, on those facts, the appellant was guilty of causing death by dangerous driving and he has not sought to appeal against his conviction. What he is saying is that the penalties imposed on him, in all the circumstances, were too severe. He is a young man aged 19 of hitherto good character, and although he has not been driving very long his driving record is satisfactory. He drives for his living. He has had three jobs as a driver since leaving school. His wages are low—at the time of the trial they were just under £11 per week.

e The problem of sentencing which the learned recorder had to solve was probably a new one for him. Since 1st January 1972 many circuit judges and recorders have had to cope with similar problems for the first time. The experience of this court has been that there have been many variations in penalties. Some variations are inevitable because no two road accidents are alike, but there are limits to permissible variations and it may be helpful if this court indicates what they are.

f Cases of this kind fall into two broad categories; first, those in which the accident has arisen through momentary inattention or misjudgment, and secondly those in which the accused has driven in a manner which has shown a selfish disregard for the safety of other road users or of his passengers, or with a degree of recklessness. A subdivision of this category is provided by the cases in which an accident has been caused or contributed to by the accused's consumption of alcohol or drugs.

g Offenders, too, can be put into categories. A substantial number have good driving records, a fair number have driving records which reveal a propensity to disregard speed restrictions, road signs or to drive carelessly, and a few have records which show that they have no regard whatsoever for either the traffic law or the lives and safety of other road users.

h In the judgment of this court an offender who has been convicted because of momentary inattention or misjudgment and who has a good driving record should normally be fined and disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for the minimum statutory period or a period not greatly exceeding it, unless of course there are special reasons for not disqualifying. If his driving record is indifferent the period of disqualification should be longer, say two to four years, and if it is bad he should be put off the road for a long time. For those who have caused a fatal accident through a selfish disregard for the safety of other road users or their passengers or who have driven recklessly, a custodial sentence with a long period of disqualification may well be appropriate, and if this kind of driving is coupled with a bad driving record the period of disqualification should be such as will relieve the public of a potential danger for a very long time indeed.

i When these principles of sentencing are applied to this case the result is as follows: the recorder did right to impose a fine, but, having regard to the appellant's limited means and small wage, £75 was too much. The fine should be reduced to £50. The period of disqualification was much too long as the accident was caused by momentary inattention, not by reckless driving. Further, the appellant has a good driving record and is dependent on possessing a driving licence to earn his living. In the view of this court the period of disqualification should be reduced to 12 months. a

The single judge has queried whether the order requiring the appellant to take a driving test before regaining a full licence was appropriate, having regard to the fact that he earned his living by driving and there was nothing to show that he was not normally a good and careful driver. b

In the judgment of this court the order was properly made. The appellant, being only 19, could not have had more than two years' experience on the road and he probably had not had time to develop the intuitive reactions which years of driving inculcate in some drivers. For him an interruption of 12 months in his driving career will be a substantial one and it is in the public interest that his driving skill should be checked before he returns to driving as an occupation. In general the longer the period of disqualification the more important it is that there should be a driving test before the driver again obtains a full licence. c

To the extent indicated the sentence will be quashed and the appellant will be fined £50 and disqualified for 12 months. The fine will be paid in the instalments ordered by the trial judge. d

Appeal allowed; sentence varied.

BOREHAM J

5th March 1973

Fatal accident – Damages – Assessment – Widow – Remarriage or prospects of remarriage – Dependent child – Damages payable for benefit of child – Whether widow's remarriage or prospects of remarriage to be taken into account in calculating damages for child – Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971, s 4 (1). g

In July 1969 the deceased, while riding as a passenger in the defendant's car, was killed in an accident. He was then 24 years old. He left a widow aged 22 and a son aged 19 months. In October 1971 the widow remarried. Her second husband accepted the son as a child of the family and consequently came under a legal obligation to maintain him. The widow, as administratrix of the deceased's estate, brought an action against the defendant in respect of the deceased's death. The defendant admitted liability. On the issue of damages the widow contended that, under s 4 (1)^a of the Administration of Justice Act 1971, no account was to be taken of her remarriage in assessing the damages payable both to herself and for the benefit of the child. h

^a Section 4 (1) provides: 'In assessing damages payable to a widow in respect of the death of her husband in any action under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846 to 1959 there shall not be taken into account the remarriage of the widow or her prospects of remarriage.' i

Held – The effect of s 4 (1) of the 1971 Act was that in assessing the damages payable to the widow she should receive a sum sufficient not only to maintain herself but also to maintain her son on the assumption that she had neither remarried, nor would remarry, and therefore the burden of maintaining him would fall on her. The scope of s 4 (1) was, however, limited to damages ‘payable to a widow’; accordingly that proportion of the damages which would be awarded to the child for the benefit which he might have expected to receive, over and above ‘the cost of his keep’, if his father had not died, was to be assessed having regard to the fact that the widow had remarried (see p 850 b to f, post).

Action

By a writ issued on 5th May 1972 Christine Mary Thompson, suing as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, Rodney George Emens (‘the deceased’), brought an action against the defendant, John Keith Price, claiming (i) under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846 to 1959 damages for herself and for Sean, the infant child of the deceased, and (ii) under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934 damages for the deceased’s estate. On 27th July 1969 the deceased was a passenger in the defendant’s car, which was being driven by the defendant, when it was involved in a collision with other motor vehicles in consequence of which the deceased was fatally injured. The plaintiff alleged that the collision had been caused solely by the negligence of the defendant.

BOREHAM J. This is a claim by Christine Mary Thompson, who sues as the administratrix of the estate of Rodney George Emens, her late husband. The claim arises by reason of the death of Rodney George Emens, to whom I shall refer as ‘the deceased’, in the circumstances which are set out in the statement of claim. It is, for reasons which will appear, unnecessary for me to go into detail as to the circumstances of his death. It is sufficient to say this, that he died as a result of a road accident on 27th July 1969—that being the date of the accident—and his death followed within about 48 hours. Liability is admitted and I am, therefore, not concerned with the precise circumstances in which the deceased came by his injuries which so quickly led to his death. The only issue which is before me is one of quantum.

The plaintiff sues on behalf of herself and on behalf of her infant son, both of whom are, as is acknowledged, dependants of the deceased. The issue of quantum has really been narrowed to two points. Dependency has been agreed. The first point is: what is the correct multiplier that I should apply to that agreed figure? The second point is this: to what extent, if at all, has the infant’s claim been affected by the provisions of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971? Let me deal with the facts that are relevant to those matters. These are agreed facts; I have heard no evidence. As I have said, the deceased died on 29th July 1969; I am told that he was then aged 24 years, and he left as his widow the present plaintiff who was then aged 22. He left too a son, Sean, who was born in January 1968. I am told—and there is no dispute, again, about this—that both the deceased and his wife were in good health. They had been married a comparatively short time. I need go no further so far as the deceased is concerned. a

On 1st October 1971 the plaintiff remarried. Again there is no dispute, apparently, that she has married a man whose health and financial status at present, and whose prospects for the future, are certainly as good as those of the deceased. It is in those circumstances that these two questions arise for my decision. I should add that it has been agreed that the global dependency was somewhere about £12 a week, and this has been apportioned as follows; the dependency of the plaintiff (the widow) is put at £9 a week—and that takes into account the fact that certainly for a number of years, but for her remarriage, she would have had the burden of maintaining her infant son—and the balance of £3 a week is apportioned as the dependency of the infant son. It is accepted on both sides—indeed, there is no ground for argument to the contrary—that the plaintiff's present husband has treated the child Sean as a child of his family and is, therefore, under a legal obligation to maintain and support that child. I doubt if the precise figures of his earnings have any relevance; as I have indicated, certainly his status financially, and his prospects, are as good as were those of the deceased. For the sake of completeness I should perhaps say this, that he has a gross annual income of about £1,800 a year at the moment; his net take-home pay is about £30 a week and of that he allows his wife the present plaintiff £15 a week, out of which she has to pay for food, clothes for the children, and insurance. b

I now apply my mind to the first of the questions that I have to resolve. It is this: the plaintiff's dependency as a widow being £9 a week, what is the correct multiplier to be applied in these circumstances? Of course, I have to take into account, so far as any judge is able to do so, all the contingencies which might be foreseen for the future. I am asked in particular—and it is here really that the dispute has arisen—to say that marriage nowadays is a notoriously unstable institution, and because of that I ought not to assume that the marriage which came to an end through the death of the deceased would have lasted for any substantial period of time, or at least I ought to say that it might not have done. I am prepared to accept that some marriages are unstable, and it may be that there is force in the contention that I ought not to regard the present plaintiff, who had been married for such a short time, as being able to demonstrate such a manifestly stable marriage as one who, perhaps had been married for 10 or 15 years and was still happy. As I have said, I face the possibility that any marriage might break up even after 10 to 15 years, but at the end of the day it seems to me that the argument between the parties is a very narrow one indeed, for the defendant contends that a proper multiplier in the circumstances of this case would be one of 16 years. The plaintiff, on the other hand contends that I ought to take the figure—a figure which is not unheard of—of 18 years, chiefly because the parties were so young, and the deceased would have had before him at least, one would have thought, another 40 years of active working life. It is said that there is no evidence here of any instability in that marriage, nor is there any evidence of any financial instability. I have come to the conclusion that neither of these contentions can be said to be wrong or exaggerated one way or the other. It seems to me that both are contentions which are within the reasonable limits that one would expect from experienced counsel, and I find myself unable, perhaps a little unwilling, to say that one is definitely wrong and the other is definitely right. I have come to the conclusion that both of them being, as I have said, within what I might call 'the reasonable bracket', I propose to take a multiplier mid-way between the two of them, namely, a multiplier of 17. Let me hasten to say that I have taken this part of the case comparatively shortly for, having regard to the 1971 Act, to which I must shortly make closer reference, there is no doubt or dispute c
f
g

a that so far as the wife's claim is concerned and so far as the application of a multiplier is concerned, I cannot have regard to the fact that she has remarried.

b That brings me to the second point, on which I am told there is no authority. There has been a reference to the particular point which arises before me in a recent decision, a judgment of Cumming-Bruce J in *Howitt v Heads*¹. As the learned judge pointed out in that case, this point was never argued before him, and it was conceded in the matter before him that the damages apportioned or assessed in favour of the infant there should follow the same line, should be assessed by the same principles, as the damages for the widow. Therefore he had no need to decide the point which now arises in this case.

c Let me first deal with the 1971 Act. Section 4 (1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971 provides that in assessing damages payable to a widow in respect of the death of her husband in any action under the Fatal Accidents Act 1846 to 1959 there shall not be taken into account the remarriage of the widow or her prospects of remarriage.

d I shall have to come back to the wording of that section in a moment, but first the contentions as I understand them. The defendant argues thus: the law was clear and beyond doubt before the passing of the section that I have just referred to; before that section came into operation both the widow's damages and her children's damages would have been reduced if she remarried or if, in the opinion of the court, there were prospects of her doing so. *Reincke v Gray*² was cited in support of that proposition. As I understand the ratio of that decision of the Court of Appeal it was this, that the widow's damages would be reduced because of her remarriage and by 1964 her dependent children's damages would have been reduced because—or perhaps I should say 'if'—the children had become children of the family of her new husband. As I have already indicated, there is no doubt in this case that the child whom I am considering has become the child of the new family. That, as I understand it, is the basis of the argument of the defendant, and it goes on in this vein: that s 4 (1) of the 1971 Act expressly gives to the widow an advantage which, but for that subsection, she would not have had, that the child cannot have the same advantage unless it is expressly provided in the Act and, it
f is contended, there is no such provision.

This is emphasised by a reminder that the Fatal Accidents Act 1846, s 2, provides that the damages are to be divided for the benefit of those on whose behalf the action is brought in such shares as the jury—now the court—should decide. Basing himself on that, counsel for the defendant says: 'You have to assess the child's damages separately; the child cannot be brought within the provision of s 4 (1) of the 1971 Act, and the old rules must, therefore, apply as they did in *Reincke v Gray*².'

g That is one side of the coin. Counsel for the plaintiff contends, on the other hand, that although there is no authority to support it, one ought not to take into account in assessing the child's damages the fact that his mother has remarried. He does not dispute, as I understand it, that the law was as the defendant contends prior to the 1971 Act, but he says that the 1971 Act has changed all that, and he puts his argument thus:
h 'The intention of that subsection is clear, and the intention is to relieve a judge completely of the duty of assessing a widow's marriage prospects—an unpleasant duty, it is said—and to relieve entirely the widow from the unpleasant experience of hearing her marriage prospects assessed. The argument goes on: if the court accedes to the defendant's contentions that unpleasant duty of the judge and unpleasant experience for the widow will remain wherever there is a dependent child'. It does not in i fact occur in this case because the plaintiff has already remarried; I do not have to assess any prospects; the remarriage is an accomplished fact. But it seems to me that at the end of all the arguments I have but one duty, and that is to construe the Act as I find it, and I am concerned, let me add, with the intention of Parliament only so far as that intention is made manifest by the express terms of the subsection or by implication from the words used in the subsection. That is the limit to which I can go. Though I have a very good idea, though I might accept the plaintiff's contention, that it was intended that judges should be relieved of this duty, I must,

I repeat, look to the Act to see how far that has been achieved. It seems to me that the crucial words are these: 'In assessing damages payable to a widow in respect of the death of her husband . . . there shall not be taken into account [her] remarriage . . .'
I go no further for present purposes. It seems to me that the meaning of the words 'damages payable to a widow' is clear. Of course, I have to go on and ask myself:
what is included in the damages, or what was included in the damages at the time this Act was passed? What were the damages payable to a widow? But I think I ought to ask that question, having regard to the terms of the subsection, on the assumption that there was no remarriage. In my judgment, of what I might call the 'global' sum referred to in s 2 of the 1846 Act, she should receive such proportion as represents her loss, having regard to the fact that for some years, but for her remarriage, she would be obliged to maintain her infant son. What would be apportioned to the child would be such sum (if any) as he might have expected to receive, or by which he might have expected to benefit, if his father had not died, which sum or benefit would have been over and above what I might call 'the cost of his keep' which, in my judgment, is included in the dependency of the mother. I remind myself that in this case the dependency of £9 per week which is apportioned to the widow does in fact take into account the fact, or assumes, that she will have to support her infant son. The dependency of £3 per week apportioned to the child is intended to represent what he would have received over and above the cost of his keep. In those circumstances, it seems to me that there is no room for the argument that the son's proportion of damages is to be assessed on the footing that the court takes no account of the remarriage of his mother for, as I repeat, the subsection provides that it is only in assessing damages payable to the widow that the fact or prospect of her remarriage should be excluded from consideration. In those circumstances, I hold that the son's damages should be assessed having regard to the fact, and taking into account the fact, that his mother has remarried.

It seems to me that those findings lead to the following result: the plaintiff's dependency is £9 a week, which I calculate roughly at £470 per annum. That figure, multiplied by 17, produces a sum of £7,990.

I now have to consider the son's damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts. It is accepted that he is entitled to at least £337.50, which is the computation of his £3 a week loss over a period of two years and three months, i.e. the period between his father's death and his mother's remarriage. I think I am entitled also to take into account—indeed, both counsel agree that I should—a modest sum for the fact that he might have received rather more from his father who died than perhaps he will in the future (and I say that, let me emphasise, without reflection on the new father) because the son now has another family to compete with; there are more heads already. Taking this into account, though I am sure he will be well looked after and I have no doubt that he will be well provided for, I think that a proper sum to award him is to round that figure of £337.50 up to £500.

the deceased's estate, £7,490 to the plaintiff, and £500 to the child.*

- The husband and wife married in November 1960. In September 1962 the husband bought a 99 year lease of the matrimonial home for £24,000, putting down half and borrowing the balance on mortgage. The house was put into the joint names of the parties for the purpose of avoiding death duties. In February 1972 the wife committed adultery with the second respondent. In April the husband issued a petition for divorce based on the wife's adultery. His prayers were for dissolution, custody of the two children of the marriage and costs against the second respondent. At the time of the petition the husband, having forgotten that the matrimonial home was in joint names, instructed his solicitor that it was owned by him absolutely. In May the wife's solicitor wrote that, as the home was in joint names, the wife would be clearly entitled to half the current market value of the equity in the house. The parties were at that time more concerned about the custody of the children; in June terms were agreed whereby the husband was to have custody and the wife care and control of the children; the wife agreed to procure that the husband became the owner of an aeroplane for the purpose of visiting the children in Switzerland, where the wife proposed to live. On 13th June the agreement was approved by the court. Apart from the maintenance and school fees of the children the only outstanding matters were the division of certain chattels and the valuation and transfer of the wife's share in the house. On 14th June the husband was granted a decree nisi; by agreement the wife and the second respondent submitted to an order to pay costs. On 12th July the decree was made absolute and on 5th August the wife married the second respondent. On 13th October the husband applied under r 68 (2)^a of the Matrimonial Causes Rules 1971 for leave to apply for a transfer of property order and a variation of settlement order in respect of the matrimonial home for the benefit of himself or the children. The application was dismissed. On appeal the husband restricted the proposed application to a transfer or settlement order for the benefit of the children.

- j a* Rule 68, so far as material, provides:

'(1) Any application by a petitioner or by a respondent spouse who files an answer claiming relief, for . . . (f) a transfer of property order, (g) a variation of settlement order, shall be made in the petition or answer, as the case may be.

'(2) Notwithstanding anything in paragraph (1), an application for ancillary relief which should have been made in the petition or answer may be made subsequently—(a) by leave of the court, either by notice in Form 10 or at the trial . . .'

Held – The appeal would be dismissed for the following reasons—

(i) there must be some reason or explanation before leave was given under r 68 (2) of the 1971 rules; it was clear that in accepting the financial proposals the wife had been influenced by the belief that she was entitled to half the equity in the matrimonial home; in those circumstances it would be wrong to allow the application (see p 854 h to p 855 b and h, post); a

(ii) before leave could be given the husband ought to show that there was some prospect of a transfer order or settlement being made and that he had failed to do (see p 855 h, post); b

(iii) the husband was under a duty to disclose to the wife that he intended to seek a transfer order; in consequence of his failure to do so she had put herself in a worse financial position than that in which she might otherwise have been and, because of her remarriage, had lost the right to apply for financial relief; the husband was therefore estopped from making the application (see p 856 b c, post). c

This was an appeal by the husband against the order of Mr Registrar Stranger-Jones made on 17th November 1972 refusing his application, under r 68 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules 1971¹, for leave to apply for a transfer of property order in respect of the former matrimonial home, a leasehold property purchased in the joint names of the husband and wife, and a variation of settlement order. The husband had been granted a decree nisi of divorce against the wife which had been made absolute on 12th July 1972. The appeal was heard in chambers but judgment was given in open court. Cur adv vult

19th March. SIR GEORGE BAKER P read the following judgment. This is an appeal from the dismissal on 17th November 1972 by Mr Registrar Stranger-Jones of the husband petitioner's application under r 68 of the Matrimonial Causes a Rules 1971¹ for leave to apply for a transfer of property order, and a variation of settlement order under s 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970. Leave is required if the application for ancillary relief should have been made in the petition under r 68 (1), but has not been made there (r 68 (2)). I will call the parties husband and wife for convenience, although the latter has remarried. The property in question is the wife's share of the former matrimonial home. The original summons did not mention the children, but before the registrar the alternative proposals

b seem to have been that the wife's share should be transferred to, or settled on, the husband or the children, girls aged 11 and five, and that possibly the husband would settle his own share as well. On this appeal, however, the sole proposal is that the application will be for the benefit of the children, and that the wife's interest shall be transferred to or settled on them, and for variation for their benefit of any post-nuptial settlement. It is accepted that the original summons will have to be c amended.

The parties married on 10th November 1960. In September 1962 the husband bought a 99 year lease of a house for £24,000, putting down half and borrowing half on mortgage. In 1971 the wife met the second respondent, a man called Hundt, a German, and committed adultery with him at the beginning of 1972. Efforts at reconciliation were in vain and in February the husband consulted
d solicitors, issuing a petition on 11th April 1972 seeking dissolution of the marriage on the ground of irretrievable breakdown, based on the wife's adultery. His prayers were for dissolution, custody, and costs against the second respondent. In her acknowledgment of service the wife answered 'Yes' to all the matters in para 6, 'Do you wish to make any application on your own account for . . .', except the last, 'Variation of a settlement', to which she answered 'No'.

e The house was put into the joint names of the parties at least to avoid death duties. The wife contends that prior to its purchase she worked throughout the married life as a model, except for short periods before and after the births of the girls, and that she paid for many improvements to be made to the property. The husband, while accepting that she worked, denies that she contributed anything to the marriage financially. He agrees, however, that he has said on a number of f occasions that the wife should receive something from the house, and that it was for the lawyers to work out what should be done. At the time the divorce petition was filed it seems that the husband forgot that the house was in their joint names and instructed his solicitor that it was owned by him absolutely. Some time after 5th March 1972 the wife said that she had a half share in the house and wanted it, and on 12th and 17th May her solicitor was writing that, as the house was in joint names, g the wife would clearly seem to be beneficially entitled to one-half of the present market value of the house minus the mortgage. The problem which was exercising the minds of the parties and their advisers before the hearing of the divorce suit was the future of the children. On 18th May 1972 the husband took out a summons for custody and the wife a cross-summons. In his supporting affidavit the husband said that he was prepared to make a home in London for the children 'either at [the former matrimonial home], which is in the joint names of myself and the [wife], or in another house yet to be obtained'. The wife was anxious to remarry. Terms were agreed, and put before Faulks J on 13th June 1972, who appears to have been content with them. Broadly speaking, the terms were that the husband was to have the custody and the wife the care and control of the children, with arrangements for access and schooling, the husband to pay the school fees. A further term was that h the wife was to procure that the husband became the owner of an aeroplane which she had available. This was for the purpose of visiting the children in Switzerland, the husband having a pilot's licence. The agreement further provided:

'9. No order for costs in the contested custody application. 10a. Maintenance for children and all other financial matters to be agreed or determined later.'

At that time the outstanding financial matters, apart from the maintenance and the school fees of the children, were the contents of the house, an MG motor car which was claimed by the wife, the transfer of the aeroplane and the value of the house and the method by which the wife's share would be transferred to her. No step was taken at any time to amend the petition. a

The suit was heard the following day by Faulks J who granted a decree nisi to the husband and gave leave to expedite the making of the decree absolute. By an agreement made on the previous day, but not included in the written terms, the wife submitted jointly with the second respondent to an order to pay £300 costs in the divorce suit. On 12th July the decree was made absolute, and on 5th August the wife married the second respondent. b

On 23rd June the wife's solicitor wrote, 'at some stage we have got to think about the beneficial ownership of the matrimonial home'; and he followed this with a letter, dated 5th July, dealing with the outstanding matters, in which he said: c

'(2) [The house.] This is in joint names and we think there should be a valuation made and we would like your suggestions as to how and when [the wife] should be paid her half share of the equity.'

The husband's solicitors replied: d

'We have discussed with [the husband] how your client's interest in the [house] is to be dealt with. Is [the wife] envisaging giving any part of her share to the children?'

Her solicitors then asked for a valuation, and on 29th September that was produced by John D Wood & Co: it was £58,000. Her solicitors again asked for the husband's proposals for settling her interests in the property. On 12th October, speaking of the transfer of the aeroplane and the MG motor car, the husband's solicitors said: 'Our client sticks by his bargain.' When the husband was pressed to deal with the wife's half share in the equity of the house, his solicitors replied that they had issued the summons dated 13th October 1972 which initiated the present application. On 3rd November 1972 the wife issued an originating summons under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 in respect of the house and the motor car. e

Up to 13th October, therefore, there was no indication of any kind that the husband was contemplating asking for a transfer or was in any other way seeking to obtain the wife's share of the house. His solicitor says in an affidavit dated 6th February 1973: f

'... it is true that it was never specifically suggested to the [wife's] legal advisers that the [wife's] interest if any should be settled in whole or in part for the benefit of the children.' g

An affidavit from the wife's solicitor and another from his legal executive, Mr Greenwood, make it clear that they were advising the wife on the basis that she was entitled to the half share and that this had been agreed in principle. I must accept that the belief that she was entitled to half the equity of the house influenced both the advice which she was given and the agreement and decisions which were reached. h

The rule is clear. The application must be made in the petition. If it is not the leave of the court is required. This cannot mean that leave is to be given for the asking. I am not fettered of course by the previous exercise of the registrar's discretion. I must give it the weight it deserves but I am in no way bound by it: see *Evans v Bartlam*¹. No excuse or reason has been given for the omission of the application from the petition, and there is certainly no satisfactory explanation of the husband's change of mind: cf *Spill v Spill*². In my opinion there must be some i a reason or explanation before the court gives leave under r 68 (2). The husband may have started off with the belief that he was the sole owner, although this is disputed by the wife, but he was very soon aware that the house was in their joint names. The wife's solicitor contends in his affidavit that the husband's decision to apply for the order was no more nor less than an afterthought, and one which was in direct contradiction of what the wife had all along been led to believe by the husband and his advisers. This seems to me to be a sound view, particularly as the original application b on 13th October was for transfer to the husband, and the idea of transfer to the children came later. The only alternative seems to me to be that the husband was as it were, keeping the ace of trumps up his sleeve until all the other matters had been disposed of, but I am certain that his solicitors would not have been a party to any such scheme. Moreover, when the terms of settlement and on the following day c the agreement about costs was before Faulks J, there being no prayer for transfer or variation in the petition, it was, I think, incumbent on the husband to disclose that he intended to apply at a later stage. The equity was the most substantial asset of all and the knowledge that it might be taken from the wife could have influenced the judge's view about the terms of settlement and the plans for the children. It is now said that this is an adulterous wife going off with a substantial asset; but that was d true at the time of the divorce. Moreover, this is a dangerous argument. Damages awarded for adultery used often to be settled on the children. Such damages can now no longer be recovered, since the law, for better or worse, has been changed. It would, I think, be very undesirable for a court to appear to be trying to reintroduce the concept of damages, now against the wife, by taking away her share in the matrimonial home, or any other asset, and settling it on the children, solely in order that she should not take such an asset with her into her new marriage, to the possible e benefit of her new husband; and particularly is this so where the wife and the new husband have the care of the children. A woman should be allowed to use her assets in her own way, just as a former husband, subject to his duty to maintain the children, can use his assets in his own way, and it is only if a mother is unstable, or cannot be trusted to consider the children, or for some other compelling reason, that a court should curtail her freedom to handle her own affairs. There is no evidence here that f either party is unsuitable or untrustworthy in relation to the children; the husband has agreed to the wife having care and control of the children and I cannot see any reason why a transfer or like order should be made. Because of the provisions of s 7 (4) of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, the mother, having remarried, has lost her right to apply for an order under s 4 of that Act for a transfer or settlement etc of property unless such application was initiated before her remarriage: see g *Jackson (SM) v Jackson (EL)*¹. Counsel for the husband says that what he wants is for the court to be seised of this matter so that it can investigate the whole circumstances and decide if the wife's interests or any part of the wife's interest should be settled on the children. I think before I give leave I ought first to be satisfied that there is some prospect of a transfer order or settlement being made. I do not think there is any such chance, but in any event, in all the circumstances of this case, I think h it would be wrong as a matter of discretion to allow this application.

But that is not the end of the matter because counsel for the wife submits there is an estoppel. First the husband was under a duty to disclose that he intended to seek a transfer order: see *Greenwood v Martins Bank Ltd*² and *Spencer Bower on Estoppel*³. Secondly there is an estoppel by election: see *Macnaghten v Paterson*⁴ and *Spencer Bower*⁵. The wife has put herself in a worse position than she might otherwise have been in and has acted to her detriment in that she agreed to pay the £300 costs although there was no claim against her and she could not have been forced to do so. She agreed to pay her own costs in the custody proceedings which are said to be upwards of £1,000; she remarried thus losing her right to periodical payments and to any transfer of property order under s 4 of the 1970 Act; she agreed to hand over the aeroplane; she has debts which she was expecting to be able to discharge with the money from her share in the equity and finally she was looking to her share to finance additional accommodation for the children in Switzerland. I think her case is unanswerable, and the husband has no longer any ground, or indeed right, on which to make this application. He has made an agreement; he says he 'sticks by his bargain'. Indeed, he is bound to do so: see *Smallman v Smallman*¹. He cannot now introduce a new and vital term into the financial arrangements and the agreement about the children made on the dissolution of this marriage. He is too late. I think the registrar was right and I dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, PHILLIMORE AND SCARMAN LJJ

Contract – Illegality – Performance – Illegal performance by one party – Claim for damages by other party – Participation in illegality by party claiming damages – Contract of carriage – Contract by defendants to carry plaintiffs' goods – Weight of defendants' vehicle when goods loaded in excess of statutory limit – Plaintiffs' transport manager present when goods loaded – Manager raising no objections – Goods damaged in course of journey – Claim by plaintiffs for negligence and/or breach of contract – Whether plaintiffs debarred from claim by reason of illegal performance of contract.

The plaintiffs had manufactured a large piece of engineering equipment, a 'tube bank', weighing 25 tons which was to be transported from their works to a port for shipment. B, the plaintiffs' transport manager, arranged for the load to be transported by the defendants, a small road haulage firm which had ten articulated vehicles. The defendants arranged to take the load on one of their vehicles and a price was agreed. B was present when the tube bank was loaded on to the defendants' vehicle. B was familiar with the statutory regulations governing the carrying of loads on motor vehicles. Under reg 73 (2) of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1966^a the maximum laden weight of the defendants' vehicle was 30 tons. As the unladen weight of the vehicle was ten tons, the total weight exceeded the prescribed maximum by five tons. The carriage of the tube bank by that vehicle was therefore unlawful under s 64 (2)^b of the Road Traffic Act 1960. Nevertheless

- a B raised no objection to the use of the vehicle; nor did he point out that the appropriate vehicle to carry the load was a 'low-loader', which the defendants did not possess. The vehicle started on its journey and, half way to the port, the vehicle with its load toppled over; damage was done to the tube bank. The plaintiff brought an action for damages alleging negligence and/or breach of contract on the part of the defendants. The trial judge held that the contract between the plaintiffs and defendants was lawful when made, that the plaintiffs had relied on the defendants to carry out the contract lawfully and that the defendants could not, therefore, plead the illegality of the contract as performed as a defence to the plaintiffs' claim. On appeal, c Held – On the evidence B must have realised, when he saw the 25 ton tube being loaded on to the defendants' articulated vehicle, that the load was in breach of the regulations. Accordingly, even if the contract were lawful at its inception, its performance was unlawful and the plaintiffs, through B, had participated in the illegality since B had sanctioned the loading of the vehicle with a load in excess of the regulations. Having participated in the illegal performance of the contract the plaintiffs were debarred from claiming damages in respect of the accident and the appeal would be allowed (see p 859 h, p 860 f to h, p 862 f, g h and j and p 863 c d, post).

i Appeal

By a writ issued on 12th August 1968 the plaintiffs, Ashmore, Benson, Pease & Co Ltd ('Ashmores'), brought an action against the defendants, A V Dawson Ltd ('Dawsons'). Ashmores alleged that, by an oral agreement made in February 1967 Dawsons agreed to transport two 25 ton tube banks for Ashmores from Stockton-on-Tees to Hull for shipment to Poland; that Dawsons received the goods on 7th February; that during the journey and whilst under the control and responsibility of Dawsons one of the tube banks toppled over with the lorry on which it was being carried by Dawsons and was damaged; that it was an implied term of the agreement that Dawsons should take all reasonable care to transport the tube banks safely and to ensure that they were delivered undamaged; that the accident and the damage to the tube bank was caused or permitted by the negligence of Dawsons and further by breach of their duty under the agreement: that as a result of the accident and damage and of Dawsons' negligence and breach of contract Ashmores had been put to the expense of repairing the tube bank at the cost of £2,225, and Ashmores claimed damages for that sum. On 25th July 1972 at Newcastle-upon-Tyne Waller J awarded Ashmores £2,745 damages, i.e. £2,225 and £520 interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent from 13th August 1968 to the date of judgment. Dawsons appealed.

C W G Ross-Munro QC and Mary Hogg for Dawsons.
Humphrey Potts QC and Bruce McIntyre for Ashmores.

LORD DENNING MR. In February 1967 a big piece of engineering equipment called a tube bank was being carried from Stockton-on-Tees to Hull where it was to be shipped to Poland. It was very heavy. It weighed 25 tons. It was loaded on an articulated lorry. Halfway to Hull that lorry with its load tipped over. Damage was done to the load. It cost £2,225 to repair. The manufacturers claim damages from the hauliers. In answer the hauliers plead that the load was too heavy for the vehicle, and that the contract of carriage, or the performance of it, was illegal.

The relevant regulations are the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1966¹. They were made by virtue of the Road Traffic Act 1960, s 64. Section 64 (2) says:

‘... it shall not be lawful to use on a road a motor vehicle or trailer which does not comply with any such regulations as aforesaid ...’

In the present case the vehicle was an articulated vehicle with a tractor and trailer. Under reg 73 (2) the maximum weight laden was specified as 30 tons. Now the unladen weight of the vehicle was ten tons. This load (consisting of the tube bank) was 25 tons. So the total weight laden was 35 tons. So it was five tons over the regulation weight. Furthermore, the tube bank was top heavy. It had fittings on the top which made its centre of gravity high. Not only was it in breach of the regulations, but it was a dangerous and unsafe load to be carried on this vehicle along the roads of England. The evidence showed clearly that the only vehicle suitable for this load was a ‘low loader’, which is underslung so that it can take heavier weights and bigger loads. So the expedition was certainly illegal.

I turn now to consider the contract of carriage. The makers of the tube bank were Ashmore, Benson, Pease & Co Ltd of Stockton-on-Tees, the plaintiffs. Their transport manager was a Mr Bulmer. His assistant was Mr Jones. Two of these tube banks were to be sent from the works at Stockton-on-Tees to the port of Hull. Mr Bulmer told Mr Jones to arrange for the carriage of the two tube banks and to give the work to A V Dawson Ltd, the defendants. That was a small firm in which the principals were Mr Arthur Vernon Dawson, the father, and Mr Maurice Dawson, the son. This firm had ten articulated vehicles. The biggest of them was only a 30 tonner. They had no low loaders. They had worked for Ashmores for several years. Mr Jones knew the whole of their fleet well; and Mr Bulmer had known it for some six months. On getting the instructions, Mr Jones telephoned Dawsons and spoke to Mr Maurice Dawson, the son. He suggested that Maurice Dawson should come up and see the nature of the load. Maurice Dawson did so. The weight of it was shown plainly on the plate and on each tube bank and on the case. It a was '25 tons'. It was arranged that Dawsons should take the loads. The price was arranged; it was £55 for the trip for each of the two articulated vehicles. If it had been on low loaders (which Dawsons had not got), the price would have been £85 or more for each; but here it was £55.

b Later that day Dawsons sent two of their drivers with the articulated vehicles to get the two loads. The tube banks were loaded on to the trailers. Mr Bulmer was there for a short time. He saw them loaded, and so did Mr Jones. The tube banks were firmly secured by chains.

c Early next morning the two drivers came and set off on the journey for Hull. When they were about halfway there, the leading vehicle toppled over. It was driven by Mr Harvey, the best and most experienced driver that Dawsons had. Mr Harvey was asked the cause: 'What do you say caused your lorry to topple over?' He answered: 'The camber in the road to the left plus the weight of the load, plus the height of the load.' The judge found that Mr Harvey made an error of judgment. But that was not the real cause of the toppling over. The real cause was the overweight. The articulated lorry was a most unsuitable vehicle on which to carry it. The whole transaction was illegal, being in breach of the regulations. Assuming, however, that Mr Harvey was negligent, the question is whether the illegality prevents Ashmores from suing for that negligence. This depends on whether the contract itself was unlawful, or its performance was unlawful.

d The first question is whether the contract of carriage, when made, was lawful or not. The judge found that it was lawful, because it could have been lawfully performed. He cited *Waugh v Morris*¹ and said:

e 'I find that this contract was concluded between Jones on behalf of [Ashmores] and Maurice Dawson on behalf of [Dawsons]. I find that Jones was relying on Maurice Dawson and his company to carry out the contract, a contract which could perfectly easily be carried out lawfully, and that he relied on [Dawsons] to do so. It was not a term of the contract that it should be carried in any particular lorry. The contract was concluded at a time when Mr Jones was asking Mr Maurice Dawson to look at the load and say that he could carry it for the sum offered.'

f I am not altogether satisfied with that finding. Mr Jones admitted that he knew a little about motor vehicle construction and the regulations. He was asked by counsel for Dawsons: 'You knew, for example, that there were specific loads for articulated lorries, didn't you?' and he said: 'I would say yes.' I would have thought that Mr Jones, being in the business, would have known that the lorries which g Dawsons were going to provide could not lawfully carry these loads.

h Although I have these misgivings, I am prepared to accept the judge's finding that the contract was lawful when it was made. But then the question arises: was it lawful in its performance? The judge's attention does not seem to have been drawn to this point. Yet there are authorities which show that illegality in the performance of a contract may disable a person from suing on it, if he participated in the illegality. This was pointed out by Atkin LJ in *Anderson Ltd v Daniel*², in a passage which was quoted by Devlin J in *St John Shipping Corp'n v Joseph Rank Ltd*³:

i "The question of illegality in a contract generally arises in connection with its formation, but it may also arise, as it does here, in connection with its performance. In the former case, where the parties have agreed to do something which is prohibited by Act of Parliament, it is indisputable that the contract is unenforceable by either party. And I think that it is equally unenforceable by the offending party where the illegality arises from the fact that the mode of performance adopted by the party performing it is in violation of some statute, even though the contract as agreed upon between the parties was capable of being performed in a perfectly legal manner.' a

That passage was further approved by Jenkins LJ in *B and B Viennese Fashions v Losane*¹ where he said, 'that illegality in the performance of a contract may avoid it although the contract was not illegal ab initio'. b

In this case the parties entered into the performance of the contract when Dawson's driver took the articulated vehicle (the 30 tonner) up to Ashmores' works to pick up this load. Mr Bulmer, the transport manager, came along and saw it. Mr Jones, his assistant, was there. Both saw this 25 tons tube bank being loaded on to the articulated lorry. Mr Bulmer must have known that this was illegal; and Mr Bulmer's knowledge would affect Ashmores. Mr Jones was asked: 'Mr Bulmer would know the specific loads for articulated lorries, would he not? A Like the back of his hand, yes'. Then as to these particular lorries, Mr Jones was asked: c

'Q Mr Bulmer would have had all the knowledge in the world and would have known what weight these lorries were permitted to carry but you didn't know? A Well, I would say he would have a good idea what they would carry, yes.' d

Now Mr Bulmer was not called to give evidence. The reason was because he left the employment of Ashmores some years ago and had gone to Zambia. But he had given a statement in which he had said:

'Identical loads to the one in question have been carried on similar vehicles belonging to G Stiller (Haulage) Ltd, Middleton St George, Darlington, completely without incident.' e

On that evidence I think that Mr Bulmer must have known that these articulated lorries of Dawsons were only permitted to carry 20 tons. Nevertheless, realising that 25 tons was too heavy—much too heavy—for them, he was content to let them carry the loads because it had happened before without trouble. He was getting the transport done cheaper too by £30 saved on each trip by each load. Not only did Mr Bulmer know of the illegality; he participated in it by sanctioning the loading of the vehicle with a load in excess of the regulations. That participation in the illegal performance of the contract debars Ashmores from suing Dawsons on it or suing Dawsons for negligence. I know that Dawsons were parties to the illegality. They knew, as well as Mr Bulmer, that the load was overweight in breach of the regulations. But in such a situation as this, the defendants are in a better position. f
In pari delicto, potior est conditio defendentis. g

I would therefore allow the appeal and enter judgment for the Dawsons.

PHILLIMORE LJ. I agree; and indeed I would go further, in that in my judgment this contract was illegal from its inception. The learned judge accepted Mr Jones's evidence—to use his own word—'completely', although Mr Jones, on the very vital question of whether this type of articulated lorry would have specific loads permissible, contradicted himself. He preferred Mr Jones's evidence to that of either Mr Maurice Dawson or his father; and indeed he went so far as to say that he thought that he was not satisfied that a lengthy conversation which Mr Maurice Dawson had described had ever taken place. Now no doubt there was some material for criticising the evidence both of Mr Maurice Dawson and of his father. That is not altogether surprising since the events in question took place in February 1967 and the case was not brought to trial until the summer of 1972. In the course of Mr Maurice Dawson's h

- a evidence he said that after he had seen these cases of machinery which they were to transport, he had a conversation with Mr Bulmer, and he said he told Mr Bulmer that he thought that these articles would be better carried on low loader types of transport; to which the answer that Mr Bulmer gave was that there was not time because they had to be at the docks at Hull on the following morning; and he then proceeded to suggest that in his reluctance to carry these articles on articulated vehicles Mr Maurice Dawson was actuated by fear of a gentleman called Peter Sunter, who apparently ran a low loader transport business and would report to the authorities anyone whom he was able to detect as carrying excessive loads in articulated lorries. He then described how Mr Bulmer had said that a firm called Stillers of Darlington had carried similar weights in their vehicles and had done so without difficulty. It was quite a lengthy conversation which was described, and I find it impossible to hold that this was entirely invented. Moreover, it is exactly in line with a conversation which the father spoke to as having taken place during the course of a telephone conversation which he had with Mr Jones. He said that Mr Jones had told him that these loads were 25 tons each; he had said that they should go by low loader vehicles; and the answer to that was that Mr Jones said he knew that they should, but that Mr Bulmer was trying to economise on transport costs and had given the job to Dawsons for that reason; that he then went on to describe how Stillers had carried similar loads on the articulated lorries without difficulty. It is to be observed that in a statement which Mr Bulmer made in the summer of 1968 he said that 'Identical loads to the one in question have been carried on similar vehicles belonging to G Stiller (Haulage) Ltd, Middleton St George, Darlington, completely without incident.' It seems to me that those conversations to which the father and the son deposed are consistent and consistent only with this contract having been deliberately given to Dawsons in the knowledge that it involved a breach of these regulations and in order to economise on the job.

For those reasons also I would allow this appeal.

- f SCARMAN LJ. I also would allow this appeal; but, for myself, I think that this court ought not to disturb the learned judge's finding that the contract was lawful in its inception. The only way in which his finding on that issue can be attacked appears to me to be by placing some reliance on the evidence of one or other or both of the two Dawsons. This court has not had the benefit enjoyed (if that is the correct term) by the judge of having seen those gentlemen in the witness box. Commenting on their evidence generally, he said: 'I found their evidence completely unsatisfactory.' In the face of that sweeping condemnation of their credibility, I am not prepared to speculate as to how much of the Dawsons' evidence has some element of truth and how much has not. If, therefore, one puts on one side, as I think this court must, the evidence of the two Dawsons, one is left with the evidence of Mr Jones. The judge accepted Mr Jones as a reliable witness. When one turns to the evidence of Mr Jones, it is clear that, if his account of the two conversations with Maurice Dawson, which I think constituted the contract, is accurate, then this contract was capable of a lawful performance. Mr Jones describes first a telephone conversation, when he told Mr Maurice Dawson that he had two tube banks weighing 25 tons to go to Hull to be there at 8 a.m. on Wednesday morning. He then said that he told Mr Dawson that it would be advisable to come up and see the load to see what his vehicles would be carrying. At that moment, assuming that Mr Dawson had shown himself interested in this offer, Mr Jones has plainly suggested to Mr Dawson a job of carrying these two 25 tons loads to Hull, and had invited Mr Dawson to take a look at the loads and to decide what vehicles should carry it. On the Tuesday—I do not think it is clear whether it was Tuesday morning or Tuesday afternoon—Mr Maurice Dawson did come to Ashmores. He went to the site where the tube banks were standing. He saw them and decided to accept the offer. Mr Dawson made no demur as to the feasibility of carrying the loads; and that was the contract. Even if Mr Jones was aware at the time that none of the Dawson-owned articulated lorries could lawfully carry this load, it is not to be implied against him that he had put Dawson on terms that these loads were to be carried in Dawson articulated lorries. It was left to the Dawsons to carry the loads in vehicles that they thought appropriate. The contract was, therefore, capable of being performed lawfully. a
- j

The next question is, was this contract lawfully performed? It was not. The loads were carried on two articulated lorries. The all-up weight of each lorry was well over the 30 tons which each was permitted by law to carry. There was therefore a breach of s 64 (2) of the Road Traffic Act 1960. The Dawsons, of course, knew that the performance of the contract was illegal. The question is, did Ashmores, the plaintiffs? The issue of illegal performance, as distinct from illegal formation, was neither discussed nor expressly decided by the judge. It was raised at the trial, though not mentioned in the pleadings. It is raised in this court and it is our duty to consider it. The critical factor is the knowledge of two men, Mr Bulmer and Mr Jones. Mr Bulmer, for the reasons given by Lord Denning MR, was unable to give evidence at the trial; but it is clear that Mr Bulmer did go down to the site where these tube banks were standing and for a time watched them being loaded on to the two Dawson lorries. Mr Jones was there too. Both Mr Bulmer and Mr Jones were very well aware of the nature of the Dawson fleet of lorries. Both of them now knew, if they did not know before, that loads were being placed on articulated lorries. It is said, however, that neither of them knew all the facts constituting the illegality of this performance, because there is no specific evidence that either knew that the unladen weight of these articulated lorries was ten tons each. The court in my view must apply its common sense to the evidence and the materials that it has on this—more especially because in express terms the judge did not deal with it. It is clear from the evidence that Mr Bulmer was well aware of the regulations; Mr Jones said that Mr Bulmer knew them like the back of his hand; further, in my opinion, Mr Bulmer must have known the carrying capacity of the two Dawson lorries he saw being loaded. It would be shutting one's eyes to the obvious were one to say that, as Mr Bulmer watched these loads being placed on these lorries, he was not aware that the lorries were ten tons or thereabouts unladen. He knew the weight of the two loads; he knew the regulations. He must have known that Dawsons were about to commit a breach of the law. My own view is that, had Mr Jones himself addressed his mind to the problem, he also would have been aware of the facts constituting this infringement of the law. But it is enough for the purposes of judgment if Mr Bulmer knew. The question now arises, and it is really a question of law, whether, Mr Bulmer being the transport manager of Ashmores, his knowledge would be sufficient to impose on Ashmores the consequences of being parties to an illegal performance of the contract. Mr Bulmer was their responsible official. But knowledge by itself is not, I think, enough. There must be knowledge plus participation. On this point I would respectfully adopt the language of Lord Denning MR in *J M Allan (Merchandising) Ltd v Cloke*¹ when he said: b

'I desire to say that where two people together have the common design to use a subject-matter for an unlawful purpose, so that each participates in the unlawful purpose, then that contract is illegal in its formation: and it is no answer for them to say that they did not know the law on the matter.' c

What is applicable to formation is equally applicable to performance. There must be some degree of assent to the illegal performance. In *B and B Viennese Fashions v Losane*² Jenkins LJ recognised, I think, the necessity to assent to the illegality; he said³: d

'It is plain from *Anderson, Ltd. v. Daniel*¹ that illegality in the performance of a contract may avoid it although the contract was not illegal ab initio. That being so, one has to consider whether the mode in which the contract was performed, or purported to be performed, in this case sufficed to turn it into an illegal contract.'

A little further on he said²:

'The plaintiff chose, in purported performance of the contract, to deliver utility garments without an invoice. As a performance of the contract, that was clearly an illegal performance in view of the provisions of art. 10 (1). The defendant firm accepted the goods so delivered and disposed of them.'

c

In the present case Mr Bulmer could have stopped the loading when he went down to watch it being done. He did not do so, with all his knowledge and experience; and I am driven to the conclusion that he was a participator in the illegality. For these reasons I think this performance was illegal and that Ashmores, through Mr Bulmer, participated in that illegal performance. I would allow the appeal.

I would add one word on a point which was discussed in the course of argument but which does not require to be considered for the purposes of our decision. Counsel for Dawsons at the trial was anxious to call an engineer to explain the circumstances and perhaps the cause of the accident. When he sought to call this witness he was confronted by the learned trial judge with RSC Ord 38, r 6 (1), which says:

e

'In an action arising out of an accident on land due to a collision or apprehended collision, unless at or before the trial the Court otherwise orders, the oral expert evidence of an engineer sought to be called on account of his skill and knowledge as respects motor vehicles shall not be receivable [unless, in effect, a copy of a report from him containing the substance of his evidence has been made available to the other side before the hearing].'

f

The judge would not permit the engineer to be called, taking the view that the overturning of this lorry when it struck the grass verge of the highway was a collision. Whatever may be the meaning of the word 'collision' (and I accept that there can be a collision between a moving object and a stationary body), the overbalancing of a great lorry because of contact with a grass verge does not seem to me to amount to collision. But, be that as it may, it is unfortunate that the judge shut out the evidence of the expert on a point such as this; for the rule plainly confers on the court a discretion.

In my judgment the discretion should have been exercised in favour of the Dawsons. Had the engineering evidence caused any surprise or difficulty to the other side, the surprise could have been adequately dealt with by adjournment.

Appeal allowed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

ROSKILL LJ, TALBOT AND BOREHAM JJ

19th MARCH 1973

Road traffic – Vehicle – Taking without authority – Taking – Unauthorised assumption of possession coupled with some movement of vehicle – Theft Act 1968, s 12 (1).

The mere unauthorised assumption of possession of a vehicle is not sufficient to constitute the offence of 'taking' the vehicle without authority under s 12 (1)^a of the Theft Act 1968. For the offence to be established it must be shown that, following the unauthorised assumption of possession or control, some movement, however small, of the vehicle took place (see p 867 f g, post).

Notes

For taking a vehicle without authority, see Supplement to 10 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) para 1475c.

Appeal

On 13th July 1972 at Middlesex Crown Court before Judge Solomon and a jury the appellants, Stephen Bogacki, Howard John Tillwach and Robert Charles Cox, were convicted of attempting to take a motor vehicle without the consent of the owner or other lawful authority. The appellant Bogacki was conditionally discharged for two years, and a similar order was made in respect of an offence of theft for which he had originally been placed on probation at a magistrates' court in April 1971. The appellants Tillwach and Cox were each conditionally discharged for 12 months. All three appellants appealed against their convictions pursuant to a certificate of the trial judge under s 1 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

R J Lowry QC and J S Wiggs for the appellants.

H Green for the Crown.

ROSKILL LJ delivered the judgment of the court. These three appellants, Bogacki, Tillwach and Cox, were charged at Middlesex Crown Court on 13th July 1972 before Judge Solomon and a jury with attempting, and I venture to underline the word 'attempting', to take a motor vehicle without authority. The trial judge directed the jury in a manner of which complaint is now made on behalf of the appellants and to which I shall refer in a moment. Following that direction all three appellants were convicted. The appellant Bogacki was conditionally discharged, a similar concurrent order being made in respect of an offence of theft for which some time before he had been placed on probation at a magistrates' court. The appellants Tillwach and Cox were also each conditionally discharged.

Each appeals against conviction on a certificate granted by the trial judge for the purpose of obtaining the decision of this court whether the construction of s 12 (1) of the Theft Act 1968 which he adopted and in relation to which he gave the direction

a to the jury now complained of was correct. In fact, this was not a case which required a certificate since there was a question of law involved. In these circumstances under s 1 (2) (a) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 there is an appeal as of right. But leaving that point on one side, these appeals raise for the first time in this court the construction of the critical words of s 12 (1) of the Theft Act 1968.

b The facts as they must be taken to have been found by the jury fall within a very narrow compass. The evidence for the Crown was to a large extent undisputed. At about 3.45 a.m. on New Year's Day 1972 these three appellants, who had been having a lot to drink at a New Year's Eve party, went to Ponders End bus garage. There they tried to change a 50p piece in order to purchase cigarettes from a machine. They were refused change and told to go away. As they went they boarded a single decker bus which was standing on the forecourt of the garage. One of them turned c the engine over with the starter as if to start it. It was common ground that after three or four minutes they left the garage quite openly. They walked to the police station where they were given change for the 50p piece which they had been refused at the bus station. Very shortly thereafter they were arrested. According to the police evidence, the appellant Cox first of all denied he had ever boarded the bus. The appellant Tillwach made a written statement in which he admitted that he had been on the bus and he alleged that the appellant Bogacki had sat in the driving seat and tried to d start the engine.

e There was no doubt, and counsel who has appeared in this court for the appellants has not sought to contend otherwise, that one of those three young men acting in concert with the others got on board that bus and attempted to start the engine. The bus never moved. Indeed the weight of the evidence was that the engine never started and this court deals with the appeal on that assumption.

f The point raised by the appeal arises out of the direction given by the learned judge. There had been a submission to the judge by counsel for the appellants that it would be unsafe to leave the case to the jury. The point now at issue was adumbrated in the course of the argument, but the judge did not find it necessary to call on counsel for the Crown for his help. Nor did he give any clear indication during the argument how he proposed ultimately to direct the jury. When he came to direct the jury he did so in these terms:

g 'Now, the offence is the offence of taking a bus, and a lot has been said to you by learned counsel as to what taking is, with none of which I agree, and I am asking you to disregard what has been said to you by learned counsel. It is not an element or ingredient of this offence that these accused people, or any of them, should have intended to drive it away or to move it even one inch. The offence is not, I repeat, the offence is not taking and driving away, it is merely taking and taking, members of the jury, means assuming possession of an object for your own unauthorised use, however temporary that assumption of possession might be. May I give you an example. Suppose that you left your motor car parked in the car park behind a cinema, and you forgot to lock the door but you shut the door, and suppose that a man and a woman, some time h later, when the motor was unattended came along, opened the door, got into the car and had sexual intercourse in the car. This particular offence would then have been committed by them, because they would not have had your permission to use the car for that purpose, and they would have had possession, in fact, for a purpose which was unauthorised. It is as simple as that, members of the i jury. And therefore, please put out of your minds the idea that it is necessary to show, in order to establish this offence, that anybody or any one of these men intended to drive the car [the judge said "the car" but he must have meant the bus] away, that is not so. The question is: did they, without the permission of the owners, acquire possession, for however short a time, for their own unauthorised purpose? That is the question.'

The trial judge's direction was certainly clear and categorical. The question is whether it was right. The trial judge equated the word 'take' in s 12 (1) with the word 'use'. He directed the jury in terms that if there were unauthorised user of a vehicle, that amounted to 'taking' within s 12 (1), even though there had been no jot or tittle of movement of the vehicle by those charged with the offence. a

It is well known that s 12 (1) altered the relevant law. The old law created the offence of taking and driving away. Section 12 (1) no longer includes the words 'driving away'. The relevant words are: b

'. . . if, without having the consent of the owner or other lawful authority, he takes any conveyance for his own or another's use [he is guilty of an offence].'

The question, therefore, is what is meant in that context by the word 'take'. I ventured to draw attention at the outset of this judgment to the fact that these young men were not charged with the complete offence, though the judge's summing-up suggested that they were. They were only charged with an attempt because the Crown took the view when the count was drafted they were only guilty (if at all) of an attempt since they never succeeded in moving the vehicle. Nonetheless counsel for the Crown has made a valiant effort to support the trial judge's direction by arguing that 'take' in this subsection is the equivalent of 'use' and that, therefore, they were liable to be convicted of the complete offence because they 'took' the vehicle in that they assumed possession of it adverse to the rights of the true owner. c

There has been some discussion of this section in the writings of academic lawyers whose views are entitled to the greatest respect. In Professor Smith's well-known book on the Theft Act¹ he deals with this section and draws attention to the fact that the element of driving away no longer appears in the section. He says: d

'The concept of "taking" which has been eliminated from stealing still survives here, but, fortunately, it seems to have given little trouble in connection with this offence. "Taking" suggests the acquisition of possession.'

The learned author goes on to deal with various cases which are not directly relevant here. Then in a subsequent passage he says²: e

'Under the Road Traffic Acts, the offence was not committed unless the vehicle was "driven away" as well as taken. This requirement led to some very subtle distinctions. It was held that, for example, a vehicle was not being driven where D released the handbrake so that it ran down a hill or where it was being towed or pushed by another vehicle. It would seem that there is a taking in each of these cases and convictions would now be possible, if the other constituents of the offence were present.'

In the following paragraph he goes on³: f

'This seems to be a very desirable change in the law. It was never clear what part driving played in the mischief of the offence. The offence appears to be designed to protect the owner of a conveyance from temporary deprivation of it. Yet, under the old law, the offence would clearly not have been committed by loading a vehicle on to a transporter by crane and taking it away for a month—otherwise, presumably, if it had been driven on to the transporter. It is not clear why the former case should not equally be an offence, and there is no doubt that it may be under the Theft Act. One of the constituents of the offence, however, is that the conveyance must be taken for "his own or another's use"—a new requirement, not found in the Road Traffic Acts. This would seem g a to exclude allowing the conveyance to run (or float) away out of malice. Probably driving, whatever the motive, would be held to be "use" as would, for example, the display of the vehicle in an exhibition of veteran cars.'

I have read the whole of those passages in order to draw attention to the fact that nowhere does the learned author suggest that the meaning of the word 'take' has been altered merely by the exclusion from this subsection of the words 'driving away'.

In Professor Griew's book on the Theft Act¹ the learned author says:

"The primary offender is he who "takes any conveyance for his own or another's use." In one respect this wording is wider than that of the replaced provision, which required a taking and driving away. The primary offence now requires no act of driving. The word "takes" will presumably be satisfied by any movement, however caused (e.g., by pushing, by lifting or by releasing a hand-brake) and over however short a distance.'

In other words Professor Griew is saying in terms that some element of movement is an essential prerequisite to a conviction for taking, even though the words 'driving away' no longer appear in the subsection. Learned counsel were unable to assist us with any other citation from works of authority on this point and one comes back to the construction of the language used in the subsection.

The word 'take' is an ordinary simple English word and it is undesirable that where Parliament has used an ordinary simple English word elaborate glosses should be put on it. What is sought to be said is that 'take' is the equivalent of 'use' and that mere unauthorised user of itself constitutes an offence against s 12.

e It is to be observed that if one treats 'takes' as a synonym for 'uses', the subsection has to be read in this way: 'if . . . he uses any conveyance for his own or another's use . . .' That involves the second employment of the word 'use' being tautologous, and this court can see no justification where Parliament has used the phrase 'if he takes any conveyance for his own or another's use' for construing this language as meaning if he 'uses any conveyance for his own or another's use', thus giving no proper effect to the words 'for his own or another's use'.

f For those reasons the court accepts counsel for the appellants' submission that there is still built in, if I may use the phrase, to the word 'takes' in the subsection the concept of movement and that before a man can be convicted of the completed offence under s 12 (1) it must be shown that he took the vehicle, that is to say that there was an unauthorised taking possession or control of the vehicle by him adverse to the rights of the true owner or person otherwise entitled to such possession or control, coupled with some movement, however small (as Professor Griew says) of that vehicle following such unauthorised taking.

g Here, had the trial judge given the jury a correct direction, there was abundant evidence to justify convictions for attempting to take the bus because what was done must on the verdict of the jury clearly be taken to have been an act to which all these men were joint parties, preparatory to putting the bus into motion after an unauthorised taking of possession or control. Therefore, they could all well have been convicted of the offence with which they were charged, but on the direction of the trial judge they were, in the view of this court, wrongly convicted because the trial judge did not correctly tell the jury what the law was which they had to apply. Accordingly the answer to the question in the certificate is that the trial judge's direction to the jury was wrong. The convictions must be quashed and the appeals allowed.

Appeals allowed. Convictions quashed.

M & W Grazebrook Ltd v Wallens

SIR JOHN DONALDSON P, MR J H ARKELL AND MR J W KENRICK

23rd MARCH 1973

Industrial relations – Conciliation officers – Communications made to conciliation officers – Admissibility in evidence – Proceedings before Industrial Court and tribunals – Communications to conciliation officers in connection with performance of their functions – Circumstances in which communications admissible – Industrial Relations Act 1971, s 146 (6).

Discovery – Production of documents – Privilege – Communications with agents with a view to litigation – Proceedings before Industrial Court and tribunals – Communications with agents other than legal advisers – Communications with a view to litigation – Whether privileged.

On a complaint of unfair dismissal before an industrial tribunal, the employers contended that certain documents were privileged by virtue of s 146 (6)^a of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. The documents consisted of (i) minutes of a meeting held before the employee was dismissed and attended by representatives of the employers and by union shop stewards; (ii) internal memoranda prepared by the employers' works manager, production manager and personnel officer after the employee's complaint had been presented to the tribunal. Both sets of documents were given by the employers to a conciliation officer appointed under s 146 of the 1971 Act. On a preliminary point of law the tribunal held that s 146 (6) of the 1971 Act did not render the documents privileged. The employers appealed.

Held – (i) On its true construction, s 146 (6) of the 1971 Act was intended to exclude evidence that statements were made or documents communicated to a conciliation officer in connection with the performance of his functions under s 146 of that Act. However, it was not intended to render inadmissible evidence which could have been given if there had been no communication to a conciliation officer; the test was whether evidence existed in an admissible form apart from evidence based on such communication to the conciliation officer (see p 869 j to p 870 a, post).

(ii) In relation to proceedings before an industrial tribunal, communications not only with legal advisers, but with other agents with an actual view to the litigation in hand, and the mode of its conduct, were privileged. Such privilege was limited to the litigation in hand and its conduct and did not exist in relation to the situation at the time when the matters complained of were arising (see p 871 b to d, post).

(iii) Accordingly, the case would be remitted to the tribunal with a direction that the tribunal should (a) make an order for discovery of the minutes of the meeting held before the employee's dismissal and consider any claim for privilege advanced other than under s 146 (6) of the 1971 Act, and (b) investigate the circumstances under which the internal memoranda came into existence in order to ascertain if those documents attracted privilege, either as documents brought into existence with a view to achieving a settlement or with an actual view to the litigation in hand, or the mode of its conduct (see p 871 f g and h j, post).

Interlocutory appeal

- This was an appeal by M & W Grazebrook Ltd against the determination on a preliminary point of law by an industrial tribunal (chairman R E Chapman Esq), sitting at Birmingham, dated 4th January 1973, that on a complaint of unfair dismissal made by the respondent, George Edward Wallens, certain documents were not privileged under s 146 (6) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Bruce Reynolds for the appellants.

Caroline Alton for the respondent.

- e SIR JOHN DONALDSON P delivered the following judgment of the court. This is an interlocutory appeal from a decision of an industrial tribunal sitting in Birmingham. It concerns the admissibility of documentary evidence and calls for the first time for a consideration of the true construction of s 146 (6) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971. This is a matter of considerable general importance and we propose to deal with it in general terms before considering the facts of this particular case.

On 1st December 1971, in an opening statement¹, I said:

- g 'Fears have been expressed that this court will require conciliation officers of the Department of Employment or of the Commission on Industrial Relations or others to reveal the content of confidential discussions into which the parties have entered bona fide with a view to settlement. Such fears are completely without foundation. The confidentiality of communications to statutory conciliation officers is protected by section 146 (6) of the Act. Furthermore, the courts have for many years recognised that the public interest requires respect for the confidentiality of such discussions, whether directly between the parties or with independent third parties. This court will pursue the same policy.'

- h Section 146 (6) of the 1971 Act provides:

'Anything communicated to a conciliation officer in connection with the performance of his functions under this section shall not be admissible in evidence in any proceedings before the Industrial Court or an industrial tribunal, except with the consent of the person who communicated it to that officer.'

- j In our judgment, this subsection is intended to exclude evidence that statements were made or documents communicated to a conciliation officer in connection with the performance of his functions under s 146. It is not intended to render inadmissible evidence which could have been given if there had been no communication to the conciliation officer. As the tribunal pointed out, were it otherwise either party could conceal any inconvenient evidence by simply communicating it to a conciliation officer. The test is whether evidence exists in an admissible form apart from evidence based on such communication to the conciliation officer. a

Thus, in the absence of consent, no evidence can be given of the content of oral statements made to a conciliation officer in connection with the performance of his functions under the section or, indeed, that such statements were made. If it is relevant, evidence can, of course, be given of the fact that during certain periods a conciliation officer was concerned in the matter. b

Documents are, however, in a special position. Section 146 (6) excludes evidence that the content of the document was communicated to the conciliation officer and also secondary evidence of that content based on the communication. Nevertheless, the document exists. Its admissibility as a document does not depend on the terms of the subsection but on the general law in relation to 'privilege' from disclosure. 'Privilege' is a somewhat misleading term used by lawyers to denote that the document is protected from disclosure in the interests of the administration of justice. This privilege would extend to any document which was prepared solely for the purpose of communication to a conciliation officer whether in connection with his functions under s 146 or, more generally, with a view to achieving a settlement of the subject-matter of the proceedings before the tribunal. The basis of this privilege (which extends to 'without prejudice' communications between parties or, in the field of family law, to communications to marriage guidance counsellors, probation officers and others) is the public interest in achieving an agreed settlement of disputes. c

Rule 6 (1) (b) of the Schedule to the Industrial Tribunals (Industrial Relations, etc) Regulations 1972¹ empowers a tribunal to make the like orders for discovery as could be made by a county court, and no order can be made for the production of any document which would be privileged from disclosure in such a court. General guidance on this topic is contained in the note in the County Court Practice or Ord 14 of the County Court Rules 1936. d

Counsel for the respondent has drawn the attention of this court to a particular paragraph in the note to CCR Ord 14, r 5². It appears under the main heading, 'Communications with Agents with a view to litigation' and continues: e

'Communications not only with legal advisers, but with other agents, with an actual view to litigation in hand, and the mode of conduct of it, also are privileged: Pearce v. Foster³.' f

Counsel for the respondent rightly submits that that particular decision does not support the proposition for which it is cited. She goes on to submit that there is no authority binding on the traditional courts of this country which does support this proposition. g

On the other hand, counsel for the appellants, whilst agreeing that there is no authority which can be relied on as expressly supporting that proposition, submits that if one looks at a whole range of cases, and in particular at the judgment of Lord Denning MR in Alfred Crompton Amusement Machines Ltd v Comrs of Customs and Excise (No 2)⁴, a case which is currently under appeal to the House of Lords⁵—this note to Ord 14 of the County Court Rules accurately summarises the general effect of the authorities. h a of his researches, because in our judgment, if counsel for the respondent is right and this is not the law in relation to the traditional courts, it must be held to be the law in relation to industrial tribunals and this court. We say that for this reason. Before industrial tribunals it is the rule, rather than the exception, for parties to be represented by persons other than lawyers. Indeed, it is the policy of Parliament to encourage such representation. If the law to be applied to industrial tribunals were not as stated in the note¹ in the County Court Rules, the position would arise that, b for example, a personnel officer, when examining as a witness a works foreman, could, at the end of the works foreman's evidence, be called on to hand over the proof of evidence from which he had been examining the witness. Obviously, that would be a wholly untenable situation. Accordingly, we rule that if and insofar as the general law applicable to all courts does not give the privilege set out in the note in the County Court Practice, then, in the interests of the administration of justice, we c hold that that privilege exists in relation to proceedings before an industrial tribunal. We would, however, draw attention to the fact that it is a limited privilege. It exists only in relation to communications with an actual view to the litigation in hand and the mode of conduct of it. It does not exist in relation to the situation at the time when the matters complained of were arising.

d In the present case, the respondent complains that he was unfairly dismissed on 29th September 1972 and he claims compensation under s 22 of the 1971 Act. There is an issue whether he was dismissed unfairly within the meaning of that section. There is also an issue whether the respondent had been employed for the minimum qualifying period set out in s 28 (a) of the 1971 Act and, if not, whether he is nevertheless entitled to claim on the basis that his dismissal resulted from the exercise of his rights under s 5 (1) of the Act or from an indication by him that he intended to e exercise those rights.

The issue before this court concerns the admissibility of two groups of documents. The first consists of minutes of a meeting held on 20th September 1972 which was attended by various representatives of management and by shop stewards from the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers and the Transport and General f Workers Union. The minutes were drawn up on 21st September 1972, eight days before the respondent was dismissed. Their admissibility falls to be considered as if they had never been handed to the conciliation officer. Whilst we doubt whether there are any grounds for holding that they are inadmissible in evidence, the tribunal should make an order for their discovery and then consider any claim for privilege which may be advanced other than under s 146 (6).

g The second consists of three internal memoranda prepared by the works manager, the production manager and the personnel officer between 17th and 26th October 1972, after the respondent's complaint had been presented to the tribunal. These documents were also handed to the conciliation officer. The employers complained to the tribunal that if they had known that they might have to disclose these documents, they would never have shown them to the conciliation officer. This complaint discloses a complete misunderstanding of the situation. If these documents h are disclosable at all, it is not because they were communicated to the conciliation officer, but because they were in existence. There is a dispute as to why they came into existence. This must be investigated by the tribunal. If the circumstances are such as to attract privilege, either as documents brought into existence with a view to achieving a settlement or with an actual view to the litigation in hand, or the mode of the conduct of it, they will be privileged from disclosure.

i In conclusion, we would only say that the facts of this appeal, and the protest by the employers, suggest that workers claiming compensation for unfair dismissal and their advisers are insufficiently aware of their right to ask a tribunal to order the production by the employers of all documents in their possession or power relating to the matters in issue, subject always to the employers' right to resist having to produce such documents on well-established grounds of 'privilege'.

The matter will be remitted to the tribunal with a direction to consider the matter further in the light of, and consistently with, this judgment. a

Order accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
EDMUND DAVIES LJ, WILLIS AND BEAN JJ
19th, 22nd MARCH 1973

Criminal law – Removal of articles from places open to the public – Public having access to building to view collection housed in it – Removal of article forming part of collection – Removal on day on which public not having access to building – No offence when article not forming part of collection intended for permanent exhibition to public – Collection intended for permanent exhibition – Meaning – Municipal art gallery – Collection of pictures owned by local authority – Only part of collection on exhibition in gallery at any one time – All pictures exhibited at least once a year – Whether collection intended for permanent exhibition – Theft Act 1968, s 11 (1), (2). d e

A local authority owned an art gallery which was open to the public on weekdays but closed on Sundays. Only part of the collection of pictures owned by the authority was on view at any one time but the pictures were all shown at least once a year, sections of the collection being exhibited at various times of the year for short periods. Early one Sunday morning the appellant removed a valuable painting from the collection then on view at the gallery. He was convicted of removing a picture without lawful authority, contrary to s 11^a of the Theft Act 1968. He appealed contending that the picture did not form part of 'a collection intended for permanent exhibition to the public' within s 11 (2), since each picture in the collection was only seldom exhibited, and therefore, by virtue of s 11 (2), no offence had been committed since he had removed the picture on a day when the public did not have access to the gallery. f g

Held – The words 'a collection intended for permanent exhibition to the public' meant simply a collection intended to be permanently available for exhibition to the public. That intention was sufficiently manifested by the local authority's settled practice of periodically displaying to the public at the gallery the pictures in their permanent collection. Accordingly, the appellant had been properly convicted and the appeal would be dismissed (see p 876 g h, post). h

On 4th July 1972 at Teesside Crown Court before Judge Forrester-Paton QC and a jury, the appellant, John Durkin, was convicted of removing an article from a place open to the public, contrary to s 11 (1) of the Theft Act 1968 (count 2). The particulars of the offence charged were that the appellant, on 19th March 1972, at Middlesbrough in the county borough of Teesside, without lawful authority removed from the municipal art gallery, a building to which the public then had access in order to view a collection of public paintings housed therein, a painting displayed to the public therein entitled 'St Hilda's Church, Middlesbrough and the Market Square' by L S Lowry. The appellant pleaded guilty to a charge of damaging property (count 3). He was sentenced to fines of £145 and £5 respectively on the two counts, with three months' imprisonment in default, and was also ordered to pay the costs of his defence up to a maximum of £75. He appealed against his conviction on count 2, pursuant to a certificate of the trial judge under s 1 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, on the ground that the evidence showed that the painting taken by the appellant formed part of a collection which was only displayed to the public intermittently, and therefore no offence could be committed by taking it on a day when the public did not have access to the art gallery. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

e 22nd March. EDMUND DAVIES LJ read the following judgment of the court. On 4th July 1972 at Teesside Crown Court before Judge Forrester-Paton, the appellant was convicted of removing a painting by L S Lowry without lawful authority from the Middlesbrough Municipal Art Gallery, contrary to s 11 (1) of the Theft Act 1968. He pleaded guilty to breaking a window, and he was sentenced to fines of £145 and £5 respectively on the two counts, with three months' imprisonment in default. f On a certificate granted by the trial judge, he now appeals against his conviction on the count of unlawfully taking away.

The undisputed facts of this unusual case may be shortly stated. At about 1.30 a.m. on Sunday, 19th March 1972, the 31 year old appellant went to the art gallery at Middlesbrough, got in by breaking a window, rushed upstairs and very quickly removed an L S Lowry painting of a Middlesbrough scene insured for £5,000 which was on exhibition in the first floor gallery and then made his exit. He did not g know that there was a burglar alarm installed. But even so, he got away before the police, summoned by the sound of the alarm, arrived on the scene.

The appellant made his intentions quite clear, both in a written statement and in his conversation with a member of the staff of the local newspaper and also in a ransom note which he had written beforehand and which was in his pocket when the police interviewed him. His learned counsel, who has admirably submitted everything that could be advanced before us, described in the court below the appellant's actions as in the nature of a protest. As the trial judge said, other people would use less polite terms to describe it; some people would say he was being a confounded nuisance, other people would perhaps use the words blackmail or extortion. Although the appellant first insisted that works of art should be properly protected, he himself j certainly put at risk this valuable painting, because there he was blundering along with it in the street in the middle of a foggy night and falling over a flower bed. On his own admission he then left it in a warehouse where it was certainly not safe, for it might well have been stolen or damaged by vandals. It is quite clear from what he said that his intentions were to use his unlawful possession of this painting as a means of extorting from the Teesside Council Arts Committee compliance with four demands which he put forward: first, that they should install an efficient alarm system in the Teesside museums and art galleries; secondly, that all museums and art galleries in Teesside should be open on Sundays for a trial run, using unemployed men as attendants; thirdly, that the local authority should give a donation of £100 to each of two charities which he named, although there was not the slightest evidence that he had any connection with either of them; and fourthly, and most ridiculously, he demanded that the local authority should raffle a pair of the mayor's underpants and give the proceeds to another charity.

'Subject to subsections (2) and (3) below, where the public have access to a building in order to view the building or part of it, or a collection or part of a collection housed in it, any person who without lawful authority removes from the building or its grounds the whole or part of any article displayed or kept for display to the public in the building or that part of it or in its grounds shall be guilty of an offence. For this purpose "collection" includes a collection got together for a temporary purpose, but references in this section to a collection do not apply to a collection made or exhibited for the purpose of effecting sales or other commercial dealings.'

As to that, the trial judge said:

'Now there is no doubt that he removed it [meaning the Lowry picture]; there is no doubt that he removed it without lawful authority, he didn't even believe he had lawful authority to remove it, and there is no doubt equally that that was the article displayed or kept for display to the public in the Municipal Art Gallery. So about these ingredients of the offence there is no doubt at all. But where the dispute does arise is as to whether, at the time when the removal was carried out, the building was really one to which this section applies.'

It is conceded for the appellant that if his abstraction of the picture had occurred on a weekday, he would have no defence to the charge. But the gallery is not open to the public on Sundays, and, as we have said, the appellant took the picture early on a Sunday morning. This involved consideration of sub-s (2) of s 11, which provides:

'It is immaterial for purposes of subsection (1) above, that the public's access to a building is limited to a particular period or particular occasion; but where anything removed from a building or its grounds is there otherwise than as forming part of, or being on loan for exhibition with, a collection intended for permanent exhibition to the public, the person removing it does not thereby commit an offence under this section unless he removes it on a day when the public have access to the building as mentioned in subsection (1) above.'

Having regard to the wording of this subsection, the trial judge granted his certificate in the following terms:

'I certify that the case is a fit case for appeal on the grounds that the evidence showed that the painting taken by the [appellant] formed part of a collection which was only displayed to the public intermittently, and therefore a question arose as to whether any offence could be committed by taking it on a day when the public did not have access to the art gallery. The court is invited to consider whether I directed the jury correctly as to s 11 (2) of the Theft Act 1968.'

The facts relevant to the question raised by this appeal, which emerged from the evidence of Mr Cozens, assistant curator at Middlesbrough art gallery, may be thus summarised. The Teesside local authority have two art galleries, one at Billingham, the other at Middlesbrough. Each is closed to the public on Sundays. The permanent collection of pictures owned by the local authority is sometimes on view in the one gallery, at other times in the other. The entire collection is very seldom on view at a one time in either gallery, only a part being exhibited at a given time. But all the pictures in the permanent collection are shown at least once a year and sections of it are exhibited at various times throughout the 12 months, depending on the space left free in the gallery by temporary exhibitions of pictures lent for limited periods of about a month. The Lowry picture was part of a permanent collection of contemporary works formed as the result of purchases by the local authority over a period of years. Like the other pictures in the collection, it is not on permanent display in the Middlesbrough art gallery, but it had been exhibited there since 26th February 1972. When pictures are not displayed they are kept in the storeroom of that building.

b On these facts, counsel for the appellant submits that the appellant committed no offence contrary to s 11. This being apparently the first prosecution under it, it may not be unprofitable to say something about the genesis of the section. c As Professor Smith has pointed out¹, its object is to protect things which are put at hazard by being displayed to the public, and it undoubtedly owes its existence to the removal a few years ago of Goya's portrait of the Duke of Wellington from the National Gallery. The portrait having been returned four years later, the taker was acquitted of its larceny but convicted of larceny of the frame which he had destroyed. d In its Eighth Report² in 1966 the Criminal Law Revision Committee also referred to two other cases of temporary deprivation, the first being when an art student took a statuette by Rodin from an exhibition, intending, as he said, to live with it for a while, and returning it later; the second being the removal of the coronation stone from Westminster Abbey. The committee considered that the situation was serious enough to justify the creation of a special offence, but did not include a provision in their draft Theft Bill because it was felt at that time that the matter e called for further consideration.

The legislature proceeded to deal with the matter by s 11, which Smith and Hogan³ describe as 'of some complexity'. Counsel for the appellant says that it gives rise to questions of difficulty hitherto left untouched by the textbook writers. He made two or three submissions regarding it, but we hope he will acquit this court of discourtesy when we say that, in the light of the facts we have summarised, for the f purposes of the present appeal they are in essence one and the same.

The basic question arises from the phrase 'a collection intended for permanent exhibition to the public' which appears in s 11 (2). Mr Cozens described the pictures belonging to the Teesside local authority as 'a permanent collection rather than a permanent exhibition'. Counsel for the appellant stresses that it is with the latter that s 11 (2) deals. What, then, is meant by 'permanent exhibition'? Professor Griew⁴ g has expressed the view that, 'In this context the antithesis of "permanent" seems to be "occasional"'. But counsel for the appellant accepts that the exhibition need not be continuous, and that the closing of an art gallery at weekends, during holidays, or for like periods would not prevent the works of art still inside from remaining throughout part of 'a collection intended for permanent exhibition to the public'. h He likewise concedes that 'permanent' is a matter of degree, but submits that on the facts of this case none of the pictures in the Teesside authority's permanent collection is 'intended for permanent exhibition', since each picture is only occasionally exhibited. And, while recognising that s 11 (2) adverts to what was 'intended' in relation to the Teesside collection, he submits that this is best inferred from what happens in practice, and that the intention manifested by the practice of the Teesside local authority was j that none of these pictures should be on 'permanent exhibition'.

If all this is right, s 11 has largely failed in its aim, insofar as it seeks to provide a remedy where articles are taken on 'closed' days, for it is common knowledge that

1 Law of Theft (2nd Edn, 1972), p 109, para 299

2 Cmnd 2977, para 57

3 Criminal Law (2nd Edn, 1969), p 398

4 The Theft Act 1968 (1968), p 69, footnote 4

many of our great galleries have more pictures than they can exhibit at any one time, and a number of them adopt the agreeable practice of periodically changing their displays, some pictures being removed into store and being replaced by others taken out of store. Acceptance of counsel for the appellant's submission means that the unauthorised abstraction of any of these pictures would not be an offence unless it occurs 'on a day when the public have access to the building.'

The direction of the trial judge was in the following terms:

'Members of the jury, the direction I give you is this, and in doing so I accept broadly the argument that has been presented by [counsel for the Crown], my direction is this, that permanent means something that is intended to last for an indefinite period, it refers to a course of conduct intended to be carried on over an indefinite period, not necessarily continuous during that period. And applying that to the words of this section what I say is—if I am wrong about this, I can, if necessary be corrected in a higher court—what I say is that it is sufficient, if the evidence satisfies you that the Teesside Council, through its Arts Committee, intended that its permanent collection of paintings should be put on view to the public from time to time and that that course of conduct should continue for the foreseeable future and continue indefinitely into the future. If they had the sort of intention, then . . . this collection was intended for permanent exhibition to the public. It is not necessary they should intend to have the collection, or part of it, on view every day when the art gallery is open, nor is it necessary they should intend that the whole collection should be on view at the same time. It is sufficient if they intend that the collection as a whole should be available for public viewing in sections, one section at one time, another section at another time, provided of course, they intend to carry on that course of conduct indefinitely into the future.'

Was that direction right? If we may say so, it has the great merit of enabling the section to be applied in a sensible manner without necessitating detailed enquiries regarding how long the article abstracted had been on display and how long in store, and with what frequency and for how long pictures in a collection which is admittedly a permanent one are actually on display, these being matters as to which no records may be available. That the prosecution should fail in an otherwise clear case of the unauthorised abstraction on a closed day of part of a permanent collection through inability to furnish such details would be unfortunate. Nevertheless, if that is what the section requires, so be it. But we think otherwise. With the learned judge, we hold that 'a collection intended for permanent exhibition to the public' is simply one intended to be permanently available for exhibition to the public, and that such intention was sufficiently manifested in the present case by the local authority's settled practice of periodically displaying to the public in the Middlesbrough art gallery the Lowry picture and the others in their Teesside permanent collection.

Our conclusion, therefore, on the point raised in the learned trial judge's certificate is that he correctly directed the jury. From this it follows that we dismiss the appeal.

MEGARRY J

7th MARCH 1973

Costs – Taxation – Solicitor – Bill of costs for contentious business – Gross sum bill – Power of party chargeable to require solicitor to deliver to him in lieu thereof bill containing detailed items – Three month time limit – Solicitor delivering to client gross sum bill – Client seeking taxation of costs – Client asking for bill to be prepared and lodged for taxation four months after delivery of original bill – Solicitor delivering detailed bill of costs – Detailed bill for larger amount than original bill – Whether client ‘required’ solicitor to deliver bill containing detailed items – Whether three month time limit can be waived by solicitor – Solicitors Act 1957, s 64, proviso (a).

The defendants, a firm of solicitors, acted for the plaintiff in wardship proceedings. In January 1972 they delivered to the plaintiff a gross sum bill of costs. In February the plaintiff wrote to the defendants saying he wanted the costs taxed. The plaintiff resided in Malta, and having succeeded in the wardship proceedings had taken the ward to Malta. He made a claim against the Passport Office and they would only recognise a taxed bill of costs in respect of it. On 18th May the plaintiff’s solicitors wrote informing the defendants of the attitude of the Passport Office and concluded the letter by saying ‘it would seem that there is no alternative but for your Bill to be prepared and lodged for Taxation’. On 22nd June the defendants delivered to the plaintiff’s solicitors a detailed note of their charges. The total of the June bill was for a larger amount than the January bill. The plaintiff contended that it was the January bill which should be taxed whereas the defendants claimed that the June bill should be taxed as it replaced the January bill under the Solicitors Act 1957, s 64, proviso (a)^a.

Held – The January bill was the bill to be taxed for the following reasons—

(i) the obligatory machinery of proviso (a) of s 64 could not be brought into play until there had been something which could fairly be described as a request or requirement, within three months of the delivery of the gross sum bill, that the solicitors should deliver to the client a detailed bill to replace the gross sum bill already delivered, and on the evidence the plaintiff had not made a request or requirement of that kind; to require a bill to be taxed was not per se a requirement that ‘a bill containing detailed items’ should be delivered in lieu of a gross sum bill (see p 879 g h and j, post); and in any event solicitors could not, as against a client who relied on it, waive the three month time limit imposed by proviso (a) (see p 880 b c, post);

(ii) even if the court had a discretionary power to allow a bill to be withdrawn and replaced by another, there were no grounds for exercising such a discretion; furthermore the defendants could not as of right replace the January bill by the June bill (see p 880 d e, post).

^a Section 64, so far as material, is set out at p 879 c to e, post

Adjourned summons

By an originating summons dated 20th July 1972 the plaintiff, William Charles Carlton, sought an order for taxation of a gross sum bill of costs delivered to him by the defendants, Theodore Goddard & Co, his solicitors in a wardship action, in preference to a later detailed bill of costs. The facts are set out in the judgment.

John Monckton for the plaintiff.

Joseph Dean for the defendants.

MEGARRY J. This summons raises a short point about solicitors' costs. The summons, issued by the plaintiff, seeks taxation of a bill of costs delivered in January 1972 to him by the defendants, who were his solicitors in wardship proceedings in this Division. I shall refer to this as 'the January bill'. The defendants accept that the plaintiff is entitled to an order for taxation, but say that that order should be for taxation not of the January bill but of a later bill which the defendants delivered in June 1972; and that I shall call 'the June bill'. The main point in the case turns on the Solicitors Act 1957, s 64, proviso (a), a provision which, I was told, appears to be devoid of authority.

The January bill is plainly a gross sum bill. It shows disbursements of £3,224·11, and the item for profit costs consists of the words 'A fully detailed Bill would amount to £3,750, but say £2,687·50'. That last sum is the amount carried out to the charging column, and the rest of the entry appears in the text of the bill, preceded by about a page of description of the work done. The total shown at the foot of the charging column is £5,911·61, consisting of the £3,224·11 for disbursements, and the 'say £2,687·50' for profit costs. Left to myself, I would have said that this is a bill for £5,911·61, including £2,687·50 for profit costs; but counsel for the plaintiff expressly conceded that it was a bill for £6,974·11 (including £3,750 for profit costs), coupled with an offer to accept £5,911·61, including the £2,687·50 for profit costs. He told me that before the master this was accepted on both sides, and that before me he conceded it. I did not find this very easy to follow, for as I put it to him, the words 'A fully detailed Bill would amount to £3,750, but say £2,687·50' seem to be saying that if a different and fully detailed bill had been delivered, the profit costs would have been £3,750, but that in the bill actually delivered the profit costs were only £2,687·50. It is not as if the bill carried the £3,750 out to the charging column and then reduced it. Indeed, the fact, if it be a fact, that it is a bill for £6,974·11 can be ascertained only by executing some mathematical process such as taking the total actually shown on the bill, namely, £5,911·61, and then adding to it the difference between the £2,687·50 shown as the charge for profit costs and the £3,750 shown in the body of the bill as what the profit costs would have been if a detailed bill had been delivered. It is not much of a bill if the total is not what is shown as the total but some larger sum which has to be calculated. However, there is nothing before me for decision on the point, though I can well understand how there seems to have been some misunderstanding about what really had been in issue before the master.

After the January bill had been delivered, the plaintiff wrote to the defendants in February, saying that he wanted the costs taxed and making some comments. There were then some discussions, and the plaintiff made a claim against the Passport Office; he resides in Malta, and after succeeding in the wardship proceedings he had, I think, taken the ward to Malta. It then appeared that the Passport Office would only recognise a taxed bill of costs in respect of his claim. On 18th May his solicitors wrote to the defendants stating this, and referring to a cheque that the plaintiff had sent to the defendants in respect of a proposed reduction of their costs, saying that they assumed that this cheque would now be returned. The letter concludes with this sentence: 'Accordingly, it would seem that there is no alternative but for your Bill to be prepared and lodged for Taxation'. On 22nd June the defendants delivered to the plaintiff's solicitors a detailed note of their charges in the case; this is the June a bill. It gives some details of a number of items, amounting to a little less than £850, but the main item is for £2,970 profit costs for 'Instructions for hearing and generally', with a descriptive text that is rather longer than that in the January bill. This amount, of course, is by itself more than the total for profit costs that the defendants were willing to accept in the January bill; but that no doubt will be considered on the taxation. The total of the June bill is £3,295·61 for disbursements, and £3,818·10 for profit costs, amounting to £7,113·71 in all. This is less than £140 more than the total of the January bill on the basis that counsel for the plaintiff accepts, though of course it is over £1,200 more than what on the face of it appears to be the total of the January bill.

b In those circumstances, it is the January bill that the plaintiffs say should be taxed and the June bill that the defendants say should be taxed: the defendants say that the January bill has been replaced by the June bill under s 64, proviso (a), of the Solicitors Act 1957. That section and the proviso read as follows:

c 'Where the remuneration of a solicitor in respect of contentious business done by him is not the subject of such an agreement as is mentioned in section fifty-nine of this Act, the solicitor's bill of costs may at the option of the solicitor either contain detailed items or be for a gross sum: Provided that—(a) at any time before service upon him of a writ or other originating process for the recovery of costs included in a gross sum bill and before the expiration of three months from the date of the delivery to him of the bill, the party chargeable therewith may require the solicitor to deliver to him in lieu thereof a bill containing detailed items, and the gross sum bill shall thereupon be of no effect; . . .

d There are then two other provisos which I need not read. Counsel for the defendants relies on the last sentence of the letter of 18th May which I have read, coupled with a statement by the plaintiff in his affidavit that the defendants were 'asked to provide details of their bill of costs', as having rendered the January bill 'of no effect' under the proviso.

e Counsel for the plaintiff's reply is that the proviso is not satisfied. First, he says that the plaintiff never exercised the power to 'require' the delivery of a detailed bill in lieu of the gross sum bill, and second, even if he did, that this was not done within the three months laid down by the proviso; for the January bill was delivered to him under cover of a letter dated 19th January 1972, and the letter of 18th May 1972 was nearly four months later.

f First, then, there is the question whether the plaintiff ever required the defendants to deliver to him in lieu of the gross sum bill 'a bill containing detailed items'. I cannot see that he has. To require a bill to be taxed is plainly not per se a requirement that a detailed bill should be delivered; for as provisos (b) and (c) to s 64 itself make plain, a lump sum bill may be taxed. The letter seems to me to contain not a word about 'a bill containing detailed items'. At most, there is the somewhat indefinite expression employed by the plaintiff in his affidavit. Nor does the letter require any bill to be delivered to the plaintiff; all that it does is to say that a bill should be 'lodged for Taxation'. There is some ground for saying that one bill was to be replaced by another, in the reference to there being 'no alternative but for your Bill to be prepared', so that it can be said that the letter was not asking for the existing bill to be lodged for taxation but for some other bill to be prepared: but that by itself is not enough. Furthermore, the language of the letter is not so much the language of requiring something to be done as the language of a somewhat reluctant acceptance of the inescapable. It seems to me that before proviso (a) of s 64 is brought into play there must be something which can fairly be described as a request or requirement that the solicitors should deliver to the client a detailed bill to replace the gross sum bill already delivered; and although I do not think that any particular form of words need be employed, the substance of what is relied on must amount to a request or requirement of this kind. If in doubt, of course, the solicitors, before embarking on the work, can always enquire whether some equivocal communication that they have received is or is not intended to be a requirement under the proviso. On this ground alone the defendants' contentions must fail. a

As for the time limit, I very much doubt whether the solicitors can 'waive' the three months. By agreement, of course, anything proper can be done. There is nothing that I can see to prevent solicitors and their client from agreeing to operate the machinery of the proviso despite the expiration of the three months. Nor do I say anything about the ability of solicitors to waive some provision against their own interests. But I do not see how solicitors who wish to ignore the three months can, as against a client who relies on it, simply say 'we waive the three months, and so you are caught by the proviso'. The obligatory machinery of the proviso does not seem to me to operate unless the requirements of the proviso have first been satisfied. b

Counsel for the defendants did put forward a further contention, namely, that there was a discretionary power in the court to allow a bill to be withdrawn and replaced by another; and he also contended that in some circumstances a solicitor could do this as of right. This point came as something of a surprise to counsel for the plaintiff who said that it has not been raised before the master, and that in any case there was no material before the court to support the exercise of any such discretion. The full circumstances of any case in which this was sought to be done ought, he said, to be before the court; and I agree. On the facts as they stand before me, I can see no ground for exercising any such discretion (assuming it to exist), and I can see no basis on which the defendants could as of right replace the January bill by the June bill, especially after the plaintiff had sought taxation. c

Accordingly, in my judgment the plaintiff succeeds on this summons, and I direct taxation of the January bill as prayed by the summons. In saying that, I wish to make it plain that I decide nothing as to the amount of the January bill, but merely draw attention to what I have said about it, and to what counsel for the plaintiff has conceded. d

Order accordingly. e

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

28th FEBRUARY, 1ST, 15th MARCH 1973

b Court of Appeal – Evidence – Further evidence – Damages for personal injuries – Basis of assessment falsified by events occurring after trial – Death of plaintiff – Death occurring after notice of appeal lodged – Pain-killing drug prescribed for plaintiff after accident – Plaintiff becoming addicted to drug – Plaintiff dying from overdose of drug – Whether evidence of death admissible in Court of Appeal – Effect on general damages and damages for lost future earnings.

c Court of Appeal – Evidence – Further evidence – Character of witness – Witness having died since date of trial – Fresh evidence of witness's criminal record – No opportunity for challenge or explanation – Whether evidence admissible.

d In August 1968 M, a single man aged 24, was severely injured in a motor accident. His injuries were to the lower part of his body and legs. He had a broken pelvis and much damage was done to his bladder and other internal organs. His urinary and sexual functions were greatly impaired. He had to walk with a stick. In consequence of his injuries he was in great pain; his doctors prescribed a pain-killing drug (palfium) on which he became more and more dependent. He was unable to work after the accident. In January 1970 he issued a writ against the defendant claiming damages for negligence. In June 1970 he married and in September 1971 his wife gave birth to a child. M's action was tried in June 1972 and on 6th June he was awarded £37,548 damages made up as follows: (i) special damages (lost earnings to the date of trial), £2,548; (ii) loss of future earnings (15 years at £1,000 per year), £15,000; (iii) general damages for pain and suffering, loss of amenities and risk of loss of expectation of life, £20,000. In July 1972 the defendant appealed seeking a reduction of the award.

e In October 1972 M was convicted of four offences of procuring for himself a dangerous drug (palfium) and asked for 14 other similar offences to be taken into consideration. He was placed on probation on condition that he received hospital treatment as an in-patient. Three days later, on 22nd October, M took an overdose of drugs and died. At the hearing of the defendant's appeal in February 1973 the defendant sought to introduce as fresh evidence the fact that M had died. The defendant also sought to introduce evidence of M's criminal record before the date of trial but later disclaimed any reliance on it. M's administrators, who had been substituted as plaintiffs, contended that the evidence of M's death should not be admitted since the trial judge, in making his award, had taken into account all contingencies, including the contingency of early death.

h Held – (i) Although the general rule in accident cases was that the sum of damages fell to be assessed once and for all at the date of the hearing, where notice of appeal had been entered in due time the Court of Appeal would be prepared to admit evidence of an event which had occurred while the appeal was pending and which had falsified the basis on which the assessment had been made. Accordingly the evidence that M had died on 22nd October should be admitted and the damages assessed accordingly (see p 885 g to p 886 a and f, p 888 b, p 889 c d and j to p 890 a, post); dictum of Lord Wilberforce in Mulholland v Mitchell [1971] 1 All ER at 313 applied.

i (ii) It followed that, in the light of that evidence, the following adjustments should be made to the award of damages—

(a) the 15 year period for the calculation of loss of future earnings should be reduced to 20 weeks, i.e. from the date of trial to the date of death, giving a figure of £400 (see p 886 b and f g and p 890 b and c, post);

(b) damages of £750 for loss of expectation of life should be added to the award (see p 886 b and g and p 890 d e, post);

(c) in view of the severe bodily injuries and the intolerable and intractable pain which M had suffered, and of which he was aware, during the last 4½ years of his life, as well as the enforced recourse to drugs with consequent addiction, the general damages for pain and suffering and loss of amenities should be assessed at £15,000 (see p 886 e and g h and p 891 g h, post).

Per James LJ. It may be that there could be cases in which the court would consider it right to admit, after a trial on the merits, evidence of the criminal record of a witness who had died since the trial, in order to attack that witness's credibility. But such a case must be a very rare one indeed for it necessarily involves the admission of evidence of what may be of a highly prejudicial nature without there being any opportunity for challenge or explanation (see p 888 g h, post); dictum of Tucker LJ in Braddock v Tillotsons Newspapers Ltd [1949] 2 All ER at 311 considered.

Appeal

By a writ issued on 5th January 1970 and subsequently amended David Alastair McCann brought an action against the defendants (1) John Sheppard and (2) John Whethan Cart claiming damages for personal injuries and consequential loss caused by the negligence of the first defendant in the driving of a motor car near Bristol on 15th August 1968 or alternatively by the negligence of the second defendant in the

- a driving of a motor van or alternatively by reason of the negligence of both defendants. On 6th June 1972, terms of settlement having been agreed by the parties as to liability and the action having been tried by Park J without a jury at Bristol, it was ordered (1) that by consent judgment should be entered for the second defendant against the plaintiff, (2) that the first defendant pay the plaintiff the sum of £41,252, being as to £2,548 agreed special damages, and £399 interest thereon at 3½ per cent from 15th August 1968 to the date of judgment, as to £20,000 for general damages and £3,365 interest thereon at 7 per cent from 8th January 1970 to the date of judgment and as to £15,000 damages for loss of future earnings. By notice of appeal dated 18th July 1972 the first defendant appealed against that order seeking a reduction of the awards for loss of future earnings and general damages. On 21st December 1972 a supplemental notice of appeal was lodged asserting that the plaintiff had died on 22nd October 1972 and contending that the judge had erred in regarding the plaintiff as a genuine and credible witness. On 12th February 1973 the administrators of the plaintiff's estate obtained an order making them plaintiffs in the action. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

Peter Fallon QC and John Royce for the first defendant.

C J S French QC and Betty Knightly for the plaintiffs.

Cur adv vult

15th March. The following judgments were read.

- LORD DENNING MR. In this case we heard some fresh evidence de bene esse. I will bring it in so as to complete the story, but I will exclude it from consideration hereafter, if need be.

- David Alastair McCann was born on 25th November 1943 in Northern Ireland. As a young man of 18 he came over to England. He worked in a circus as an elephant groom. He used the name Raddy Green and got into trouble with the police on a few occasions. Usually it resulted in a fine, but on one occasion he was sent to prison for four months for breaking into a store and stealing. Afterwards he went back to his own name—David McCann—and had various jobs in Bristol. Latterly he was engaged in demolition work. Then, on 15th August 1968, when he was 24, he was in a motor accident. He was going to Weston-super-Mare on holiday with two friends. He was a passenger in the back seat. He was very severely injured. His injuries were all to the lower part of his body and his legs. He had a broken pelvis and much damage done to the bladder and other internal organs. His urinary and sexual functions were greatly impaired. His foot flapped up and down. He had to walk with a stick. Worst of all, he was in great pain and had to take drugs to relieve it. He never worked after the accident. He lived on national insurance benefits. On 5th January 1970 he issued a writ against the driver of the car claiming damages for negligence.

- Nearly two years after the accident, whilst his action was pending, on 12th June 1970, he got married. He said that, owing to his injuries, his sex life was practically nil, but they did have a baby born on 3rd September 1971. He said that it was a 'miracle' and that he was the 'proudest man in the city'.

- Now I come to the part of the case which concerns us most: drugs. In order to relieve the pain, the doctors prescribed a pain-killing drug called palfium. He became more and more dependent on it. In June 1972 the action came for trial at Bristol before Park J. He described the pain and the drugs:

'When the pain strikes me, it starts towards the back and shoots down the full length of the leg, almost like an electric shock, and it really hurts; and I have to take drugs; and the drugs I take are dangerous drugs, and I am frightened of becoming addicted, but there is no alternative.'

The judge said that while Mr McCann was giving evidence, he was obviously under drugs. On 6th June 1972 the judge awarded him these sums: a

Special damages for loss of earnings up to the date of trial	2,548
Loss of future earnings (15 years at £1,000 a year)	15,000
General damages for pain and suffering, loss of amenities and risk of loss of expectation of life	20,000
Total:	37,548

When interest was added, the total judgment entered for him was £41,252 and costs.

On 18th July 1972 the first defendant gave notice of appeal to this court contending that the award was excessive, and asked that it should be reduced to such sum as this court thought just and equitable. c

Meanwhile, however, in March 1972, two or three months before the hearing, Mr McCann had gone to live in Birmingham with his wife's people. Whilst there, he obtained drugs in this way: he used to go to a doctor and say that he was a temporary resident and was in need of palfium. He produced the certificates from his doctor at Bristol. He went from one doctor to another getting drugs, sometimes using a false name. The police found out about it. On 18th October 1972 he was prosecuted at the Oldbury Magistrates' Court. He pleaded guilty to four cases of procuring for himself a dangerous drug (palfium) and asked for 14 other similar cases to be taken into consideration. These dated back to April 1972. The justices put him on probation, and made a condition that he should receive treatment as an in-patient at All Saints Hospital for one year. That was Wednesday, 18th October 1972. On Saturday, 21st October 1972, he left the hospital for the weekend. On the Sunday afternoon he took an overdose of drugs and died. d

Now, here is the point. The appeal of the first defendant was still pending to this court. It came on for hearing on Wednesday, 28th February 1973. The first defendant sought to introduce a good deal of fresh evidence, which we heard de bene esse; but, as the case developed, counsel for the first defendant disclaimed any reliance on it. He acknowledged that the award of damages made by the judge could not be upset on the evidence as it stood before him. Eventually, the only fresh evidence that he sought to introduce was the fact that Mr McCann died on 22nd October 1972. This, he said, was such an overwhelming event—which had occurred since the trial—that this court should admit evidence of it and reduce the award to take account of it. e

During the argument, it was suggested that, if the award of £37,548 and interest was reduced on account of his death, the widow might recover the difference by bringing an action under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959. But I doubt this. There are two authorities which suggest that she cannot do so. The first is *Read v The Great Eastern Railway Co*¹. In that case the injured plaintiff, in his lifetime, received a sum in full satisfaction of his claim. He afterwards died from his injuries. His widow then sought to sue under the Fatal Accidents Acts. The court held that she could not do so. In argument, Lush J put this very question²: 'Suppose that the deceased had brought an action and recovered and then died, could his widow bring another action?' In his judgment, Blackburn J gave the answer³: '... to hold this would be to strain the words of the section'. The second is *Murray v Shuter*⁴. Mr Murray was so severely injured that he could only be expected to survive for a few months. His advisors thought that the damages would be £15,000 or £16,000, if the case was tried whilst he was alive. So they applied to adjourn the case until after he was dead, because his f a widow and child might receive £60,000. We granted an adjournment for nine months so as to let him die. I said¹:

‘Once his claim was disposed of during his lifetime, his dependants could recover nothing more. They would have no separate action for their own benefit.’

b In these circumstances, it is open to doubt whether the widow here would have any claim under the Fatal Accidents Acts. Her husband has sued the first defendant to judgment. Under that Act, the matter must be looked at as at the time of his death. Applying the words of s 1 of the Fatal Accidents Act 1846, ‘if death had not ensued’, would he himself have been entitled to maintain an action and recover damages for negligence? I do not think so for the simple reason that he had already recovered judgment; and, having done that, he could not maintain another action for the same cause.

c It would appear, therefore, that the present action is the only one which lies in respect of the injuries to David McCann in the motor accident. He died intestate. His widow and child will benefit from any award of damages in this action, but they will not have any additional action on their own account.

d What then are the damages proper to be awarded in this action? If they were to be assessed as at the trial before Park J, his award was right at that time, and we would not interfere. But it is open to this court, if we think right, to receive evidence as to matters which have occurred after the date of the trial: see RSC Ord 59, r 10 (2). In this case, therefore, we are at liberty to receive evidence of the death of David McCann. If we do receive it, then it is our duty to rehear the case in the light of that evidence and to assess the damages as at the time of rehearing, that is, at the time when we hear the appeal. That was decided by the House of Lords in *Attorney-General v Birmingham, Tame and Rea District Drainage Board*², and *Murphy v Stone Wallwork (Charlton) Ltd*³.

e Should we receive evidence that David McCann died on 22nd October 1972, pending the appeal to this court? Counsel for the first defendant submits that we should not do so, because at the trial the learned judge took into account all contingencies, including the contingency of early death. He recalls the wise words of Lord Pearson in the three leading cases of *Curwen v James*⁴; *Murphy v Stone Wallwork (Charlton) Ltd*⁵ and *Mulholland v Mitchell*⁶. The general rule in accident cases is that the sum of damages falls to be assessed once and for all at the time of the hearing; and this court will be slow to admit evidence of subsequent events to vary it. It will not normally do so after the time for appeal has expired without an appeal being entered—because the proceedings are then at an end. They have reached finality. But if notice of appeal has been entered in time—and pending the appeal, a supervening event occurs such as to falsify the previous assessment—then the court will be more ready to admit fresh evidence—because, until the appeal is heard and determined, the proceedings are still pending. Finality has not been reached. It is in every case a matter for the discretion of the court. In *Mulholland v Mitchell*⁷ Lord Wilberforce gave helpful guidance as to the way in which the discretion should be exercised. This case seems to me to come within his words that ‘it would affront common sense’ if we shut our eyes to the fact of death. The damages which the judge awarded were intended as compensation for the injured man himself—during the long years of life which the judge thought he would suffer pain and lose earnings. They were not intended to provide for the widow or child in case of his death. I would, therefore, admit the evidence that David McCann died on 22nd October 1972, and assess his damages accordingly. a

Some items are clear:

Special damages for loss of earnings up to the date of trial—June 1972	2,548	b
Loss of future earnings from date of trial—June 1972—to date of death—22nd October 1972	400
Loss of expectation of life (see Yorkshire Electricity Board v Naylor ¹)	750
Loss of earnings during 'lost years' (see Oliver v Ashman ²)	nil

The difficult item is general damages for pain and suffering and loss of amenities of life—to cover the period from the accident in August 1968 to the death in October 1972, that is, 4½ years. The pain and suffering was far greater than in most of the cases that come before the court. A tragic consequence is that the drugs prescribed for relieving the pain turned him into a drug addict—so that he used deception to get drugs—and was brought before the courts. The loss of amenities of life was far greater than in most cases. There was grave sexual incapacity and difficulty in passing water, much constipation and unpleasantness attendant on it, and there was inability to do any kind of work or recreational activity. His life was so hopeless that it may be that he took an overdose of drugs so as to put an end to it, or, of course, it may have been an accident. We do not know. But, I must say that such grievous consequences for 4½ years do merit a considerable sum of general damages. He suffered much more than the 'unconscious' cases where the injured person is turned into a vegetable without feeling. When I consider the damages in those cases, I would put the general damages here at £15,000. This gives a total of £18,698, plus interest, of course. The sum will be for the benefit of the widow and child. c

I would allow the appeal, accordingly. d

STAMP LJ. I prefer to express no opinion as to the prospects of success in an action brought by the widow or child under the Fatal Accidents Acts. But agreeing, as I do, that evidence of the death of Mr McCann ought to be admitted, it must, I think, follow that damages for loss of future earnings should be reduced to the extent indicated by Lord Denning MR, that the new factual situation calls for an award of £750 for loss of expectation of life and for a new appraisal under the head of general damage for pain, suffering and loss of amenities. e

The extent and nature of the appalling injuries and pain and physical and mental suffering which Mr McCann suffered and endured have been sufficiently described by Lord Denning MR. I agree with him that the figure for general damages should be assessed at £15,000. There was no prospect which can fairly be taken into account of Mr McCann, had there been no accident, making any savings out of earnings; and, irrespective of *Oliver v Ashman*² nothing could be assessed under that head. f

I would allow the appeal to the extent indicated by Lord Denning MR. g

JAMES LJ. On 15th August 1968 Mr David Alastair McCann, a single man aged 24 years, suffered serious injuries when the car in which he was a passenger collided with another car. McCann brought an action for damages against both drivers. It was agreed at the trial that the first defendant alone was liable to pay, and the second defendant is no longer involved in the action. Quantum was the only contested issue. h a On 6th June 1972 Park J ordered judgment to be entered for McCann in the total sum of £41,252 made up as follows: 1. General damages for pain and suffering, loss of amenities and loss of expectation of life, £20,000. 2. For loss of future earnings £15,000—calculated at £1,000 per annum for 15 years. 3. Special damages, the agreed sum of £2,548. 4. Interest agreed on the basis of the sums awarded for general damages and special damages, £3,704. On 18th July 1972, within the time limited for serving notice, the first defendant gave notice of appeal against the amount of damages awarded.

b On 22nd October 1972 McCann was found dead at his home. The first defendant became aware of this and enquiries were made on his behalf into the circumstances of death. On 21st December 1972 a supplemental notice of appeal was given asserting the fact of death and also contending that the judge had erred in regarding McCann as a genuine and credible witness. The first defendant seeks leave to call

c further evidence on these matters.

On 12th February 1973 the administrators of the estate of McCann obtained an order making them plaintiffs in the action. They are now the respondents to the appeal, and on 13th February 1973 they served notice of appeal seeking (i) an increase in the sum awarded for loss of future earnings and, contingent on the court admitting evidence of the death of McCann after the trial, (ii) an increase in the award for loss of expectation of life and an increase in the general award of damages to reflect the loss of prospects of making provision for his dependants.

As will be apparent from what I have said the case raises a number of important issues. The first arises out of the death of McCann. The court is aware of the fact of death because his administrators are now on the record and there is a cross-appeal. The court being aware of the death, the first defendant asks the court to admit

e evidence of it and, having admitted that evidence, to vary the amount of damages to the sum which would have been the proper award had it been known at the trial that McCann's expectation of life extended only to 22nd October 1972.

The first defendant also asked the court to admit other evidence not available to him at the time of the trial. First, the evidence of Detective Inspector Smith of New Scotland Yard to prove that McCann had suffered in the years 1960 to 1967 a number of convictions for comparatively minor criminal offences; that after the accident in August 1968 he was placed on probation for an offence of causing wilful damage, and, on 18th October 1972, four days before his death, he was convicted of offences of procuring dangerous drugs for his own use by deception. Secondly, the evidence of Detective Inspector Neilson, who is a member of the dangerous drugs squad of the West Midlands police force, to prove McCann's involvement in obtaining prescriptions for drugs from doctors, by giving false names and addresses, and pretending that he was a temporary resident in the area. There were apparently 14 instances of his doing so in the period 19th March to 2nd June 1972, just before the trial, and four more instances in the period 10th to 14th June 1972, a week after the trial. In relation to this evidence it is of interest to observe that the judge said of McCann:

h 'I want to say at this stage that it seems to me that while [McCann] was giving evidence he was obviously under drugs, he found it very difficult to follow many of the questions he was asked and he found it difficult to frame his answers to them.'

i The evidence of the witness, Detective Inspector Neilson, is also directed to his assessment of McCann as an 'evasive, difficult man' and 'a compulsive liar'.

The court heard the evidence de bene esse in order to understand the nature of the evidence when deciding the question whether to admit all or any part of it. At the conclusion of his argument counsel for the first defendant informed the court that he desired to rely only on the evidence of death.

RSC Ord 59, r 10 (2), provides:

'The Court of Appeal shall have power to receive further evidence on questions of fact . . . but, in the case of an appeal from a judgment after trial or hearing of any cause or matter on the merits, no such further evidence (other than evidence as to matters which have occurred after the date of the trial or hearing) shall be admitted except on special grounds.'

The evidence of the involvement of McCann in obtaining drugs unlawfully, his conviction of such offences, and his death in October 1972, relates to matters which have occurred after the date of the trial, and no special grounds are needed to justify the receiving of that evidence. Whether the remainder of the further evidence should be admitted falls to be decided on the well-known principles expressed in *Ladd v Marshall*¹ by Denning LJ:

' . . . first, it must be shown that the evidence could not have been obtained with reasonable diligence for use at the trial: second, the evidence must be such that, if given, it would probably have an important influence on the result of the case, though it need not be decisive: third, the evidence must be such as is presumably to be believed, or in other words, it must be apparently credible, although it need not be incontrovertible.'

The first and third prerequisites are without doubt satisfied. Whether the second condition is satisfied is more questionable, but in view of counsel for the first defendant's statement that he does not wish to rely on the evidence it is unnecessary to consider that matter in detail.

In *Braddock v Tillotsons Newspapers Ltd*² the question arose whether evidence directed solely to the issue of the credibility of a witness should be allowed to be given as further evidence. The same question arises in this case in relation to the evidence of McCann's convictions previous to the trial. Tucker LJ³ in that case expressed the opinion that such evidence should only be admitted when—

'the evidence is of such a nature and the circumstances . . . are such that no reasonable jury could be expected to act on the evidence of the witness whose character has been called in question.'

Applying that test to the present case, the evidence of the convictions and of the police officer's opinion of McCann's credibility ought not in my judgment to be received. It may be that there could be a case in which the court would consider it right to admit, after a trial on the merits, evidence of the criminal record of a witness who has died since the trial, in order to attack that witness's credibility. But such a case must be a very rare one indeed, for it necessarily involves the admission of evidence of what may be of a highly prejudicial nature without there being any opportunity for challenge or explanation.

Counsel for the plaintiffs has argued strongly that although the court knows that McCann died shortly after the trial, nevertheless, in the exercise of the court's discretion, the court should refuse to admit evidence of that fact. He argues that to admit the evidence, with the result that the damages awarded by the judge may be reduced, would introduce a considerable element of chance into the litigation. He points out that, had the position been that the first defendant had not entered his appeal within the time prescribed by the rules, the opportunity for calling further evidence would not have existed unless the court extended time for that purpose. Further, it was by chance that McCann died 20 weeks and not a year or more after the hearing. If he had lived for a year or more the appeal would probably have a been heard; or if it had not been heard, the court would not be likely to admit evidence of the event which occurred so long after the judgment. It is only the double chance of the first defendant appealing within time and death occurring so soon after the hearing that enables the first defendant to present an arguable case for the admission of the evidence. Counsel also argues that the evidence of McCann's death relates to a sphere in which, as is usual in this sort of case, the judge had to make an estimate; that having entrusted that function to the judge, it would be wrong to interfere by introducing fresh material, and, counsel argues, that, in exercising its discretion, the court should have regard to the fact that, so long as the decision in *Oliver v Ashman*¹ stands, there is no way of recovering loss of earnings for 'the lost years', and if the sum awarded to McCann is to be drastically reduced by reason of his death, the consequences for his widow and child are grave indeed.

c RSC Ord 59, r 3 (1) provides: 'An appeal to the Court of Appeal shall be by way of rehearing . . .' Where notice of appeal has been served within the time prescribed by the rules and an event has taken place at a time reasonably proximate to the date of the trial, which event falsifies the facts on which judgment proceeded, the court should not rehear the matter on the basis of the fiction that the event has not taken place. In *Curwen v James*², Harman LJ expressed this principle thus: 'There is an important principle here involved and it is this that the court should never speculate where it knows'. In that case a widow who obtained an award of damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts remarried very shortly after the trial. Evidence of remarriage was admitted on the hearing of the appeal. Pearson LJ³ pointed out the dangers of the admission of further evidence and the caution which the court should exercise in considering whether to admit it:

e ' . . . I think it right to emphasise what has already been pointed out—that, in this case, the event in question occurred quite soon after the trial or hearing, and in fact within the time limited for serving the notice of appeal. This case, as it stands, is limited to a case on those facts, and I do not propose to say what the position would be if the event had occurred at some later stage. I do feel anxiety on this subject, because the normal rule in accident cases is that the sum of damages falls to be assessed once for all at the time of the hearing. When the assessment is made, the court has to make the best estimate it can as to events that may happen in the future. If further evidence as to new events were too easily admitted, there would be no finality in such litigation.'

f The relevant principles were considered in *Jenkins v Richard Thomas & Baldwins Ltd*⁴, *Murphy v Stone Wallwork (Charlton Ltd)*⁵, and in *Mulholland v Mitchell*⁶.

g In the present case the judge accepted the evidence that McCann's expectation of life had been shortened by reason of his injuries and their consequences, but the evidence of the shortening was that it reduced the normal expectation by at most 20 years. Thus it did not encroach on the period of years immediately following the trial to which the court would be looking when assessing future loss of earnings and future pain and suffering and loss of amenities. In fact, the judge took a multiplier of 15 years for the purpose of calculating loss of future earnings, which multiplier is quite usual in cases where there is no loss of expectation of life. The fact of death brought a dramatic change in the situation. It occurred after only four months from trial. The facts of the present case, in relation to McCann's death and the circumstances of his death, are well within the established general principles on which the court admits further evidence and, in my judgment, to refuse to do so would be inequitable. For these reasons the evidence of McCann's involvement with drugs leading to his death and the evidence of his death should be admitted. What is the effect of the further evidence when admitted?

1. The damages for future loss of earnings assessed on the basis of a 15 year purchase of earnings of £1,000 per annum cannot stand. The period must be reduced from 15 years to the period from 6th June to 22nd October 1972, 20 weeks. For the plaintiffs it is argued that the figure of £1,000 per annum is in any event too low. Counsel for the plaintiffs contends that it is wrongly based on the figure agreed arbitrarily for calculating special damages and it does not reflect future increases or tax savings by reason of dependants. The judge did not accept the evidence of McCann as to his employment and prospective earnings. He had to make the best estimate he could. He arrived at the estimate of £1,000 per annum and I see no reason to interfere with that estimate. £20 per week for 20 weeks is £400.

2. Damages for loss of expectation of life were included in the award of general damages of £20,000. On the facts the judge cannot have appropriated more than a nominal figure to this head. The certificate of death states the cause of death—overdose of pain-killing drugs and sleeping drugs. For the purpose of this action it is conceded that the probabilities are that it was as a result of the injuries and consequent pain that death occurred in that way. On this footing the expectation of life of McCann was reduced to a little over four years from the date of the accident. The new factual position, in my judgment, calls for an award of the conventional figure of £750 under this head.

3. The figure for general damages, £20,000, was awarded on a basis which has been falsified, for it reflects the pain and suffering and loss of amenities up to the date of trial and for a considerable number of years ahead. It has been suggested that as the judge took a 15 year purchase for one purpose, he probably had regard to a similar period, and added it to the period of four years up to the trial, when assessing the £20,000. That would be an award based on a figure of about £1,000 per annum. Counsel for the first defendant contends that the figure should be reduced to £5,000 or perhaps a little more, on the basis that death occurred within five years of the injury. Counsel for the plaintiffs was unable to argue, once evidence of death is received, that the new factual situation does not affect this head of damages. He contended however that the figure awarded was far too low and that on a rehearing the figure should not be reduced, or substantially reduced, even taking into account the fact of McCann's death in October 1972. I have no doubt that a rehearing requires a new appraisal under the heading of general damages, for pain, suffering and loss of amenities. I do not consider that a correct approach is to take a proportion of the sum assessed by the judge according to the reduced number of years to be considered. It is necessary to set out the salient features of the injuries suffered by McCann and the consequences on his daily life.

At the trial evidence was given by surgeons eminent in the disciplines of neurosurgery and urology. Their evidence was supported by their written reports made after examining McCann on a number of occasions. The agreed reports of an orthopaedic surgeon were also adduced in evidence. Stated briefly, the injuries suffered by McCann were severe injuries involving the fracture of the pelvic ring and damage to the right sacral plexus, the roots being torn from the spinal cord. There was a tear of the bladder and damage to the urethra.

From the orthopaedic aspect he made a reasonable recovery, but there remained considerable deformity and disorganisation of the right sacro-iliac joint. The neurological injury and the genito-urinary complication were the main causes of disability. The overall disability, according to McCann, manifested itself in a number of ways. His complaints were supported by clinical and radiological findings and were regarded by the doctors and surgeons, apart from Mr Roberts, as genuine. Mr Roberts, however, concluded his report dated 3rd June 1971 with these words:

- a 'My general impression of Mr. McCann was of a patient who had suffered very severe and substantial injuries and had become much obsessed with them. At no time did I feel that there was any likelihood that he would understate any of his problems and I suspect that he may in fact tend to exaggerate them, possibly even deliberately. Nevertheless, it cannot be doubted that he has suffered very severely as the result of his original accident.'
- b I list the principal features: 1. permanent weakness and wasting of the right leg; loss of dorsiflexion of the right foot requiring him to wear a spring appliance; difficulty in locomotion; 2. trophic ulceration under the right toe; 3. incontinence of urine; difficulty and pain in micturition; 4. constipation requiring relief by manual defaecation; 5. impotence and lack of sexual urge but, be it noted, his wife whom he married in June 1970 gave birth to his child in September 1971, a fact which he,
- c McCann, described as 'a miracle'; 6. diminished sensation in the genitalia; 7. acute pain from the right sacral region passing down the length of the right leg. In March 1969 pain was so acute that a cordotomy was carried out. Subsequently he developed a mirror image pain in the left leg, and, after five months, the right-sided pain returned and attained its previous level. Pain-killing drugs were required for relief with associated risk of addiction.
- d The bare recital of those features cannot adequately portray the gravity of the injuries or the experience of one who is aware of the severe and unpleasant disabilities and knows that his only escape from intolerable pain is through the euphoria of drug addiction.
- e It is the practice of judges when assessing damages in this sort of case to itemise damages under the different heads for future loss of earnings, special damages calculated up to the date of trial, general damages and so forth. This is not to say that in arriving at the sums itemised judges should not, or do not, look at the total sum 'in the round'. In assessing the figure for general damages there is opportunity for 'scaling' in order to achieve a fair total figure and one which is in proper perspective to other cases.
- f In the present case an important feature is the injured person's awareness of his condition. In *Wise v Kaye*¹ a 20 year old girl—paralysed and in a permanent coma—was awarded £15,000 for the bodily injuries she sustained. In *H West & Son Ltd v Shephard*², a 41 year old married woman who sustained brain atrophy and paralysis of all limbs and loss of speech, and who had limited periods of consciousness, was awarded £15,000 for the bodily injuries and £2,500 in addition for her degree of awareness of her condition.
- g Those cases reveal that substantial awards of damages are appropriate for the bodily injury itself, quite apart from pain and irrespective of whether the injured person is aware of his condition. In the present case there are: (a) severe physical injuries; (b) intolerable and intractable pain; (c) enforced recourse to drugs with resultant drug addiction; (d) full awareness of (a), (b) and (c). Looking at this case
- h in the round in my judgment the figure for general damages should be assessed at £15,000.
4. Interest. The sum awarded for interest which was, of course, based in part on the sum of £20,000 will require recalculation and a lower figure substituted.
5. The last matter arising from the fact of death is embodied in the contention of the plaintiffs that a sum should be awarded in this action in respect of the loss of prospects of making a provision for dependants, and in the possibility of the widow successfully claiming damages pursuant to the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959 in subsequent proceedings.
- j

1 [1962] 1 All ER 257, [1962] 1 QB 638

2 [1963] 2 All ER 625, [1964] AC 326

I can deal with these matters shortly. The claim for loss of prospects has its genesis in a dictum of Sellers LJ in *Wise v Kaye*¹ in which he reserved the question whether a sum representing the balance of savings out of earnings during 'the lost years' can be recovered in a case in which life expectancy has been reduced. The decision of this court in *Oliver v Ashman*² still stands and prevents recovery of loss of earnings in respect of 'the lost years'. The present case is not one in which the claim put forward, even if soundly based in law, could succeed, for on its facts the probabilities are against Mr McCann, had he survived, making any savings out of earnings. a

A claim pursuant to the Fatal Accidents Act 1846-1959 would, in this case, bristle with interesting points. Whether it is open to the widow to pursue such a claim is not for us to decide. The possibility and possible results in relation to the present action have been canvassed in argument. I content myself with saying that the words in s 1 of the 1846 Act—'such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages' would appear to put an insuperable obstacle in the path of such proceedings in a case in which the injured person has brought proceedings and obtained judgment for his injuries in his lifetime. b

The question is not bare of authority. *Read v The Great Eastern Railway Co*³ and the more recent case of *Murray v Shuter*⁴, to which Lord Denning MR referred, decided in this court, are against such a claim being sustainable. In the latter case Lord Denning MR⁵ said of the situation: c

'His advisers suggest that the damages would be some £15,000 or £16,000 if the case is tried while he is alive. That would be the end of the matter. Once his claim was disposed of during his lifetime, his dependants could recover nothing more. They would have no separate action for their own benefit.' d

I would allow the appeal to the extent that the sum of £20,000 be reduced to £15,750 and the sum of £15,000 to £400. A consequential reduction in the amount of interest awarded will have to be calculated and substituted for the figure in the order. e

Appeal allowed. Damages £18,698 with interest until date of trial; no interest after date of trial. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused. f

Criminal law – Evidence – Written statement – Identity – Proof of identity – Written statement admissible as evidence to the like extent as oral evidence – Accused charged with making false declaration for purpose of obtaining sickness benefit – Declaration that he had not been working during relevant period – Evidence by company director that accused had worked for him – Evidence in form of written statement including reference to 'Clive Jones' – Name of accused Clive Jones – Whether positive evidence required that accused was the person referred to in statement – Criminal Justice Act 1967, s 9.

The respondent, Clive Jones, was charged with making a false declaration that he had not been working in order to obtain sickness benefit under the National Insurance Act 1965. A statement from an employer was put in at the hearing under s 9^a of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 saying 'I know Clive Jones' and listing dates on which he had worked for him. At the conclusion of the prosecution case, it was submitted for the respondent that there had been no positive evidence to identify him with the Clive Jones in the statement. An application for an adjournment to call the employer was refused, and the case was dismissed. On appeal,

Held – The effect of a statement properly put into court under s 9 of the 1967 Act was the same as if the witness had given it orally from the witness box. Accordingly, in the absence of any suggestion that the Clive Jones in the dock and the Clive Jones referred to in the statement were different people the matter could only be approached on the footing that it was the same person who was referred to. It followed that there was a case to answer; the appeal would be allowed and the case remitted to the justices to continue the hearing (see p 896 a to c and d, post).

This was an appeal by way of case stated by the justices for the county of Glamorgan, acting in and for the petty sessional division of Miskin Lower, in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at the Court House, Porth, on 14th June 1972.

h

An information was preferred by the appellant, Beryl Ellis, an officer of the Department of Health and Social Security, against the respondent, Clive Jones, charging that he on 21st April 1971 at Ferndale in the division of Miskin Lower for the purpose of obtaining for himself sickness benefit under the National Insurance Act 1965 knowingly made a certain false representation, namely, that because of incapacity he had not worked since the date of the last medical (supplementary) certificate furnished by him, i.e. on or about 22nd January 1971, whereas on divers days between those dates he had worked, contrary to s 93 (1) of the National Insurance Act 1965.

The solicitor for the appellant outlined the facts of the case and then read aloud a written statement made and signed by a Mr Hayden Davies pursuant to s 9 of the

^a Section 9, so far as material, provides: '(1) In any criminal proceedings . . . a written statement by any person shall [if certain conditions are satisfied] be admissible as evidence to the like extent as oral evidence to the like effect by that person . . .'

Criminal Justice Act 1967, a copy of which had been served on the respondent on behalf of the appellant on or about 19th April 1972. No objection to the statement being tendered in evidence pursuant to s 9 was made, either prior to or at the hearing of the information, and the justices were told that the respondent's solicitor had agreed to the statement being tendered in evidence. The statement was as follows:

'I am a director of Hayden Davies, Civil Engineering Contractor Ltd, Sully Road, Penarth. I know Clive Jones. He was employed full time as a sub contract labourer by the firm of which I am a director. He worked for Hayden Davies, Civil Engineering Contractor Ltd. throughout the period from 2 2 71 to 26 3 71. He was paid the following amounts:—

£20.00 on 12 2 71	£30.00 on 12 3 71
£21.00 on 19 2 71	£15.00 on 19 3 71
£7.50 on 26 2 71	£12.50 on 26 3 71

These payments were in respect of weeks of work ending on payday Friday. This statement is true to the best of my knowledge and belief and I make it knowing that, if it is tendered in evidence, I shall be liable to prosecution if I have wilfully stated in it anything which I know to be false or do not believe to be true.'

The only other witness was Mr John McKinnon, an officer of the Department of Health and Social Security, who gave evidence on oath that he had an interview with the respondent on 28th January 1972 at his home, the respondent's wife being present throughout the interview. At the interview the respondent was shown a form MED 5, dated 22nd January 1971, form BF 27 dated 26th January 1971 and another medical certificate dated 20th April 1971. The respondent agreed that the signatures were his and that he had received benefit and also admitted receiving and understanding form BF 11D which laid down conditions for the receipt of benefit. When the respondent enquired why those questions were being asked he was told by Mr McKinnon that he had information that he had been working while in receipt of benefit. The officer then charged him with the offence. The respondent declined to make a statement, saying: 'I am innocent. I was attending hospital for treatment. I'll see a solicitor about this.' No questions were put to Mr McKinnon on behalf of the respondent and the case for the prosecution was closed.

It was contended for the respondent at the close of the prosecution case that there was no case to answer on the basis that the words in the statement of Mr Hayden Davies, 'I know Clive Jones', did not enable the court to say that the man referred to in the statement was the respondent and they could in fact refer to any man named Clive Jones and that on the basis of uncertainty of identity the case should be dismissed.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that there was a case to answer but that as the respondent's solicitor had agreed to the statement being tendered as evidence, if the court had any doubt as to identity (i) that the court should exercise its discretion and of its own motion call Mr Hayden Davies to identify the respondent as Clive Jones the person named in his written statement; (ii) that the court should allow the appellant to call the witness, Mr Hayden Davies, personally, to identify the respondent Clive Jones, notwithstanding that the case for the prosecution had closed, on the basis that the submission of 'No case to answer' on the grounds given was a completely unforeseeable contingency, no objection having been made to the statement being tendered in evidence.

The justices came to the following conclusion: (a) that a written statement under s 9 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 could not alone under any circumstances identify a person; they thought that evidence of identification could possibly be furnished by tendering a s 9 statement to which there was annexed as an exhibit a photograph being

- a a good likeness of the accused, and (b) that even a cursory examination of the provisions relating to s 9 statements would inevitably lead an advocate to the same conclusion, and (c) that they could not in the circumstances hear the appellant's solicitor say that the respondent's submission of no case to answer was in the circumstances a completely unforeseeable contingency, and (d) that having regard to all the circumstances the due administration of justice did not require them to exercise their discretion to call Mr Hayden Davies. The justices dismissed the information.

b The question for the opinion of the court was whether the words in the statement of Mr Hayden Davies 'I know Clive Jones' were sufficient for the justices to say that the respondent was the man referred to in that statement and whether in the exercise of their discretion they should have allowed or required Mr Hayden Davies to be called as the respondent's solicitor had agreed to the statement being tendered in evidence.

- LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the county of Glamorgan in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court on 14th June 1972. On that occasion they had before them an information preferred by the present appellant against the respondent, Clive Jones, alleging that in April 1971 for the purpose of obtaining for himself sickness benefit under the National Insurance Act 1965, Jones knowingly made a false representation, namely, that because of incapacity he had not worked since the date of the last medical supplementary certificate furnished by him, that is to say, on or about 22nd January 1971, whereas on divers days between these dates he did work, contrary to s 93 (1) of the National Insurance Act 1965. All that really comes to is that the allegation was that the respondent, Clive Jones, had claimed benefit on the basis he was not working, whereas the prosecution said he had worked on a number of days during the relevant period.

- e We are not told of the manner in which the proceedings began, but we can use our imagination and experience to appreciate that the respondent, Clive Jones, would have been called forward into the dock and asked if he was Clive Jones, and it seems reasonable to assume that he answered in the affirmative, as was the case. The evidence for the prosecution, apart from the evidence that he had claimed the benefit, was the evidence of one Hayden Davies, who was a director of a civil engineering contracting firm in Penarth. He was called by the prosecution for the purpose of proving that Jones had worked during the relevant period. For reasons which are not disclosed in the case, although counsel for the respondent has mentioned them, in the end the prosecution decided to rely on Mr Hayden Davies's written statement under s 9 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967. The defence did not seek to cross-examine Mr Hayden Davies and did not give any effective notice requiring his attendance at court. So the statement of Mr Hayden Davies was read out without challenge, and having given his name, address, age and occupation he said: 'I know Clive Jones. He was employed full time as a sub-contract labourer by the firm of which I am a director', and he then went on to set out the details of the days on which Clive Jones had worked, being the days relied on by the prosecution.

- h When that witness had been called, the prosecution closed its case; the advocate for the respondent then got up and submitted that there was no case to answer and the basis of his submission was that there was no evidence to associate the Clive Jones referred to in the statement of Mr Hayden Davies with the Clive Jones in the dock. Accordingly he said the prosecution had not made out its case.

j On that submission being made the prosecution sought an adjournment with a view to calling Mr Hayden Davies and proving that the right Clive Jones was referred to. The justices thought that would be an inappropriate course to take, and to cut a long story short they decided they would not grant an adjournment, they supported the respondent's submission of no case to answer and dismissed the charge; hence the appeal to this court. a

For my part it is really too obvious to be mentioned that where a statement is properly put in under s 9, as it was in the present case, then the effect of the evidence in the statement is the same as though the witness had stood in the witness box and given it orally. So I approach this case on the basis that the evidential basis is exactly the same as it would have been if Mr Hayden Davies had gone into the witness box, been asked 'Do you know Clive Jones?' and answered 'Yes'. In the absence of any sort of suggestion that the Clive Jones who answered to his name and stood in the dock was different from the Clive Jones referred to by Mr Hayden Davies, I should have thought it was perfectly clear that the justices could approach the matter only on the footing that the same person was referred to. b

Certainly beyond any doubt at all there was at the end of the prosecution case a case for the defence to answer, and this is yet another example of submissions made by advocates for the defence in circumstances which are wholly inappropriate and which give rise to a great deal of waste of time and money. I would allow the appeal and send the case back to the justices with a direction to continue the hearing. c

LORD WIDGERY CJ, JAMES LJ AND NIELD J
29th MARCH 1973 g

Criminal law – Attempt – Belief of accused that his acts constitute an offence – Acts not in fact an offence – Handling stolen goods – Goods having ceased to be stolen goods – Accused handling goods in belief that they were stolen goods – Whether accused guilty of an attempt to handle stolen goods. h

A quantity of goods was stolen from a warehouse. Ten days later police discovered part of the proceeds of the theft in a lorry which was on its way to London. They decided to let the lorry continue on its journey so that they could catch the persons concerned with the ultimate disposal of the goods. The lorry set off for London with police officers on board and a police car trailing it. The lorry eventually stopped at a service station on the motorway where it was met by the accused and others who were responsible for the transfer of the goods to other vehicles and for their ultimate distribution. The accused took a leading part in making arrangements for the disposal of the goods. After a time the police officers revealed their identity and arrested the accused. Although the accused was ignorant of the fact, the goods had, by virtue i a of s 24 (3)^a of the Theft Act 1968, ceased to be stolen goods by the time they reached the service station as they had already come into the custody of the police. In consequence the accused was charged with attempted handling of stolen goods instead of the substantive offence of handling.

b Held – A person who had planned and carried out a course of action in the belief that what he was doing was a criminal offence could not be convicted of an attempt to commit the offence if it turned out that what he had done was not in law an offence at all. Accordingly the accused could not be convicted of attempting to handle stolen goods since, at the time when he handled the goods, they had in fact ceased to be stolen goods (see p 899 g to j, p 900 e and p 902 f g, post).

g Appeal

On 28th September 1972 in the Crown Court at Liverpool before his Honour Judge Jalland and a jury the appellant, Roger Daniel Smith, was convicted of attempting to handle stolen goods by dishonestly attempting to assist in their disposal for the benefit of others. He was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment and a suspended sentence of 12 months' imprisonment, imposed for a period of three years at Birkenhead Quarter Sessions on 21st July 1969 for theft, was ordered to take effect with the original term unaltered. He appealed against his conviction on the grounds (1) that a man could not be convicted of the attempt to commit an offence when the circumstances were such that he could not in law be capable of committing the full offence; (2) that he should not have been convicted of attempting to handle stolen goods because the goods in question had previously been restored to lawful custody. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

a Section 24 (3) is set out at p 899 a b, post.

LORD WIDGERY CJ delivered the following judgment of the court. On 28th September 1972 at Liverpool Crown Court the appellant was convicted of attempted handling of stolen goods. It is perhaps as well to read the terms of the count in the indictment. The particulars of the offence were—

‘... on or about the 28th day of September 1971, in the County of Hertford, dishonestly attempted to assist in the disposal by or for the benefit of Alan Christopher Dixon, George James Mooney, Paul John Maeder and other persons unknown of 890 cartons of corned beef, the property of Arbuckle Smith and Company Limited, knowing or believing the same to have been stolen.’

The essence of it was dishonestly attempting to assist in the disposal of those goods. He was convicted on that count and sentenced to 12 months’ imprisonment. There was another count in the indictment charging conspiracy, arising out of the same circumstances, but the jury were directed to return a verdict of not guilty on that count.

What had happened was this. On 18th September 1971 there was a burglary at a warehouse in Liverpool, and a very large quantity of corned beef in cartons was stolen. Ten days later, on 28th September, two police officers on duty at night saw a large van proceeding down a main road near Sutton Coldfield, and their attention was directed to it because it was obviously overloaded, or had a load which had shifted, in other words it was all down on one side. They stopped the vehicle; the driver was a man called Dixon; he had a man named Nicholson with him. The van was loaded with cartons of corned beef, and for the purposes of this judgment I shall state the facts as the jury must have found them to be, and the jury clearly accepted that the cartons of corned beef in this van were part of the proceeds of the theft in Liverpool ten days before. The van and the two men in it was taken along by the police officers to Sutton Coldfield police station. There was a brief conference between the police officers and members of the regional crime squad. The upshot of it was that it was decided to let this van go on its way to London with the police keeping an eye on it with a view to catching some of the other people who were concerned in the theft and disposal of these goods. So after what was really quite a brief interval, the van set off for London; it had two police officers on board and was trailed by other police officers in a car. They got to the London end of the M1 motorway at about 7 a.m. at the Scratchwood service area, as it is called, because this was the place where Dixon, the driver of the vehicle, told the police that he was to rendezvous with those who were to take the corned beef on. At the Scratchwood service area there were a number of people, including the appellant, who were obviously there to receive this vehicle, and who were responsible for the transfer of the goods to other vehicles and the ultimate distribution of the goods to the ultimate receivers. I take the matter quite briefly, and I do not consider further the fact that many of these facts were disputed in the trial. It suffices for present purposes to say that in view of the jury’s verdict, one can regard the appellant as being one, if not the leader, of a party waiting at the Scratchwood service area for this van with a view to disposing of the contents.

It is clear that not only were they there for that purpose, but that when the van arrived the appellant took a leading part in making arrangements for the future disposal of the goods. There were such troubles as a burst tyre and things of that kind, and he evidently was taking a leading part in seeing that the goods were made mobile again and went on to their ultimate destination. In the end the police officers made their identity known, and the appellant was eventually arrested.

The reason why he was not charged with handling stolen goods was a perfectly simple one, namely that by the time the vehicle got to Scratchwood service area and the appellant began to take an active part in the affair, the corned beef was, as a matter of law, no longer stolen goods. The reason is that by s 24 (3) of the Theft

b 'But no goods shall be regarded as having continued to be stolen goods after they have been restored to the person from whom they were stolen or to other lawful possession or custody, or after that person and any other person claiming through him have otherwise ceased as regards these goods to have any right to restitution in respect of the theft.'

c So in brief, as a matter of law, although the goods were undoubtedly stolen goods when they left the Liverpool warehouse, they ceased to be stolen goods as soon as the police got hold of them at Sutton Coldfield, and they were then restored to lawful custody. Consequently when the appellant began to perform his functions at the Scratchwood service area, the goods with which he was dealing, totally unknown to him, were not stolen goods at all. Accordingly there could be no question of charging him with handling stolen goods. Instead he was charged with attempting to handle stolen goods, and this is another case in which the court has to consider whether a person can be said to commit the offence of attempting to commit a criminal offence, if the offence itself is not capable of being committed by reason of circumstances unknown to the accused. The fact that an attempt is charged means, of course, that d the prosecution are not able or minded to try and prove the full offence. It goes without saying that a man is not to be charged with or convicted of an attempt except on the basis that he has not gone the whole distance and actually committed the full offence itself.

e Attempts arising out of a failure on the part of the accused to complete the full offence usually fall into two main classes. The first class is the type of case where the accused has embarked on a course of conduct which, if completed, will result in an offence but for some reason breaks off that course of conduct and never completes the action required to amount to the offence. There are dozens of examples of which one can think of attempts which come into that class: the pickpocket who puts his hand in a man's pocket only to find it empty; the burglar who is disturbed by the f police when he is in the process of trying to break open the window; the safebreaker who finds when he gets to the safe, it is too difficult for him and he cannot open it. These are all people who have set out on a course of conduct which if completed in accordance with their intention would have amounted to a criminal offence, but who have desisted for one reason or another before the full course of criminality has been pursued. In general, and I emphasise that this court is only concerned to deal with those cases in generality, a charge of attempt can properly be laid in that type g of case. It matters not that the accused might never have completed the major offence in any event.

h But the second class of case is the one into which the present facts fall. The second class of case where attempt is sought to be charged is where the accused has meticulously and in detail followed every step of his intended course believing throughout that he was committing a criminal offence and when in the end it is found he has not committed a criminal offence because in law that which he planned and carried out does not amount to a criminal offence at all. That is this case and the question whether in such circumstances the accused can properly be charged with an attempt is on the authorities a very much more difficult one, and indeed the questions raised are questions which have been canvassed in New Zealand and the United States of America j as well as in the courts of this country.

I think one can conveniently start with the modern cases and not take too long going through the earlier authorities of which counsel's industry has reminded us this morning. I approach this question first of all by looking at *R v Percy Dalton (London) Ltd*¹. This is an immediate post-war case when there were still controlled prices or maximum permitted prices for the sale of various commodities. The accused in the Percy Dalton case¹ were charged with having sold pears at a price in excess of the current permitted price for pears. It seems fairly clear that the accused thought they were breaking the law, in other words that they knew the maximum price and thought that they were charging a price in excess; but when the case was heard out to its end and the details were examined, it was found that in fact they had not exceeded the maximum price and that therefore an offence of breach of the appropriate regulation had not been made out. The question then arose whether it was possible to charge them with attempting to commit the offence of selling in excess of the maximum price. The court held that it was not, and there is a passage which this court finds of particular value, and which indeed has been approved on other occasions in this court also. It appears in the judgment of the court given by Birkett J, and it is in these terms²:

'All the acts of the company [the accused in that case] have been considered by the jury in coming to that conclusion; and we feel it impossible to say on the same facts that the company can be convicted of the attempt to sell above the maximum price when the completed transaction was no offence. Steps on the way to the commission of what would be a crime, if the acts were completed, may amount to attempts to commit that crime, to which, unless interrupted, they would have led; but steps on the way to the doing of something which is thereafter done, and which is no crime, cannot be regarded as attempts to commit a crime.'

That principle, as I say, has been adopted with approval in *R v McDonough*³; it is a principle which this court regards as being laid down by *R v Percy Dalton (London) Ltd*¹ and one which prima facie we ought to follow, and of course if we follow that principle it means that the appellant in this case must succeed, because in the end when he had carried out the full course of conduct which he had in mind, he had not committed the offence of handling stolen goods because the goods were no longer stolen.

Ought we to adopt that principle in the present case? It is of course urged on us by counsel for the Crown that we ought not. We have been referred by counsel for the Crown to a case in the United States, *People v Rojas*⁴, a case which, if one may say so, is as near to the present one as one could hope to find. It was another case in which goods had been stolen, had been recovered by the police, and had gone back into lawful custody, and therefore were not stolen at the time when the accused sought to deal with them. There the full Supreme Court of California took the conclusion contrary to the appellant's argument that an attempt could properly be charged, the basis of it being that the accused had done everything which he intended to do, and had done it with a guilty mind; and no doubt there are social arguments which suggest that such a person should be liable to be punished as guilty of an attempt notwithstanding the principle laid down in *R v Percy Dalton (London) Ltd*¹.

In New Zealand, where again almost exactly the same point has arisen, we have *R v Donnelly*⁵. This again was a case similar to the present, and here, by a majority of two to one, the Court of Appeal in Wellington held in favour of our present appellant, in other words took the view that an attempt could not be charged in the circumstances. Haslam J, however, gave a carefully reasoned judgment in dissent in which he would have held that an attempt could be charged.

So far as more recent authorities in this country are concerned, there are two which counsel for the appellant mentioned with some hesitation, though of course in clear recognition of his duty as counsel, because he said they might be thought to be against a him. The first is R v Miller, *R v Page*¹, a case which came before a division of the Court of Criminal Appeal on which I was sitting. The facts according to the headnote were:

b 'The driver of a lorry transporting bales of woollen rags was approached by the appellants, who suggested that for a monetary reward he should permit them to steal a lorry load of these bales. The driver reported the matter to his employer and thereafter, acting on his employer's instructions, took the lorry to an appointed place and there helped the appellants to unload it. The appellants were convicted of larceny of the bales.'

In the Court of Criminal Appeal, however, it was held—

c 'that the conviction of larceny could not stand, as the property had not been taken invito domino; but that as the evidence disclosed the offence of attempted larceny, the court would . . . substitute convictions of attempted larceny.'

d So the reasoning of this court in R v Miller, *R v Page*¹ is that since the owners of the goods consented to the stratagem and permitted the goods to be taken by the would-be thieves, the goods were no longer taken without the consent of the owner and as a matter of technicality the offence of larceny was not committed. However, this court held notwithstanding that the offence of attempted larceny had been committed. The report does not indicate any extensive argument on the issue with which we are today concerned. It appears to have arisen in the course of the argument for the Crown, other matters of another nature having occupied counsel for the appellants. In particular *R v Percy Dalton (London) Ltd*² was not referred to, which perhaps in the circumstances which I have already recounted was rather unsatisfactory. The reasons of the court given by Howard J do not really go into this matter in any detail. Howard J said³:

f 'We have listened to the submissions made by Mr. Bolland and Mr. Leggatt with regard to the question of an attempt to commit larceny. Mr. Bolland says that there could not be a conviction of attempt to commit larceny if in the circumstances of this case there was no larceny because the owner had, through his servant, in substance and in reality, handed over the goods to the appellants. He says the only way in which the matter could be regarded would be as a conspiracy and then subsequent acts would be acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy, but in our view it seems plain on the evidence here that the fact that it was in the circumstances impossible to commit larceny is no bar to a conviction of an attempt to commit larceny.'

g And so it was held. I have no personal recollection of the case and cannot assist from that direction, and I can only really repeat on R v Miller, *R v Page*¹ the observation which has been made elsewhere, that it is a somewhat unsatisfactory authority because it lacks any further reasoning in support of its conclusion than the reasons which h I have read.

i One comes therefore finally to the most recent case on this topic, R v Curbishley, *R v Crispin*⁴, decided in this court. That was a case in which the appellants as parties to a plan concerned with the movement of stolen goods had been assigned as their part in the plan to take a vehicle to a certain place, there to pick up the stolen goods or part of them, a role not unlike that of the appellant in the case which is now before us. They knew that the goods were going to be stolen goods; they knew that they were going to handle stolen goods in the technical sense. They went there in accordance with the plan, but when they got there the goods were not there and they therefore had to turn round and come home again. The convictions which had been recorded at the Buckinghamshire Quarter Sessions of dishonestly attempting to assist in the removal or disposal of stolen goods were upheld. We do not think that R v Curbishley, *R v Crispin*¹ is really in any way inconsistent with Birkett J's dictum in *R v Percy Dalton (London) Ltd*², nor do we think that it really carries weight against the appellant in the present appeal, because on the brief facts which I have outlined you have on the face of it a clear example of a man who sets out to commit a criminal offence, and who is unable to complete the full course of action which would amount to the commission of that offence by reason of some intervention on the part of others. The only reason why they did not commit the full offence was because the goods were not there when they went to pick them up. That seems to me to fall into the first of the two classes of attempt cases to which I earlier referred, and not to be in any way inconsistent with the argument put forward by counsel for the appellant today.

Counsel for the Crown picks up a sentence in R v Curbishley, *R v Crispin*¹ and seeks to put a somewhat different complexion on the case, because it is to be observed there that the goods had not only been removed when the appellant arrived to collect them, but had been removed by the police. Of course if they had been removed by the police they might well have got back into lawful custody as a result of that, and R v Curbishley, *R v Crispin*¹ might then become on all fours with the case we are deciding.

We are not impressed by that argument because there is not a word in the report to suggest that anyone regarded removal by the police as significant or that the point we have to decide was argued at all. On its face it seems to be a straightforward example of class one attempts where the only reason why the full offence was not committed was that the accused broke off the course of events at some stage before the full details of the crime had been worked out. We do not therefore regard R v Curbishley, *R v Crispin*¹ as being any significant obstacle in the path of the appellant in this case.

In the end we have come to the conclusion that we ought to follow the principle in *R v Percy Dalton (London) Ltd*³ enunciated by Birkett J, supported by *R v Donnelly*⁴ and against which, as far as English authority is concerned, we only have to set the authority of R v Miller, *R v Page*⁵, which for the reasons I have already given, does not seem to us to be a compelling one. Accordingly we think the conviction was wrong in this case, that the appeal should be allowed and the conviction should be quashed.

Appeal allowed. Conviction quashed.

30th March. The court certified under s 33 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 that the following point of law of general public importance was involved, i.e. 'If stolen goods are returned to lawful custody and thus cease to be stolen by virtue of s 24 of the Theft Act 1968 can a person who subsequently dishonestly handles goods believing them to be stolen to be guilty of the offence of attempting to handle stolen goods.' Leave to appeal was given.

Rouse v Squires and others

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

BUCKLEY, CAIRNS LJ AND MACKENNA J

21ST, 22ND MARCH 1973

- b Negligence – Contributory negligence – Causation – Collision – Road accident – Obstruction of highway – Danger to road users – Danger to road users failing to keep proper look-out – Collision caused by negligent driving of following vehicle – Obstruction contributing to collision – Driver negligently causing lorry to jack-knife and obstruct two lanes of motorway at night – Lorry behind stopping and illuminating scene with headlights – Third party driving lorry too fast and failing to observe obstruction until too late – Collision following belated attempt of third party to avoid obstruction – Collision caused by negligent driving of third party – Whether negligence of driver of jack-knifed lorry contributing to collision.

At about 10.30 p m on a frosty night A was driving an articulated lorry along a motorway when, because of his negligence, it skidded, 'jack-knifed' and ended up blocking the slow and centre lanes of the carriageway. A car travelling behind collided with the lorry. Its rear lights remained on. R saw the accident and drove his lorry safely past. d He then parked and returned to render help. Another lorry, driven by F, pulled up some 15 feet short of A's lorry. F left his headlights on purposely to illuminate the broken down lorry. Finally, some five to ten minutes after the original accident, S arrived on the scene driving his employers' lorry at a fast speed. He did not realise, when he first saw the vehicles some 400 yards away, that they were stationary and that two lanes of the carriageway were obstructed. Eventually at a distance of some e 150 yards he applied his brakes but, because of the frosty surface, he skidded. His lorry collided with the rear of F's lorry and pushed it forward with the result that it knocked R down and caused him fatal injuries. R's widow obtained damages against S in respect of his negligent driving and, in third party proceedings, S claimed contribution from A and his employers in respect of A's negligence. The trial judge dismissed the claim holding that S was wholly to blame for the accident since the broken down f lorry was adequately lighted and, if S had kept a proper look-out, he would have seen it some 400 yards away thereby giving himself sufficient time to take avoiding action. S appealed.

Held – If a driver so negligently managed his vehicle as to cause it to obstruct the highway and constitute a danger to other road users (including those who were g driving too fast or not keeping a proper look-out, but not those who deliberately or recklessly drove into the obstruction) then the first driver's negligence might be held to have contributed to the causation of an accident of which the immediate cause was the negligent driving of the vehicle which, because of the presence of the obstruction, collided with it or with some other vehicle or some other person. A's negligent driving had created a grave danger on the highway. That danger, h although reduced by the illumination provided by F's headlights, had continued up to the moment of the collision and had been a factor in causing the collision. A had thereby contributed to the death of R. The appeal would therefore be allowed. In the circumstances 25 per cent of the blame should be attributed to A and 75 per cent to S (see p 906 h to p 907 a and c, p 908 c to e and f, p 910 a, c d and h, p 911 d e, g and h j, p 912 d and f to j and p 913 d to f, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Kevin John Squires, the defendant in an action by the plaintiff, Mary Joy Rouse, suing as administratrix of the estate of Tobias Raymond Rouse (deceased). The plaintiff's claim against the defendant for damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959 and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934 in respect of the deceased's death in a road accident had been settled by the payment to the plaintiff of agreed damages of £16,000. The defendant appealed against the judgment of Deputy Judge Norman Richards QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the Queen's Bench Division, dated 20th October 1972, whereby he dismissed third party proceedings by the defendant against F V Carroll & Sons Ltd and Edward Alfred Allen. The facts are set out in the judgment of Cairns LJ. h

Stephen Brown QC and R P Croxon for the defendant, j
M Stuart-Smith QC and Michael Turner for the third parties.

CAIRNS LJ delivered the first judgment at the request of Buckley LJ. On the night of 23rd December 1968, on the M1 motorway, a multiple accident or series of accidents occurred as a result of which Mr Rouse was killed. His widow brought an a action under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959 against the defendant, Mr Squires, the driver of one of the vehicles involved. The action was compromised by the payment of £16,000 and it is accepted that that was a proper settlement. Mr Squires, however, had taken third party proceedings against F V Carroll & Sons Ltd and Mr Allen, the owners and driver of another vehicle concerned, and he claimed against them indemnity or contribution. That issue was contested, and at the trial before his Honour Judge Norman Richards QC, sitting as deputy High Court judge, it was b decided in favour of the third parties, Mr Squires being held solely to blame for the fatal injury.

The incident occurred at about 10.30 p.m. on a frosty night, when Mr Allen, driving his employers' articulated lorry up the north-bound carriageway of the M1, for reasons which were not fully explained but which admittedly involved negligence
c on Mr Allen's part, lost control of the vehicle; it skidded and got into what is called a jack-knife position obstructing the slow and centre lanes of the carriageway. An '1100' motor car travelling on the centre lane of the same carriageway collided with the part of Mr Allen's vehicle which was in that lane. This car is not relevant to the proceedings except that its rear lights stayed on. After that two lorries, or more, arrived on the scene. It is not clear what the order of their arrival was, and it really
d does not matter; it can be taken that the next to arrive was the lorry driven by Mr Rouse. His lorry was not involved in any collision. He saw that there was trouble, got past it, parked his lorry safely on the hard shoulder beyond the scene of the collision and went back to render help. Unfortunately for him, he went and stood in the carriageway somewhere near the jack-knifed lorry. Travelling some distance behind Mr Allen's lorry was another lorry belonging to the same owners driven by a Mr Franklin. He was sufficiently close to Mr Allen's lorry to see what happened to e that lorry. He pulled up in the nearside lane of the carriageway 15 feet short of the jack-knifed lorry, and he stayed there, leaving his headlights on purposely in order to illuminate the broken-down lorry: his rear lights, of course, also remained on.
Finally, along came Mr Squires driving his employers' lorry. He did not realise when he first came within view of the scene at not less than 400 yards away (he said 500 f yards) that there were vehicles ahead which were stationary and did not realise that two lanes of the carriageway were obstructed. He said that it was within 150 yards of the scene that he first realised that a stationary vehicle was present in the nearside lane, and he said that he then braked and moved over to the centre lane. It was not until after that that he realised that that lane also was blocked. He applied his brakes harder, but because of the frosty surface of the road, possibly combined with the nature of the load he was carrying, his lorry skidded. He was not aware that he had collided g with any other vehicle, but in fact some part of his lorry—probably towards the rear of the nearside of it—struck against the rear part of Mr Franklin's lorry and pushed it forward so that it knocked down Mr Rouse and caused his fatal injuries.
After that Mr Squires's lorry careered across the central reservation and for some distance along the south-bound carriageway until the driver brought it to rest on the central reservation.

h Mr Squires was admittedly negligent. The learned judge held that he was extremely negligent: in driving too fast in frosty conditions—he admitted a speed of 50 m.p.h.; in failing to observe that the vehicles ahead were stationary until he was within 150 yards of them, when he ought to have realised it from at least 400 yards away; in failing to realise when he first saw the lights that there might be a breakdown and that he ought to reduce his speed; and in failing to switch on full headlights when he
j saw that there was some obstruction ahead.

The learned judge, while finding that Mr Allen was negligent, reached the conclusion that his negligence was not a cause of Mr Rouse's injuries. It is convenient to read a part of his judgment in which he set out his reasons for so deciding. He said:

'Now that what was called the doctrine of last opportunity is no longer a decisive factor in making liability, where a dangerous act of two or more bodies had,

if I may so describe it, set the scene wherein the accident occurred, that does not mean that one who has contributed to the situation, without which the accident would not have occurred, must necessarily bear some blame. As was said by Edmund Davies LJ in *Dymond v Pearce*¹, a case where the circumstances of the accident were very similar to those in this case, a sine qua non is not an all-sufficient basis for establishing liability. As has been said in many cases to which my attention has been called, in arriving at a decision on causation, the proximity of various acts in time and space must be taken into account, and in this the fact that the negligent driver, the third party, caused an obstruction and nuisance on the carriageway, without which the accident would not have occurred, is not in itself an all-sufficient basis for establishing some degree of liability for this accident. The fact that some accident occurred five or ten minutes before, in my judgment, is no more material here than if it had happened some hours before. What I have to consider is whether the situation which resulted was really causative of the present accident. If the first accident had occurred so that the obstruction which resulted was unlit or lit only to such an extent, due to atmospheric conditions, that a driver keeping a proper look-out could not take avoiding action in time, as was the case in *Harvey v Road Haulage Executive*², other considerations might apply, but here I am satisfied that the scene of the obstruction was adequately lighted to warn any driver coming along and keeping a proper look-out that there was or might be trouble ahead and I repeat that the driver, on his own evidence, was able to see a situation which should have put him on his guard when he was 400 or 500 yards away, a distance which, at 50 m p h, would take him some 15 to 20 seconds to cover, even if he did not reduce speed. The question is whether, in the light of the matters which I have set out, the third party driver's negligence was a factor which really contributed to this fatal accident. In my judgment, it was not. The liability is solely attributable to the negligence of the defendant.'

I do not find myself in accord with this reasoning. *Dymond v Pearce*³ was a very different case. In that case a lorry 7½ feet wide was parked on a carriageway 24 feet wide in a well-lighted road. A motor-cyclist who had a clear view of it for 200 yards and had 16 feet of unobstructed roadway available to him but was keeping no look-out ahead because he was watching some girls on the pavement ran into the lorry and his pillion passenger was injured. Bridge J held the motor-cyclist solely to blame, and this court affirmed that decision. There the case against the lorry driver was founded on nuisance to the highway. This court held that, while there was a nuisance to the highway as being an obstruction, it did not constitute a danger, and, moreover, that the lorry driver was not negligent in parking in that way. The headnote⁴ to the report is not quite accurate in attributing to Edmund Davies LJ the observation that it 'did not present a danger to those using the highway in a reasonable manner'. What he said was⁵: '... it did not present a danger to those using the highway in the manner in which they could reasonably have been expected to use it.' It is not reasonable to expect that every user of the highway will use it in a reasonable manner. It is reasonable to expect that nobody will drive into a lorry parked so as to occupy only a third of a well-lighted carriageway. It would, however, be wholly unreasonable to expect that if you so mismanage a lorry that it obstructs two lanes of the carriageway on an unlighted motorway it is not going to constitute a danger to other road users.

I cannot see that there is any breach in the chain of causation between the negligent driving of Mr Allen and the injury to Mr Rouse. It is true that the arrival on a the scene of Mr Franklin's lorry and of the car provided some warning by lights which would have been observed by a careful driver, but the fact remains that Mr Allen's negligence created a grave danger to users of the highway which the arrival of the car and Mr Franklin's lorry did something to lessen but by no means to remove.

b A much closer case to the present one than *Dymond v Pearce*¹ is *Harvey v Road Haulage Executive*², which the learned judge cited, but distinguished. There on a foggy day the defendants' lorry was negligently placed so as to obstruct nearly half a carriageway which was 30 feet wide. The plaintiff motor-cyclist ran into it because he was driving too fast in fog. This court, allowing an appeal from Slade J who had held the plaintiff solely responsible for his own injuries, held the drivers equally to blame.

c There is, of course, the difference in this case that Mr Squires collided not with Mr Allen's lorry, but with Mr Franklin's. However, this does not mean that the continuing presence of Mr Allen's lorry blocking two lanes was not a factor in causing the collision between Mr Squires's lorry and Mr Franklin's. Mr Squires's evidence includes these questions and answers:

d '... A As I got over the incline to drop down the other side I saw what looked like vehicles moving in front of me about 300 yards further down the road. Keeping at the same speed of about 50 miles an hour I continued on the road towards Leeds. As I got nearer I saw that there had been an accident—what looked like an accident.

'Q Can you give my Lord any indication as to how far ahead of you that was? A Roughly, I should think about 250 yards, sir.

e 'Q Can you be at all certain as to distance, in fact? A Well, I am sorry, it would be less than that, because I think it was only about 200 yards to the incline. I am sorry, it was about 150 yards, not 250, sir.'

I interpolate that the learned judge in his judgment accepted 150 yards as the right figure.

f 'Q What did you do? A I braked and came over to the centre lane.

'Q Pause there. Why did you decide to move over to the centre lane? A Because the first lane, with the accident involved, was blocked.

'Q Could you see at that time whether or not the centre lane was blocked? A It was not until I started to go into the centre lane that I saw what looked like a car blocking the centre lane.

'Q What did you do then, Mr Squires? A I braked harder and the next thing that happened was I went into a skid.

g 'Q And what happened then? A Something seemed to go wrong with the wagon and I shot across the centre reservation.

'Q Before that did your vehicle come into contact with anything? A I didn't know at the time it had. I was told after that it had done.

'Q You accept that your lorry did in fact come into contact with the rear of another vehicle, which we have called the second lorry? A I do, sir.'

h The learned judge did not find in terms that this evidence was true, but he gave no indication that he disbelieved any of it and it was unchallenged. I think this court ought to accept that it was because the centre lane was blocked that Mr Squires had to apply his brakes harder, so producing the fatal skid.

j Another case which supports Mr Squires's claim is that of *Barber v British Road Services*³. There a large lorry was backed out into the road so as to obstruct it and the driver of another vehicle went into it. It was said in terms by Pearson LJ and was implicit in the other judgments, that a driver must not assume that other drivers will be driving at moderate speed or keeping a proper look-out. That was in accordance with what had been said by Lord Uthwatt in *London Passenger Transport Board v Upson*¹:

'In the view that I have formed it is not necessary for me to deal with the question of negligence. I desire only to register my dissent from the view expressed by LORD GREENE, M.R.² that drivers: "... are entitled to drive on the assumption that other users of the road, whether drivers or pedestrians, would behave with reasonable care..." It is common experience that many do not. A driver is not, of course, bound to anticipate folly in all its forms, but he is not, in my opinion, entitled to put out of consideration the teachings of experience as to the form those follies commonly take.'

Observations to similar effect were made by Lord du Parc³.

Counsel for the third parties contends that the jack-knifed lorry ceased to constitute a danger once the other two vehicles, the motor car and Mr Franklin's lorry, took up their positions. The learned judge, in my view, applied the wrong test when he found that the scene of the obstruction was adequately lighted to warn any driver coming along and keeping a proper look-out. If one takes account, as I consider one must, of the driver who, while not deliberately driving against an obstruction, nor driving recklessly without regard to possible dangers, is driving at an excessive speed and not observing or not interpreting correctly lights ahead, I find it impossible to say that Mr Allen's lorry did not continue to be a danger. Its danger was due to its being in a position where it caused an extensive obstruction, lighted in a way which would not make it clear to approaching traffic what the nature or extent of the obstruction was: and it must be taken into account that the road was frosty, so that it would be necessary for a driver coming along the carriageway to appreciate at an earlier stage than would ordinarily be necessary that there was something ahead which required him to apply his brakes. I do not think it can be said that the negligence of which Mr Squires was undoubtedly guilty was of such a character or degree as to take it out of the conduct which another driver ought to expect may occur on the highway.

Counsel for the third parties then relies on the doctrine of the well-known case of *Davies v Mann*⁴ and contends that, despite the view expressed by Denning LJ in *Davies v Swan Motor Co (Swansea) Ltd*⁵ that that doctrine may have disappeared as a result of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945, it is still part of our law, so that the driver who negligently drives into an obstruction negligently created by another cannot recover. In this connection he cited a number of cases, beginning with *The Volute*⁶. A well-known passage in the speech of Viscount Birkenhead LC in that case is in these terms⁷:

'Upon the whole I think that the question of contributory negligence must be dealt with somewhat broadly and upon common-sense principles as a jury would probably deal with it. And while no doubt, where a clear line can be drawn, the subsequent negligence is the only one to look to, there are cases in which the two acts come so closely together, and the second act of negligence is so much mixed up with the state of things brought about by the first act, that a the party secondly negligent, while not held free from blame under the *Bywell Castle*¹ rule, might, on the other hand, invoke the prior negligence as being part of the cause of the collision so as to make it a case of contribution. And the Maritime Conventions Act with its provisions for nice qualifications as to the quantum of blame and the proportions in which contribution is to be made may be taken to some extent declaratory of the Admiralty rule in this respect.'

b In relation to road accidents the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945 may be taken to play the same part as the Maritime Conventions Act did and does in relation to collisions at sea. Counsel for the third parties fastens on the words, 'where a clear line can be drawn, the subsequent negligence is the only one to look to'. I would emphasise the words 'and the second act of negligence is so mixed up with the state of things brought about by the first act'.

c Counsel then referred to *Stapley v Gypsum Mines Ltd*², a case frequently quoted in other connections, but not often in relation to road accidents, relying on a citation in that case of the passage from *The Volute*³ which I have just read. It was in fact referred to by four of their Lordships, but the few words on which counsel relies were of no relevance whatever in relation to the Stapley case².

d Next comes *Sigurdson v British Columbia Electric Railway Co Ltd*⁴. That was a case where the Judicial Committee in reversing a decision of the Court of Appeal in British Columbia restored the verdict of a jury, holding the motorman of a street car solely to blame for colliding with a vehicle which had been negligently driven on to the street car track. But there the defendants had contended that as a matter of law the jury's verdict could not stand. The question of causation being ultimately one of fact, it is not surprising that that legal submission was rejected. In the present case we are dealing not with the verdict of a jury, but with the decision of the learned judge, and since, as I have indicated, I think that he applied the wrong test, I consider that we should feel free to review his finding as to causation.

e Then there was cited *The Boy Andrew*⁵. *Davies v Mann*⁶ was discussed in that case, not to apply but to distinguish it, and the situation in that case was in fact miles away from being a Davies v Mann case⁶.

f The last case referred to was *The Eurymedon*⁷, a decision of this court in an Admiralty case where there had been a collision between the ships, the Eurymedon and the Corstar in the River Thames; the Corstar being drawn up at anchor athwart the river in a position where she ought not to have been, but with her anchor lights exhibited. The Eurymedon, proceeding up the Thames, collided with the Corstar. It was held by Bucknill J⁸ that both vessels were equally at fault, and his decision was upheld by this court. So far as the facts of that case go, they are not dissimilar from those in the present case. There are passages in the judgments which are of assistance to counsel for the third parties' argument. But I observe that Bucknill J, in a sentence from his judgment which is quoted by Greer LJ⁹, said this¹⁰:

h 'The knowledge or lack of knowledge of the Eurymedon as to the improper position of the Corstar appears to me to be a cardinal fact on this issue as to the liability of the Corstar.'

The judge said in that case that it could not be said that those navigating the Eurymedon had knowledge of the position of the Corstar until too late. So in this case Mr

Squires did not have knowledge of the position of the jack-knifed lorry until too late. In both cases it was because of negligence on the part of the approaching vessel or vehicle that that knowledge was not obtained, but the cardinal fact, as Bucknill J put it, was that it was not in fact obtained. Slessor LJ affirmed the decision on grounds different from those that had been stated by Bucknill J, but neither of the other two members of the court dissented from those grounds, and Scott LJ said expressly that he agreed with the conclusion of Bucknill J. He said¹: 'I see no ground for thinking that in holding both vessels to blame he acted on any wrong view of the law ...'

After consideration of these various cases, the conclusion I have reached is that *Harvey v Road Haulage Executive*² and *Barber v British Road Services*³ are authorities binding on us to this effect. If a driver so negligently manages his vehicle as to cause it to obstruct the highway and constitute a danger to other road users, including those who are driving too fast or not keeping a proper look-out, but not those who deliberately or recklessly drive into the obstruction, then the first driver's negligence may be held to have contributed to the causation of an accident of which the immediate cause was the negligent driving of the vehicle which because of the presence of the obstruction collides with it or with some other vehicle or some other person. Accordingly, I would hold in this case that Mr Allen's negligence did contribute to the death of Mr Rouse.

The learned judge said that if he had found that Mr Allen's negligence was causally connected with the death he would have assessed his share of the blame as one-tenth. I can see no proper basis for so low a proportion. I recognise that the House of Lords decided in the shipping case of *The Macgregor*⁴ that an appeal court should be slow to interfere with an apportionment arrived at by the trial judge unless the appeal court concludes that he has gone wrong on his assessment of the facts or on the principles to be applied. That authority has been recently applied by this court to a road accident in *Brown v Thompson*⁵. But there is this feature in the present case which did not exist in either of those two cases: that the primary decision of the learned judge was that the third parties here were not to blame at all. Having formed the view that the negligence of Mr Allen was not a contributory cause of the accident at all, it is easy to see that he was likely to conclude that, if it was a contributory cause to any extent, that extent was likely to be a very low one. But I look at the situation in this way. Of course we do not know exactly what happened to Mr Allen's lorry; but there was nothing to suggest that he had any emergency situation to face. For some reason he had simply lost control of his vehicle, presumably by driving too fast on a frosty road or by unwisely applying his brakes. Mr Squires has been held by the learned judge (and I do not query this part of his finding) to have been extremely negligent in that, in addition to driving too fast, he failed to keep a proper look-out. But it can be said of him that he did not initiate the dangerous situation but failed to take adequate steps to cope with a situation that already existed. Through that failure he must be held to be the person mainly responsible for this calamity. In my view the right proportion of blame which should be put on his shoulders is 75 per cent as against 25 per cent on Mr Allen. I would allow the appeal and give judgment against the third parties accordingly.

MACKENNA J. I base my judgment on five findings of fact which are amply supported by the evidence. 1. Mr Allen was negligent. He drove his lorry in a such a way that it ended up across the slow and centre lanes of his half of the road and could give no explanation of how this happened. 2. Mr Scattergood, whose car collided with Mr Allen's lorry and ended up behind it in the centre lane, was not negligent: he had no chance of avoiding this collision. 3. Mr Franklin was not negligent in pulling up behind Mr Allen's lorry: he did so in order that his headlights might illuminate the side of Mr Allen's trailer and so make the road safe for other traffic using this part of the roadway. 4. Mr Squires, who collided with Mr Franklin's lorry five or ten minutes after the collision between Mr Scattergood and Mr Allen, was negligent. If he had been keeping an intelligent look-out he would have seen the vehicles ahead of him at a distance of 400 yards and would have realised that they were stationary. He did not realise that they were stationary until he was 150 yards away. He did not at any time observe either the rear lights of Mr Scattergood's car or the side of Mr Allen's trailer, although Mr Franklin's headlights were focused on it. He was driving at an excessive speed. 5. If Mr Allen's lorry had not been athwart the centre lane, Mr Squires would probably not have collided with Mr Franklin's lorry. The position of Mr Allen's lorry in the centre lane, observed by Mr Squires just before his collision with Mr Franklin's lorry, caused him to brake harder than he would otherwise have done. Because he braked harder his lorry went into a skid. Because it skidded it collided with Mr Franklin's lorry and so killed Mr Rouse.

On these facts I would hold that Mr Allen's negligence contributed to cause the fatal collision between Mr Squires and Mr Franklin. His driving in such a way that his lorry ended up across two lanes of the roadway was negligent because of the risk it created for other vehicles travelling in the same direction. The risk was that these other vehicles might collide with the lorry or might cause or suffer damage in seeking to avoid such a collision. Though this risk was diminished when the headlights of Mr Franklin's lorry were focused on the trailer, it still existed to a substantial degree, and because of it Mr Squires collided with Mr Franklin's lorry. The case might have been different if there had been no connection between Mr Allen's negligent driving and the fatal collision except that it had caused Mr Franklin to stop where he did.

f We have been referred to a number of cases where two parties were guilty of negligence and it was argued that the negligence which was subsequent was the sole cause of the accident. I would deduce this rule from the cases. Where the party guilty of the prior negligence has created a dangerous situation, and the danger is still continuing to a substantial degree at the time of the accident, and the accident would not have happened but for this continuing danger, he is responsible for the accident as well as the party who was subsequently negligent.

g A passage was read to us from Lord Birkenhead LC's speech in *The Volute*¹. He said that where a clear line can be drawn between the prior and the subsequent negligence will be the sole cause of the accident. There are few reported cases in which this line has been drawn. I do not think it can be drawn in any case where the danger created by the prior negligence is still continuing. It is otherwise, of course, if that danger has been eliminated.

h It was argued for Mr Allen that while his lorry was illuminated by Mr Franklin's headlights it had ceased to be dangerous for motorists keeping a proper look-out and driving at a reasonable speed. This may be so, but it is not enough to exonerate Mr Allen completely. An obstacle may still be dangerous even though the danger has been reduced by lighting so that it no longer imperils those who use reasonable care for their own safety: see the judgment of du Parc J in *Walker v Bletchley Flettons Ltd*² and the speech of Lord Uthwatt in *London Passenger Transport Board v Upson*³.

*Dymond v Pearce*¹, referred to by the trial judge, is distinguishable. There the defendant, who had parked his lorry with its lights on underneath a street lamp close to the kerb, had not created any danger for other traffic. His lorry was not an unforeseeable obstruction, as Mr Allen's was in its position across two lanes of the road. a

*The Eurymedon*² is nearer to the present case. There the plaintiffs' ship lay at anchor in a dangerous position athwart the fairway of the Thames. Her position was indicated by lights which those in charge of the defendants' ship should have identified as anchor lights in time to avoid a collision. They did not do so because they were not expecting to find a ship in this unusual position. Both ships were held responsible for the collision. The position of Mr Allen's lorry in the present case was at least as unusual as that of the plaintiffs' ship in *The Eurymedon*². b

The judgments of Denning LJ in *Davies v Swan Motor Co (Swansea) Ltd*³ and in *Harvey v Road Haulage Executive*⁴ are also in point and support my conclusion. I doubt if I would have given the same verdict as the jury in *Sigurdson v British Columbia Electric Railway Co Ltd*⁵, who found the unobservant street car driver solely to blame for his collision with the plaintiff's car which was stationary across the track. The judgment of the Privy Council restoring that jury's verdict does not compel us to decide the present case in Mr Allen's favour. c

I would hold Mr Allen as well as Mr Squires responsible for the collision which caused Mr Rouse's death, and would fix his share at 25 per cent and Mr Squires's at 75 per cent. This assessment takes full account of Mr Squires's opportunity of seeing Mr Allen's lorry and of avoiding the collision. The trial judge's suggested figure of 10 per cent for Mr Allen was, I think, wide of the mark and ought to be corrected. It may have been affected by the mistaken view on which he decided the case, that Mr Squires was wholly to blame. I would allow the appeal. d

BUCKLEY LJ. I agree. I have not at all times during the argument found it easy to see what the right solution to this problem is, but in the end I have arrived at a firm conclusion. I am prepared to accept for the purposes of this judgment the following propositions which I cull from the argument of counsel for the third parties. Anyone who by a negligent act creates a danger on a highway to other users of the highway can be liable to another user if damage results from the danger so caused. The question whether there is a danger is to be determined by the ordinary test of foreseeability. But for that purpose, when considering how other road users can reasonably be expected to use the road, you are not entitled to assume that they will all exercise the proper degree of care. For instance, one should not proceed on the assumption that every driver will be able to stop within the limit of his own vision, because common experience shows that people do not always drive in that way. But when there is ample visibility and ample opportunity for the driver of an oncoming vehicle to see and appreciate the nature and extent of an obstruction and to take evasive action, then the obstruction does not constitute a danger, and in such a case there is a break in the chain of causation between the prior negligent act which caused the obstruction and the immediate consequences of the latter negligent act of a driver on the highway who causes an accident. In such a case there is what Lord Birkenhead LC in *The Volute*⁶ described as 'a clear line'. e a I ask myself, therefore, whether in the circumstances of the present case there was a reasonable likelihood that a driver using the north-bound carriageway at the time of this accident with which we are concerned would fail to appreciate the dangerous situation which resulted from Mr Allen's negligence, or its extent, in time to avoid an accident. In considering that question, I think one must approach it, as Lord Birkenhead LC said in *The Volute*¹, 'somewhat broadly and upon common-sense principles as a jury would probably deal with it', and one must bear in mind that not all users of the highway will be exercising that degree of care and circumspection which constitutes a proper look-out.

b It is certain that Mr Squires did not appreciate the dangerous situation, or its extent, in time. He did not appreciate, in the first instance, that the vehicles were in fact stationary; he thought for some time that they were moving. The learned judge considered that he was not justified in having so thought; but he did in fact think so. And when he did appreciate that Mr Franklin's lorry was stationary and pulled out into the middle lane, he still apparently did not appreciate that that lane also was obstructed. It was only when he got into the middle lane that, because he realised that that lane was obstructed, he put on his brakes even harder than earlier he had done, and that caused him to skid, which caused the accident which resulted in the death of Mr Rouse.

c Taking these circumstances into consideration, it seems to me that the right inference from the facts is that the circumstances were not such as to be reasonably likely to bring to the notice of other users of the highway the existence and the extent of the hazard which was presented by Mr Allen's lorry being across two lanes of the highway in sufficient time to avoid an accident. In those circumstances, this seems to me to be a case in which there is no break in the chain of causation between Mr Allen's negligence and the accident: there is no 'clear line', to use the expression of Lord Birkenhead LC. Accordingly, I have reached the conclusion that Mr Allen's negligence did contribute to the accident which resulted in the death of Mr Rouse.

d I agree with what has been said by Cairns LJ, in regard to *Harvey v Road Haulage Executive*² and *Barber v British Road Services*³. I also agree with what has been said in regard to the apportionment of liability. Accordingly, the appeal will be allowed and judgment will be entered against the third parties for £4,000.

The defendant and plaintiff entered into negotiations for the sale by the defendant to the plaintiff of certain land. On 15th March 1971 the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff stating that he had agreed to sell to the plaintiff the land, which the letter described, for £30,000. Later the defendant informed the plaintiff that he would not proceed with the sale. In December 1971 the plaintiff commenced an action for specific performance of the agreement. By his defence the defendant denied the agreement; he further stated that he would rely on s 40^a of the Law of Property Act 1925 and that, if the letter of 15th March constituted a memorandum of the terms of any contract or agreement between them, he would plead that it did not contain the whole of such terms and in consequence was not a sufficient memorandum to satisfy s 40. The plaintiff asked for further and better particulars of the allegation that the letter of 15th March did not contain the whole of the terms of any contract or agreement between them. In March 1972 the defendant delivered the particulars requested which stated that the letter of 15th March contained no date for completion of the alleged agreement and further that the defendant had told the plaintiff on 15th March 1971 that he would require three to six months to clear the land and that completion could not take place until the land was cleared; that consequently the date of completion was essential to any agreement between them; and that the completion was conditional on the plaintiff selling three houses then being built by him. In July 1972 the plaintiff started a new action against the defendant alleging the oral agreement in the terms alleged in the earlier agreement but adding the two terms specified in the particulars delivered by the defendant in the 1971 action; he further alleged that the land had been cleared, that the time needed for clearing had elapsed and that he, the plaintiff, had long since sold the three houses referred to in the particulars. The defendant applied for an order dismissing the 1972 action on the ground that it was an abuse of the process of the court in that the sole purpose of bringing a second action between the same parties relating to the same subject-matter was so that the plaintiff could rely on the particulars delivered in the 1971 action as constituting a memorandum in writing for the purposes of s 40.

Held – The 1972 action was not an abuse of the court and the summons would be dismissed. It could not be said that the 1972 action disclosed no cause of action for the allegation of the oral agreement afforded a cause of action. The agreement alleged

^a Section 40, so far as material, provides: '(1) No action may be brought upon any contract for the sale or other disposition of land or any interest in land, unless the agreement upon which such action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged or by some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised . . .'

- a in the 1972 action was different from that alleged in the 1971 action and founded a different cause of action. So far as the particulars of defence in the 1971 action were concerned, either they did not constitute or contribute to a memorandum under s 40 of the 1925 Act for the purposes of the 1972 action, in which case the defendant had not been prejudiced or, if they did constitute or contribute to a memorandum, the plaintiff ought to be allowed to rely on them. Accordingly there was no ground
- b for holding that it would be oppressive to the defendant to allow the 1972 action to continue (see p 917 h j, p 918 h to p 919 a and e f and p 920 d, post).

23rd March. The following judgments were read.

- g BUCKLEY LJ read the first judgment at the invitation of Russell LJ. This is an appeal from the refusal of Foster J to dismiss an action on the ground that it is an abuse of the process of the court. The history is shortly as follows. The defendant and the plaintiff entered into negotiations for the sale by the defendant to the plaintiff of some land and a bungalow, 393 Ongar Road, Brentwood, Essex. By 15th March 1971 the negotiations had reached a stage at which the defendant wrote to the plaintiff
- h a letter in the following terms:

'I, Mr. A. A. Elphick agree to sell to Mr. J. Hardy of 1 Steeple Road, Southminster for the sum of £30,000.00. This is for all land and bungalow situated in Broomwood Gardens and Ongar Road. This does not include Littlewoods being Millbrooks old yard.'

- i On 15th June 1971 the defendant intimated to the plaintiff that he would not proceed with the sale. On 24th June 1971 the plaintiff registered an alleged contract for sale of the land as a class C (iv) land charge. The defendant seems to have taken no step to get this registration removed.

On 13th December 1971 the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant for specific performance of the alleged agreement. In his statement of claim, served on 10th January 1972, the plaintiff alleged an oral agreement of 15th March 1971 which he alleged to have been evidenced by the letter to which I have referred. a

By his defence and counterclaim, served on 24th January 1972, the defendant denied the alleged agreement and in para 2 of his defence pleaded:

'The Defendant will rely upon the provisions of Section 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925 and if contrary to the Defendant's contention the note or memorandum mentioned in paragraph 2 of the Statement of Claim contains or constitutes a memorandum of any of the terms of any contract or agreement between the Plaintiff and Defendant the Defendant will say that it does not contain the whole of such terms and is in consequence not a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the said Section.'

By his counterclaim the defendant alleged that the plaintiff had wrongly registered the land charge and that the defendant had thereby suffered damage, which he claimed. He also claimed cancellation of the registration. c

On 25th February 1972 the plaintiff requested further and better particulars of the allegation that the letter did not contain the whole of the terms of any contract or agreement between the plaintiff and defendant, specifying each such term or part of a term alleged not to be contained therein. On 17th March 1972 the defendant delivered particulars in response to that request. The particulars delivered under para 2 of the defence are as follows: d

'The Note described in paragraph 2 of the Statement of Claim contains no date for completion of the alleged agreement. The Defendant told the Plaintiff at the meeting between them on the fifteenth day of March One thousand nine hundred and seventy one that the Defendant required from three to six months to clear the land proposed to be sold and that completion could not take place before the land was cleared. Consequently the date of completion was essential to any agreement between the Defendant and the Plaintiff. Furthermore completion was conditional upon the Plaintiff selling three houses then being built by him at Warley Road Brentwood in the County of Essex.'

The particulars were signed by the defendant's counsel. f

On 2nd June 1972 the plaintiff served a reply of which it is unnecessary for me to say anything except that it did not contain any plea of part performance.

On 24th July 1972 the plaintiff started a second action against the defendant and in his statement of claim in that action, served on 5th September 1972, he alleged an oral agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant on or about 15th March 1971 in the terms alleged in the earlier action but with the addition of the two terms specified in the particulars delivered in the earlier action. He alleged that the oral agreement was evidenced in writing by (a) the letter of 15th March 1971 already referred to and (b) the particulars delivered in the 1971 action. He alleged that the land proposed to be sold had been cleared and that the time represented by the defendant to be needed for clearing the land had elapsed and that he, the plaintiff, had long since sold all of the three houses referred to in the particulars. g

The reason for the plaintiff's starting a new action in 1972 was that he wished to rely on the particulars delivered in the 1971 action as part of a written memorandum satisfying s 40, which he could not do in the 1971 action because the particulars were not yet in existence at the date of the issue of the 1971 writ.

By summons dated 4th October 1972 the defendant applied for an order dismissing the 1972 action on the ground that it was an abuse of the process of the court. This summons came before Foster J on 23rd November 1972. The learned judge then treated an application by the plaintiff by summons of that date to discontinue the 1971 action as before him; on that application and without prejudice to the counterclaim in the 1971 action he discontinued the 1971 action, and he made no order on the i a defendant's summons save as to costs. It is from that decision that the defendant now appeals.

The plaintiff had issued no summons for leave to discontinue the 1971 action before the hearing by the learned judge, but before the defendant's summons came before the master the plaintiff's advisers had offered to apply for leave to discontinue that action.

b The defendant contends that bringing the 1972 action between the same parties as the 1971 action and relating to the same subject-matter without first seeking leave to discontinue the first action was a vexatious act. He further submits that, if the plaintiff had sought leave to discontinue the 1971 action, he would have been put on terms that no reliance should be placed in the 1972 action on the particulars delivered in the 1971 action as constituting part of a memorandum in writing for the purposes of s 40. This, the defendant suggests, would have been so because the plaintiff would c have been seeking leave to discontinue the first action solely in order to take advantage of material which had come into existence in the 1971 action by reason of the court's rules of procedure for a purpose for which those rules were not designed. The court, it is said, in the exercise of its discretion to permit discontinuance would not allow the plaintiff to obtain such an advantage.

d For the plaintiff, on the other hand, it is contended that the defence in the 1971 action should have contained the particulars which were later asked for and given. Had this been so, the plaintiff could within 14 days after delivery of the defence have discontinued the 1971 action without leave and without being put on any terms. It was only by delivering the particulars more than 14 days after service of the defence, in which they should have been originally incorporated, that the defendant put the plaintiff in the position of having to apply for leave to discontinue the 1971 action. e Accordingly, says the plaintiff, the defendant would have been unsuccessful in securing the insertion of terms in any order giving leave to discontinue the 1971 action, and cannot now properly assert that he has been put at any disadvantage by the fact that the plaintiff did not make an application for leave to discontinue before he launched the 1972 action.

f It is true, of course, that both actions relate to the same events, but it is not strictly accurate to say that they relate to the same subject-matter or transaction. The agreement alleged in the 1972 action is different from that alleged in the 1971 action. It founds a different cause of action which could, if this would have availed the plaintiff, have been pleaded as an alternative cause of action in the 1971 action. If all that is complained of were that the 1972 claim could have been raised in the 1971 action by amendment, this could in effect have been achieved by consolidating the two actions but for the fact that the plaintiff could then have relied on the particulars as part of a written memorandum in support of his 1972 claim, whereas, if the 1972 action were discontinued and the 1972 claim were raised in the 1971 action by amendment, the plaintiff could not so rely on the particulars because they came into existence later than the 1971 writ.

h What is said to constitute an abuse of process in this case is not in truth the lack of any new cause of action in the 1972 proceedings, but the use in those proceedings of material which was called into existence in the 1971 action to satisfy the requirements of s 40 in relation to the 1972 action. In this respect it seems to me that the defendant is somewhat in a dilemma. Either the particulars in the 1971 action do not constitute or contribute to a memorandum for the purposes of the 1972 action, in which case the defendant has not been prejudiced by what has occurred, or, if they j do constitute or contribute to a memorandum, the plaintiff ought, at least prima facie, to be allowed to rely on them.

There may be—and indeed it seems to me that there are—weighty arguments in favour of the view that the particulars do not, on a variety of grounds, constitute any part of a written memorandum of an oral agreement satisfying the requirements of s 40. If such arguments prevail—and they will be available to the defendant at the trial if the 1972 action goes on—the defendant would not have been prejudiced either by the commencement of the 1972 action without the 1971 action being first discontinued, or by the plaintiff's attempt to rely on the particulars as part of a written memorandum of an oral agreement. If on the other hand there is a possibility of the plaintiff successfully relying on the particulars as part of a memorandum, why, I ask myself, should he be barred from prosecuting an action in which they can be so relied on?

If after the issue of the 1971 writ the defendant had inadvertently and for the first time provided a complete written memorandum of the alleged oral agreement by some document outside the action, such for instance as a letter to a third party, I can see no reason why the plaintiff should not have been permitted unconditionally to discontinue the 1971 action to make way for a later action in which that document could be relied on. If the defendant has inadvertently provided a complete memorandum by his pleading in the 1971 action, why should the plaintiff not equally be permitted unconditionally to discontinue the 1971 action to make way for the 1972 action? If the defendant had been compelled to plead material in the 1971 action constituting a memorandum, there might be substantial grounds for arguing that it would be oppressive to allow the plaintiff to take advantage of this in a later action, but I am far from satisfied that this was the case. Assuming for the present purpose that in giving the particulars in the 1971 action the defendant has afforded the plaintiff a sufficient written memorandum of the oral agreement alleged in the 1972 action, was he bound to do so? It would, I think, have been by no means impossible for the defendant to have pleaded his case in the 1971 action without putting himself in a position in which he could be called on to give those particulars. He could, for instance, have denied the alleged oral agreement (as in fact he did) and have gone on merely to plead that, if (which he denied) any oral agreement had been concluded between the plaintiff and himself, he would rely on s 40 in respect of such agreement. All that he need have pleaded in answer to para 2 of the 1971 statement of claim, in which the plaintiff alleges that the letter of 15th March 1971 evidenced the oral agreement alleged in that action, was to the effect that he did not admit that paragraph, or possibly that he did not admit that the letter constituted a sufficient memorandum for the purposes of s 40 of any oral agreement between the plaintiff and himself. On such a pleading I do not think that the defendant could have been required to give any particulars of the kind which in fact he gave, or indeed any particulars at all, and the pleading would have been incapable of being relied on as constituting any memorandum or part of a memorandum for the purposes of the section. If this is right, the defendant may have inadvertently pleaded a memorandum, but, since he could properly and successfully have avoided doing so, there seems to be no more reason why the plaintiff should be prevented from taking advantage of the defendant's inadvertence than there would be if the defendant had inadvertently provided a memorandum by writing to a friend.

It has often been said that the jurisdiction of the court to dismiss or stay an action in limine should be exercised sparingly and with great caution. A plaintiff whose statement of claim discloses a cause of action should be allowed to have his case tried, unless his conduct in bringing the action is clearly frivolous, vexatious or otherwise an abuse of the process of the court. It cannot be said of the present case that the statement of claim in the 1972 action discloses no cause of action, for the allegation of the oral agreement affords a cause of action. The defendant may be able under s 40 to prevent the plaintiff from enforcing the agreement, but this does not deprive the plaintiff of his cause of action. Moreover the plaintiff may be able to circumvent the statutory defence under s 40 by proving part performance, and we have been told by counsel that the plaintiff will plead part performance in the 1972 action.

In these circumstances I can see no good ground for holding that it would be oppressive to the defendant to allow the plaintiff to proceed with the 1972 action. The points which the defendant has sought to develop on the present application a relating to the availability of the particulars as a memorandum or part of a memorandum evidencing an oral agreement will all be available to the defendant at the trial. I would dismiss this appeal.

b RUSSELL LJ. It appears to me that the crucial question is whether, quite apart from the question of any memorandum for the purposes of s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925, it was an abuse of the process of the court or vexatious on the part of the plaintiff to launch his second action, instead of amending his statement of claim in the first action, for example by pleading the contract with different terms in the alternative. I do not think that question can be answered in the affirmative. There is, it seems to me, nothing to prevent a plaintiff from alleging two different contracts, different, that is to say, only as to their terms, in two actions: it is perhaps an c extravagant method to adopt, but that can be dealt with in large measure by consolidation of the two actions under RSC Ord 4, r 10, and for the rest by appropriate orders as to costs. Moreover, if the plaintiff is right in thinking that by this method he will be able to enforce a binding oral contract, against which for lack of sufficient memorandum the defendant would otherwise be shielded, there seems to be justification for the adoption of this method. It follows in my opinion that when the d matter was before Foster J the plaintiff was not obliged to apply for leave to discontinue the first action, and that accordingly no occasion arose for the imposition of that term which it is in effect said that the judge should have imposed, namely that the pleading in the first action should not be relied on for the purposes of s 40 in the second action.

e Accordingly, I agree that the second action must be allowed to proceed. The plaintiff will be entitled to attempt to rely on the defence in the first action as a memorandum if s 40 is pleaded by way of defence in the second action; and also, in reply, if the facts avail him, on part performance. These matters will be for determination at the trial.

f We were not invited to decide whether the plaintiff would succeed in using the defence and its particulars in the first action as constituting or contributing to a sufficient memorandum. I doubt that he would. If an oral contract is made and is alleged in a statement of claim, and no more, and the defendant, contrary to the truth, denies the contract and pleads s 40, it is clear that the pleading cannot constitute a sufficient memorandum in a subsequent action brought by the plaintiff on exactly the same contract after discontinuing the first without leave being necessary within 14 days of the defence. If the same defendant very properly admits, either expressly g or implicitly, in his defence the oral contract and pleads s 40, is the situation otherwise? If it were otherwise a defendant, pleading with the utmost propriety so as to limit the area of factual dispute, would find that the umbrella afforded by the statute immediately blows inside out. In *Jackson v Oglander*¹ Sir W Page Wood V-C said that an answer in which the statute was relied on could not be looked at: true that was the answer to the bill in the actual proceedings and therefore could not be relied on h in any event in those proceedings. But he said¹:

'The Defendant must answer, must swear to the truth of his answer, and must sign it: if I were to make any use of an admission so extorted, I should in effect repeal the statute.'

j I would say in the case instanced by me, to allow reliance in a later action on the first pleading which pleaded the statute would go far to repeal the statute. And in the first action in the present case the defendant did plead the statute, quite apart from the question whether the paragraph denying the existence of the contract alleged is by itself a sufficient denial of any contract for the sale and purchase of the land. a

As indicated, I agree that the appeal fails.

ORR LJ. I agree. If the second action is permitted to proceed, questions will arise at the trial whether the particulars delivered on behalf of the defendant in the first action are capable in law of constituting, for the purposes of the second action, a memorandum, or part of a memorandum, under s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925, and, if capable, whether in their terms they do so. In my judgment, it is not for this court on the present appeal to decide these questions, and all I would say about them is, first, that I consider there are solid arguments which can be advanced on both these issues for the defendant, and secondly that I agree with Russell LJ, that it would be unfortunate if a distinction were to be drawn in this context between a defence, pleading s 40, which denies or does not admit an oral contract, and a defence, also pleading s 40, which admits such a contract. One of the consequences of such a distinction would, in my judgment, be to produce a trap for a defendant who is not legally represented. But the crucial question for the present purposes is whether the commencement of the second action was an abuse of the process of the court, and for the reasons given by Russell and Buckley LJJ I am unable to hold that it was, and I therefore agree that the appeal should be dismissed. b

b Rehearing of appeal

- On 18th August 1972 in the Crown Court, Newington Causeway, SE1, before Judge Peck and a jury the appellant, Patrick Vernon Cross, was convicted on two counts of attempted theft, two counts of having articles in connection with theft, one count of attempted burglary and one count of malicious damage. He was sentenced in all to 18 months' imprisonment (including six months' concurrent for breach of a probation order imposed on 4th June 1971). He appealed against his sentence and the matter first came before the court (Megaw LJ, O'Connor and Phillips JJ) on 18th January 1973 when the court allowed the appeal, quashed the sentences passed at the Crown Court and made in place thereof a probation order for two years. Later on that day (18th January) the appellant was brought back to the court for it had transpired that he had failed to mention that on 19th September 1972 in the Crown Court at Croydon he had been convicted of carrying an offensive weapon without authority, sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, to run consecutively with the sentences imposed on 18th August 1972, and had also been ordered to pay £60 towards the defence costs. In those circumstances the court, on 18th January 1973, cancelled the judgment given earlier that day and ordered that the appeal should be relisted and heard before a differently constituted court. On 1st March the court (Lawton, Scarman LJ and Phillips J) again adjourned the case for the prosecution to be instructed. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

30th March. LORD WIDGERY CJ read the following judgment of the court. On 18th August 1972 at the Crown Court for Inner London, the appellant was convicted and sentenced for a number of offences, attempted theft, having articles for use in connection with theft, another count of attempted theft, malicious damage, having articles for use in connection with theft, attempted burglary and burglary. He was sentenced to a number of sentences to run concurrently the longest of which was 18 months, and therefore the effective sentence was 18 months. He appealed against his sentence by leave of the single judge, and the matter came on for hearing before this court on 18th January 1973, the court being presided over by Megaw LJ.

The court heard argument in support of the appeal against sentence, and was minded to allow the appeal and to substitute a probation order in respect of the sentences of 18 months. It is not necessary to go into the matter in detail, because it suffices to say that this court having considered the matter in detail considered that a probation order might properly be imposed in view of the fact that this young man seemed to have taken on a better way of life since the offences were committed. Accordingly, he was asked if he was prepared to be put on probation for two years; he consented, and the court ordered accordingly.

Later in the same day, it was discovered that the appellant had been convicted of carrying an offensive weapon without authority, an offence which was committed after these matters first came under consideration, and of which the court had no knowledge when putting him on probation, as I have described. The court, I think, took the view that the appellant had at any rate been less frank in answering questions which had been put to him, and obviously was of the opinion that the decision to allow this appeal and substitute a probation order was something which ought to be reconsidered in the light of this additional information. Accordingly, later in the day, he was brought back, these matters were discussed before the court, and the upshot of it all was that the court decided to set aside its previous judgment, and have the case relisted for a fresh hearing, when these additional matters might be taken into consideration. a

At that time the learned registrar who was sitting in court had made a note of the decision of the court, and the note which he had made read in the following terms: b

‘[The court] has allowed the appeal and quashed the sentence passed at the trial and made in place thereof a probation order for two years.’

In due course the matter came back for hearing before this court as at present constituted, as had been contemplated by the order at the previous hearing. The first point taken on behalf of the appellant before us has been that the court has no power to set aside its previous probation order, that it was in fact functus officio as soon as it had made that order and that accordingly we have no jurisdiction to consider the matter, it being finally determined at the earlier hearing. We have had the advantage of a good deal of argument on this particular issue, because it does not seem to have arisen for consideration before. Not having arisen before, we have to consider the jurisdiction of this court to withdraw and alter its decision by the application of first principles. c

It is well recognised that a court of record has power to alter a judgment or order which it has made within certain limits. The limits set in general appear to be that the power to alter the judgment ceases when the judgment is, in the words of the civil courts, drawn up. In other words, the general principle seems to be that when once the judgment has been finally recorded, then the inherent power to vary it is lost. We are satisfied from the arguments put before us, and indeed from our own experience, that that rule has been extensively applied in the criminal courts in the past. It was well recognised that at assizes the assize judge could alter a sentence which he had passed at any time prior to the moment when he signed the gaol delivery and handed it over to the governor of the prison. That was a function performed by most assize judges as almost their last act before leaving the assize town, and the signing of the gaol delivery was the moment at which any opportunity for second thoughts disappeared. Similarly, in regard to quarter sessions, once at the end of the sessions the record of the court’s decisions had been made up and forwarded to the proper authority, the inherent power to change a sentence disappeared as well. e

We think that the same principles ought to apply to this court, and so we have investigated, partly with the assistance of counsel and partly by making our own enquiries within the internal organisation of the court, to determine the appropriate equivalent moment at which proceedings in this court reach that degree of finality when no further change in the decision of the court is possible. It is in some ways difficult to find and lay down a clear moment at which this consequence follows, because neither the Court of Criminal Appeal in its jurisdiction under the Criminal Appeal Act 1907, nor this court, is required to keep formal records of these matters. We have, therefore, had to ask ourselves what, in practice, is done in order to find within the practice that point which seems to us to be the point of finality within the principles I have tried to describe. g

When a judgment of this court is given, the registrar is required by the rules to notify the decision to a variety of people. By r 15 of the Criminal Appeal Rules 1968¹ it is provided as follows: j

‘(1) The Registrar shall, as soon as practicable, serve notice of any determination by the court or by any judge of the court under section 31 of the [Criminal Appeal Act 1968] on any appeal or application by an appellant on—(a) the a appellant; (b) the Secretary of State; (c) any person having custody of the appellant; (d) in the case of an appellant detained under the Mental Health Act 1959 the responsible authority.

'(2) The Registrar shall, as soon as practicable, serve notice on the proper officer of the court of trial of the order of the court disposing of an appeal or application for leave to appeal . . .'

- b It is to be observed that the formality required of the registrar under that rule is in no sense the making of a record. What the registrar is required to do, and does do, when he performs his duties under r 15, is to give notice to interested parties of what the order of the court has been. Accordingly, it does not seem to us that it would be right or appropriate to pick on the moment when these notices are issued as being the moment when the record is made up, because they are, as I have endeavoured to describe, in no sense, a record. However, by order of the Lord Chancellor following the creation of the Crown Court, there is published a Crown Court Manual which contains specific provision as to what is to be done by the court of trial on receipt of notification from the registrar under r 15. What the Crown Court Manual requires is that the officer of the court of trial on receiving notice of the determination of this court from the registrar, shall record the determination so transmitted to him. The actual words are:

'on return of the case papers to the Crown Court, with the notification of the result of the appeal . . . the decision of the Court of Appeal should be entered on the court record and the notice of the result of the appeal attached.'

- There is, therefore, for the first and really the only time the making of a formal record of the determination of this court, and we think that the proper interpretation of the position, so far as the matter presently under review is concerned, is that the court of trial is the court that maintains a formal record of proceedings in this court, and it is enabled to maintain such records by the registrar performing the duty cast on him under r 15. Consequently when the question arises, as it arises in this case, of the court's power to make a change in any decision or order which it has pronounced, the vital question is whether that decision or order has been recorded by the proper officer at the court of trial pursuant to the directions to which I have just referred.

- Applying that principle to the present case, it is quite clear that the earlier decision of this court had not been so recorded, and therefore it was open to this court to withdraw its order and direct, as it did, that the matter should be reheard before us. That, of course, has been done, and the advantage of the rehearing before us has been that it has been possible for us to see that there was no reason to think that this young man was in any way endeavouring to mislead the court in the answers which he had previously given. There was some confusion between two convictions, one for dangerous driving and one for carrying an offensive weapon. The answer which he gave relative to dangerous driving, the less serious offence, was one which he could perfectly honestly have given having regard to the form of question put to him. We therefore take the view that although it was desirable for the matter to be investigated lest there had been an attempt to mislead the court, in fact there was no such attempt to mislead the court, and we have not found anything in our reconsideration of the case which would give us reason to think that the decision reached at the earlier hearing is one which is not justified in justice and in law. Accordingly, therefore, whilst rejecting the submission that we had no jurisdiction to reconsider the matter, we have reconsidered the matter and we have come to the conclusion that the order originally proposed at the hearing of this court should be made.

Arbitration – Costs – Taxation – Discretion of arbitrator – Award directing costs to be taxed 'in the High Court' – Discretion of taxing master – Appropriate scale of costs – Discretion of arbitrator to award costs on any basis he regards as proper – Taxing master acting as delegate of arbitrator in taxing costs – Direction in award to be construed as direction to tax costs on High Court scale.

The claimants were employed by the respondent under a contract containing an arbitration clause. A claim by the claimants for some £971 for work done was submitted to arbitration; the respondent counterclaimed £1,059 for alleged breaches of contract by the claimants. The disputes were compromised on the basis of a consent award made by the arbitrator to the effect that the respondent should pay the claimants £325 and costs. The award contained a direction 'that the Claimants shall submit their costs to be taxed on a party and party basis in the High Court, and these taxed costs shall be paid by the Respondent'. The claimants' solicitors drew up a bill of costs by reference to the High Court scale but on taxation the taxing master disallowed an item which would have been allowed on the High Court scale and issued an interim certificate. The claimants applied for a review of the certificate but, after hearing argument, the master held that the county court scales applied to the taxation. On appeal by the claimants, the respondent contended, inter alia, that, in taxing the costs of an arbitration, the taxing master had, by virtue of RSC Ord 62, r 2 (2)^a, an unfettered discretion whether to tax on the High Court scale, on a county court scale or on no scale at all.

Held – Under s 18 (1) and (2)^b of the Arbitration Act 1950 the costs of arbitration proceedings were in the sole discretion of the arbitrator and it was open to him, acting judicially, to award costs on any basis that he regarded as proper. In taxing the costs awarded by an arbitrator the taxing master's function was a ministerial one, in performing which he was merely the delegate of the arbitrator. The effect of s 18 (2) of the 1950 Act was that, prima facie, the arbitrator's choice lay between directing a taxation on the basis of the High Court scale or on the basis of one of the county court scales. Since the arbitrator's award directed that the costs should be taxed in the High Court rather than in a county court the proper interpretation of the award was that the costs were to be taxed by reference to the High Court scale. Accordingly the appeal would be allowed (see p 926 f and j, p 927 b c, p 929 c d and h to p 930 a and b c and d to f, post).

Summons for review of taxation

H G Perkins Ltd, the claimants in arbitration proceedings between themselves and the respondent, S B Best-Shaw, applied for a review of the decision of Master Razzall whereby, on a taxation of the claimants' costs under an award made by the arbitrator (A S King Esq) on 19th June 1972, he disallowed an objection by the claimants to his disallowance of an item in the claimants' bill of costs. The facts are set out in the judgment.

2nd April. KERR J read the following judgment. This is an application under RSC Ord 62, r 35, to review a taxing master's decision on the taxation of the costs of an arbitration. The issue is whether or not the taxing master is bound to tax on the High Court scale or whether, as a matter of discretion or obligation, the taxation should proceed on a county court scale. There appears to be no authority which covers the point.

The claimants in this matter were contractors employed by the respondent under an RIBA contract containing an arbitration clause. Disputes arose under the contract and were referred to arbitration. In the arbitration the claimants claimed a sum of about £971 on account of money due to them for work done as well as damages for breach of contract. The respondent counterclaimed £1,059 for alleged breaches by the claimants of the contract. I should add, for the sake of completeness, that this was pleaded by way of counterclaim only, though I think that it could also have been pleaded pro tanto as a set-off. The disputes were compromised on the basis of a consent award made by the arbitrator in terms agreed between the parties to the effect that the respondent would pay to the claimants the sum of £325 and costs.

The dispute arises out of the following order in the award which is in a fairly common form:

'I direct that the Claimants shall submit their costs to be taxed on a party and party basis in the High Court, and these taxed costs shall be paid by the Respondent.'

The claimants' solicitors thereupon drew up a bill of costs on a party and party basis by reference to the High Court scale. On taxation, the respondent's solicitors contended that the claimants were not entitled to taxation on the High Court scale. On reaching the first item which would have been allowed on the High Court scale but disallowed under the county court scales, an item of 75p for attending counsel to settle papers, the taxing master disallowed this item and issued an interim certificate under RSC Ord 62, r 17 (1), to enable the position to be tested. In effect he suspended the taxation pending the decision of this issue. The claimants then applied to him under RSC Ord 62, r 33, for a review of his interim certificate which disallowed this item and argued that the High Court scale applied. After hearing argument the taxing master rejected this contention and held that the county court scales applied. The claimants now appeal from that decision and the case has been argued by counsel. a

The statutory power of the courts to tax costs in an arbitration derives from s 18 of the Arbitration Act 1950. The relevant provision is sub-s (2), but it is desirable to set out sub-s (1) as well. Section 18 (1) provides as follows:

‘Unless a contrary intention is expressed therein, every arbitration agreement shall be deemed to include a provision that the costs of the reference and award shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator or umpire, who may direct to and by whom and in what manner those costs or any part thereof shall be paid, and may tax or settle the amount of costs to be so paid or any part thereof, and may award costs to be paid as between solicitor and client.’ b

Subsection (2) provides: c

‘Any costs directed by an award to be paid shall, unless the award otherwise directs, be taxable in the High Court.’

The words in sub-s (2) ‘unless the award otherwise directs’ can, I think, only refer to a taxation in a county court, and this appeared to be common ground between counsel. It was held as long ago as 1735, in *Knott v Long*¹, that if an arbitrator does not himself tax the costs, he can only delegate the taxation to an officer of the court and not to some third party. The report of *Knott v Long*¹ consists of only one sentence and deserves to be quoted in full. It reads as follows: d

‘An award that the defendant should pay what costs two persons named in the award (who were not officers of any Court) should appoint for costs; provided they are such as a Master in Chancery would allow; was held ill, for they can only delegate their authority in that instance to one who, the Court will take notice, understands it better than themselves.’ e

Under our present system such persons are the taxing masters of the High Court and the registrars of county courts. It therefore seems clear that the effect of s 18 (2) of the Arbitration Act 1950 is that unless the award expressly provides for taxation in a county court the costs will, as the section says, be taxed in the High Court. f

The Rules of the Supreme Court and the County Court Rules contain provisions enabling such taxations to be carried out. In the Supreme Court the relevant provision is now RSC Ord 62, r 2 (2), to which I must refer in a moment, which deals expressly with the taxation of costs in any proceedings before an arbitrator or umpire. The combined effect of this rule and of r 12 (1) (b) and (2) of the same order is that such a taxation is to be carried out by a taxing master of the Supreme Court. g
In the county courts the applicable provision appears to be CCR Ord 47, r 41, which deals with the taxation of costs which under any Act fall to be taxed by a county court, though this rule does not contain any express reference to arbitration tribunals. I should add for the sake of completeness that neither side contended that the reference in the award to the taxation proceeding on a party and party basis made any difference to the issue. Both in the High Court and in the county court costs may be directed to be paid and taxed on a party and party basis or on what is now called a ‘common fund’ basis which has the same effect as what used to be called a ‘solicitor and client’ basis: see RSC Ord 62, r 28 (2) and (4), which are made applicable to county court taxations by CCR Ord 47, r 49. It therefore follows that prima facie the choice lies between the applicability of the High Court scale or of the county court scales, though of course in each case so as to include that degree of discretion beyond the provisions of the scales which remains vested in the taxing officer under the respective rules of the two courts. h

a The effect of s 18 (1) and (2) is that an arbitrator has a complete discretion as to costs, though this is of course subject to the obligation to exercise this discretion judicially, as to which nothing arises here. Under s 18 (1) the arbitrator may himself tax or settle the costs and, if so, decide whether to do so on the ordinary party and party basis or on a higher basis. Section 18 (1) gives him a complete discretion without binding him to apply either the High Court scale or a county court scale. Alternatively, he can delegate the taxation under s 18 (2) in which event such delegation
b will be to a taxing master of the Supreme Court unless he decides to delegate it to what on that basis would presumably be a registrar of a county court: see CCR Ord 47, rr 3 and 41. If, as here, he directs that the taxation shall proceed in the High Court and therefore delegates the taxation to a taxing master of the High Court and not to a county court registrar, then the clear construction of his award is that he intends the taxation to be carried out on the basis of the High Court scale and not on the basis of one of the county court scales.

c This is a simple and in my view sensible interpretation of what this award means as a matter of first impression. The argument for the respondent, which was attractively and succinctly put forward on his behalf by counsel, was much more complex. He submitted that the order that the costs shall be taxed in the High Court only directs the venue of the taxation and that the taxation is to be carried out on the basis of the Rules of the Supreme Court and not on the basis of the County Court Rules. He therefore submitted that one then has to turn to the Rules of the Supreme Court to consider what they provide in this connection. The relevant rule, as already mentioned, is RSC Ord 62, r 2 (2), and I must first set this out:

d 'Where by virtue of any Act the costs of or incidental to any proceedings before an arbitrator or umpire or before a tribunal or other body constituted by or under any Act, not being proceedings in the Supreme Court, are taxable in the High Court, the following provisions of this Order [and then it refers to a number of provisions following the one that I am reading] shall have effect in relation to proceedings for taxation of those costs as they have effect in relation to proceedings for taxation of the costs of or arising out of proceedings
e in the Supreme Court, other than proceedings in the Family Division.'

f I must also read para (3) of this rule, which is in the following terms:

'This Order shall have effect subject to sections 47 and 60 of the County Courts Act, 1959 (which limit the costs recoverable in relation to certain proceedings which could have been commenced in a county court) and to any other Act of Parliament.'

g I should add that para (3) of this rule which I have just read is not one of the ones which is mentioned in para (2) among the 'following provisions of this Order' which are to have effect.

h I must also set out part of s 47 of the County Courts Act 1959 which was strongly relied on by counsel for the respondent. The relevant parts are as follows. Section 47 (1):

i 'Where an action founded on contract or tort is commenced in the High Court which could have been commenced in the county court then, subject to [sub-s (3)] of this section, the plaintiff—(a) if he recovers a sum less than £500 shall not be entitled to any more costs of the action than those to which he would have been entitled if the action had been brought in the county court [and then I can omit the following provisions] so, however, that this section shall not affect any question as to costs if it appears to the High Court or a judge thereof (or where the matter is tried before a referee or officer of the Supreme Court, to that referee or officer) that there was reasonable ground for supposing the amount recoverable in respect of the plaintiff's claim to be in excess of the amount recoverable in an action commenced in the county court.'

The material parts of s 47 (3) are as follows:

'In any such action as aforesaid, whether founded on contract or tort, the High Court or a judge thereof (or where the matter is tried before a referee or officer of the Supreme Court, that referee or officer), if satisfied—(a) that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the High Court [and then I can go to the end of the subsection] may make an order allowing for costs or any part of the costs thereof on the High Court scale or on such one of the county court scales as he may direct.'

Counsel for the respondent made three main submissions, as follows. First, that the taxing master has an unfettered discretion whether to tax on the High Court scale or on a county court scale or on no scale at all in taxing the costs of an arbitration because on the true construction of the Rules of the Supreme Court he is not bound to apply any particular scale, whether of the High Court or county court. He said that no scale applies to such taxations. Secondly, he submitted that it would be illogical to give to the claimants costs on the High Court scale when the amount recovered was only £325, having regard to the provisions to which I have just referred. His third submission was that in the alternative to his first submission on discretion, the master in this case was bound to apply s 47 of the County Courts Act 1959 which I have just read.

It is convenient to deal first with the latter submission, and it is right to say that this was the main, if not the only, submission made to the taxing master below on the basis of which he appears to have decided that the county court scales apply. Counsel for the respondent submitted that when one analyses RSC Ord 62, those provisions which are expressly mentioned in r 2 (2), and which do not include para (3) which incorporates s 47 of the County Courts Act 1959, cannot be exhaustive, because one can see that a number of other general provisions, which are not expressly mentioned in r 2 (2), must apply as well as those which are expressly mentioned. One of these, he submitted, was r 2 (3) which applies s 47. He submitted that this rule must be treated as applicable because it applies to RSC Ord 62 as a whole in the same way as other provisions which must have been intended to be included although also not expressly mentioned. So far as concerns the point that in this case the matter terminated by a settlement as opposed to a recovery under a judgment, he relied on the decision of Buckley J in *Colton v McCaughey*¹ to show that s 47 applies to a recovery by way of settlement as it does to a recovery under a judgment, and this point was not challenged.

In my view counsel for the respondent may well be right on the construction of RSC Ord 62, r 2 (2), to the extent that the provisions there expressly mentioned as applicable to the taxation of costs in an arbitration may not be exhaustive. I will not lengthen this judgment by going through the various parts of RSC Ord 62 which, on this submission, should be treated as applicable to arbitration taxations even though not expressly mentioned. But it appears to me that in any event the opening words of s 47 itself present an insuperable obstacle to this line of argument. These words are:

'Where an action founded on contract or tort is commenced in the High Court which could have been commenced in the county court ...'

The present matter is neither an action which was commenced in the High Court nor one which could have been commenced in the county court but an arbitration pursuant to an arbitration clause in the contract between the parties. It is therefore in my view impossible to hold that this taxation must proceed on the basis that s 47 of the County Courts Act 1959 applies to it. There is also good sense in this.

a By s 18 of the Arbitration Act 1950 Parliament obviously intended that the costs of an arbitration should be in the discretion of the arbitrator and not of the courts. There is therefore no reason why the costs of an arbitration should come within s 47 or why they should have been brought within it by the terms of the Supreme Court Rules.

b The second submission of counsel for the respondent was that it was illogical that the claimants should be entitled to recover costs on the High Court scale when they had in fact only recovered £325. He pointed out that, subject to the residual discretion to award costs on the High Court scale, if these proceedings had been instituted in any other way than by arbitration, the claimants would prima facie only be entitled to costs on a county court basis. If instituted in the High Court this would follow from RSC Ord 62, r 2 (2), which incorporates s 47 of the 1959 Act. If instituted in a county court the same result would follow from CCR Ord 47. But in my view this is far from conclusive. It must always be borne in mind that under s 18 (1) and (2) of the 1950 Act the costs are in the sole discretion of the arbitrator and that subject to acting judicially he can award costs on any basis which he regards as proper. The only question in the present case is therefore: what basis has been selected by the arbitrator on the true construction of the award? This question is not answered by referring to s 47 of the 1959 Act or CCR Ord 47 which have nothing to do with the discretion as to costs vested in arbitrators by s 18 of the 1950 Act. I should however add for completeness that there was no argument before me as to how the discretion should have been exercised in the present case if s 47 or CCR Ord 47 were applicable to this matter, and I say nothing about this.

c I therefore come to the third and perhaps most powerful submission of counsel for the respondent. This was that even if s 47 does not apply, the result is nevertheless that on the true construction of RSC Ord 62, r 2 (2), the taxing master has an unfettered discretion to apply any scale he likes or, as I understand it, no scale at all. This, as I have mentioned, was counsel's primary argument. He said that although all other proceedings are prima facie subject to the High Court scale or to one of the county court scales, subject always to the residual discretion of the taxing officer, this is not the position in relation to the costs of arbitrations if these are taxed in the High Court. He submitted that in such cases there is an unfettered discretion. He founded this submission on the fact that the provisions of RSC Ord 62, which are expressly referred to in r 2 (2) of that order as being applicable to the taxation of arbitrations, do not include rr 28 to 32 of that order which are headed 'Assessment of Costs', and in particular do not include r 32 itself which applies the High Court scale. He therefore submitted that a taxation of the costs of an arbitration by a taxing master under RSC Ord 62, r 2, does not, by virtue of the express terms of the rule, apply the High Court scale to such a taxation.

d It seems to me that this is a somewhat difficult argument when the other submission of counsel for the respondent in relation to s 47 of the County Courts Act 1959, which I have already mentioned, rested on the basis that the provisions expressly incorporated by r 2 (2) could not be treated as exhaustive. But in my judgment this submission is in any event not the correct answer to the problem, for the following reasons. First, it seems to me that it does not give any sufficient or sensible effect to the award itself in the context of s 18 (2) of the Arbitration Act 1950. It is clear from that subsection and from what I have said that the arbitrator's choice lay between delegating the taxation to a taxing master of the Supreme Court or to a registrar of a county court. Prima facie, therefore, the choice resulting from a delegation under this subsection lies only between a taxation on the basis of the High Court scale or on the basis of the county court scales. In the ordinary case the taxing masters of the Supreme Court will tax on the basis of the High Court scale and the registrars of county courts on the basis of the county court scales. The sensible interpretation of the award is therefore that by directing a taxation in the High Court the arbitrator has impliedly directed a taxation on the High Court scale. Secondly, it seems to me to be an improbable and unsatisfactory analysis of the position that in relation to the costs of an arbitration a taxing master of the High Court should have an unfettered discretion without reference to any scale as the prima facie basis for that exercise of his discretion. This is not so in any other case. His normal basis is the High Court scale. The only exception is if s 47 of the County Courts Act 1959 applies by reason of the amount recovered and if a judge or referee or officer of the High Court makes no special order for High Court costs. In that event the taxing master will proceed on the basis of CCR Ord 47 and exercise his discretion within the framework of the county court scales. But there is no case in which a taxing master proceeds on the basis that no scale whatever is prima facie applicable. Further, counsel for the respondent frankly and properly drew my attention to the position before the present RSC Ord 62 came into force and conceded that this line of argument would not then have been open to him. The position under the former RSC Ord 65, r 8, would then have been that the taxing master would have been bound to apply the so-called 'lower scale', unless directed by the court or a judge to apply the so-called 'higher scale', assuming that this was procedurally possible in relation to the taxation of the costs of arbitrations which it is now unnecessary to decide. I cannot think that the intention underlying the new rules was to change this position so as to give to the taxing master an unfettered discretion without reference to any scale. In this connection it is also worth bearing in mind that the function performed by a taxing master, when taxing costs under an award made by some outside tribunal, has been authoritatively described as a ministerial function in settling or taxing the amount of the costs awarded by the arbitrator or other tribunal: see Erle CJ in *Holdsworth v Wilson*¹, and Scrutton J in *Simpson v Inland Revenue Comrs*², and *Matthews v Inland Revenue Comrs*³. These cases show that the taxing master is merely the delegate of the arbitrator or other tribunal in assessing the amount. It would therefore be very surprising if he had what would in effect be a total discretion without reference to any scale.

I therefore decide this review on the basis that the proper interpretation of this award, that the costs be taxed in the High Court, is that they be taxed by reference to the High Court scale and I accordingly allow this appeal.

Objection allowed. Bill of costs referred back to taxing master to be taxed on High Court scale.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

b 7th, 29th MARCH 1973

Legal aid—Entitlement – Income exceeding prescribed figure – Income – Income including benefits and privileges – Sums received as benefits and privileges rather than by way of legal right – Element of recurrence – Gifts and loans – Whether gifts and loans from friends and relations constituting ‘income’ – Legal Aid (Assessment of Resources) Regulations 1960 (SI 1960 No 1471), reg 1 (2), Sch 1, para 1.

d The applicant, who was engaged as a plaintiff in litigation, was refused legal aid by the Supplementary Benefits Commission on the ground that his disposable income from the 12 ensuing months would be more than the statutory limit of £950 imposed by s 2 of the Legal Aid and Advice Act 1949. By para 1^a of Sch 1 to the Legal Aid (Assessment of Resources) Regulations 1960 an applicant's income was to be calculated, in the absence of other means of determination, as the income received during the preceding year. In the preceding year the applicant had received about £17,000, consisting largely of loans and gifts from friends and relations. The commission stated that it was deemed reasonable to estimate a reduction in income which had, therefore, been fixed at approximately £5,000, which was ‘the sum expected from a combination of earnings, gifts and loans etc. from relatives and friends of yourself and your wife plus benefit of any long-term credit facilities available’. On an application for certiorari to quash the determination, the commission contended that the definition of income as including ‘benefits and privileges’ in reg 1 (2)^b of the 1960 regulations was wide enough to embrace loans and gifts of every kind.

f Held – The definition in reg 1 (2) was intended to secure that receipts which would be regarded in a colloquial sense as part of a person's income should not escape from consideration merely because they were receivable as ‘benefits and privileges’ and not by legal right. The essential feature of receipts by way of income was that they displayed an element of recurrence; ‘income’ could not include ad hoc receipts. Although some gifts were clearly capable of forming part of a person's income, it was wrong to treat all gifts and loans as income indiscriminately. Accordingly g certiorari would be granted (see p 934 d e and f g, post).

Motion for certiorari

This was an application by way of motion by David Mortimer Singer for an order of certiorari to quash a decision of the Supplementary Benefits Commission made on 8th June 1972 whereby they determined that under the Legal Aid and Advice Act 1949 the applicant's disposable income was greater than £950 a year and therefore he was ineligible for legal aid. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. b

29th March. BRIDGE J read the following judgment of the court at the request of Lord Widgery CJ. In these proceedings counsel moves on behalf of David Mortimer Singer for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash a decision of the Supplementary Benefits Commission made in June 1972 under the Legal Aid and Advice Act 1949 (hereinafter called 'the Act') determining that the applicant's disposable income was greater than £950 a year. d

The applicant is engaged as plaintiff in complex litigation against solicitors who formerly acted for him. For reasons we need not consider, there are two actions on foot commenced by writs issued on 4th February 1971 and 24th March 1972. The applicant was granted limited legal aid under the terms of two emergency certificates dated 2nd and 24th March 1972. However, on 8th June 1972 the Law Society notified him that the emergency certificates were revoked and his application for legal aid was refused on the ground that the Supplementary Benefits Commission had determined disposable income at an amount greater than £950 a year, that being the upper limit prescribed as a condition of legal aid by s 2 of the Act, as amended. e

There is no document before the court embodying the commission's determination, although that is the order sought to be quashed, because it was not communicated directly to the applicant but only to the Law Society. But on hearing of it the applicant wrote to the Department of Health and Social Security, as representing the commission, on 15th June 1972 expressing himself as 'completely mystified' by the decision, setting out his financial circumstances, and asking that the matter might receive further consideration. The department replied on 29th June 1972 on behalf of the commission: 'A thorough re-examination', the writer says, 'has been made of the basis of the determination already issued to the Law Society'. The letter proceeds to set out that basis, in other words, to disclose the reasons for the earlier determination, and concludes: 'I must confirm that the determination was correct.' f

Counsel for the commission has taken the point that the letter of 29th June is not part of the record relating to the determination which is questioned; indeed, that there is no such record available for the court to consider. We cannot accept this submission. It seems to us that whenever a statutory body, having made a decision of a kind which can be questioned in proceedings for an order of certiorari, has subsequently chosen to disclose the reasons for the decision, whether it could have been compelled to do so or not, and however informal the document embodying the reasons, the decision with the added reasons becomes a 'speaking order' and if an error of law appears in the reasons certiorari will lie to quash the decision. g

Before turning to the reasons it will be convenient to refer to the relevant legislation. The Legal Aid and Advice Act 1949, s 4, provides: h

'(1) References in this Act to a person's disposable income or disposable capital shall be taken as referring to the rate of his income or amount of his capital after j

a making—(a) such deductions as may be prescribed in respect of the maintenance of dependants, interest on loans, income tax, rates, rent and other matters for which the person in question must or reasonably may provide. . .

(2) Regulations may make provision as to the manner in which the rate of a person's income and the amount of his capital are to be computed for the purposes of the foregoing subsection, and in particular for determining whether any resources are to be treated as income or capital and for taking into account fluctuations of income.'

The regulations in force are the Legal Aid (Assessment of Resources) Regulations 1960¹. Regulation 7 requires that disposable income be calculated in accordance with the provisions of Sch 1. Paragraph 1 of Sch 1 provides:

c 'The income of the person concerned from any source shall be taken to be the income which that person may reasonably expect to receive (in cash or in kind) during the period of computation, that income in the absence of other means of ascertaining it being taken to be the income received during the preceding year.'

d By the definitions in reg 1 (2) 'income' includes benefits and privileges and 'the period of computation' means the period of 12 months next ensuing from the date of application for a certificate.

The department's letter of 29th June 1972, having quoted para 1 of Sch 1 to the regulations, states the reasons for the commission's determination as follows:

e 'We note that the income from the Quebec Trust has been frozen by the trustees since January 1971 and no account was therefore taken of any income from this source. The bank statements supplied for you and your wife's accounts covered a period of roughly 12 months prior to the application in March 1972 and did not therefore include income from the trust. Nevertheless during the year credits were in the order of £17,000. In view of the claim that sources of loans and credits were drying up it was deemed reasonable to estimate a reduction in income and this was therefore fixed at approximately £5,000. This is the sum expected from a combination of earnings, gifts and loans etc from relatives and friends of yourself and your wife plus benefit of any long-term credit facilities available.'

The letter then explains why, not surprisingly, the deductions to be made in calculating 'disposable income' are insufficient to reduce the figure of £5,000 below the critical limit of £950.

g

Counsel for the applicant's basic submission is that neither loans nor gifts can constitute 'income' within the regulations, since they are not receivable as of right. Counsel for the commission, on the other hand, invites us to construe 'benefits and privileges' in the definition of 'income' in the widest sense which the words will bear, and submits that so construed they are apt to embrace both loans and gifts of every kind. He seeks support from the decision of the House of Lords in *St Aubyn (L M) v Attorney-General (No 2)*² in which it was held that periodical payments by way of loan from a company to an individual were 'benefits accruing' to the individual from the company within the context of the extremely complex provisions of ss 46 and 47 of the Finance Act 1940. Save as emphasising that, as a matter of language, a loan is in some senses of the word a 'benefit' to the borrower, we do not find that this decision on very different statutory subject-matter is of much assistance in the present case. It may be open to doubt how far the power to make regulations conferred by s 4 (2) of the 1949 Act authorises the introduction by the regulations of an artificial definition of 'income', which has no definition in the Act. But assuming that this subsection gives an unfettered power to enlarge the concept of 'income' by definition in the regulations, we would be reluctant to construe the definition in reg 1 (2) as requiring that receipts of a kind which no one would normally regard as forming part of his income should be treated as income for this purpose, unless constrained to that conclusion by the language used. Acceptance of the full width of counsel for the commission's submission would indeed allow the definition to extend the ordinary concept of what constitutes income to a degree which would produce some quite bizarre results. Thus, for example, a legacy, a win in a football pool, a mortgage loan from a building society, or an overdraft from the bank, would all qualify as part of the recipient's income in the year of receipt.

It would seem, on the other hand, that the narrow construction for which counsel for the applicant contends would permit no effective function to the phrase 'benefits and privileges' in the definition.

In our judgment it is possible to steer a middle course between these extremes and to give a sensible meaning to the language used in the definition without producing an unreasonable result. We believe that all the draftsman of the regulations was concerned to secure was that receipts which would, in a colloquial sense, be regarded as part of a person's income, should not escape from consideration in the assessment of legal aid entitlement by reason only that they were receivable qua 'benefits and privileges' and not by legal right. An example which springs to mind is a periodic allowance made by a parent to an adult son, other than under covenant, to provide for or assist in the son's maintenance.

The essential feature, in our judgment, of receipts by way of income is that they display an element of periodic recurrence. Income cannot include ad hoc receipts. This principle of distinction is untouched by the definition in the regulations. On the contrary, its importance is emphasised by the provision in para 1 of Sch 1 for assessment of the current year's income by reference to that of the previous year. This provision would work most inequitably if it meant that the ad hoc receipts of one year must be assumed to be repeated in the ensuing year.

Beyond stating this general principle of discrimination it is unnecessary and probably undesirable for the court to go further in considering the broad categories of gifts and loans. Some gifts are clearly capable of forming part of a person's income. It is difficult to visualise a basis for the periodically recurrent receipt of loans to qualify as income, which is likely to be encountered in practice, but it is certainly unnecessary to decide in the present case that loans per se cannot in any circumstances be received as income.

What is clear is that the commission have treated all loans and gifts as income indiscriminately. In this they have erred and the order must go to quash their determination.

^d In 1963, at the instigation of the Director of Public Prosecutions, criminal proceedings were commenced against the plaintiff and others in connection with lime subsidies under the Agriculture Act 1947. In February 1964 the plaintiff was committed for trial at assizes. After a lengthy trial the plaintiff was convicted in July 1964. He was fined and ordered to pay a large amount of costs. On 7th April 1965 the plaintiff's convictions were quashed by the Court of Criminal Appeal. On 6th March 1972 the plaintiff brought an action against the Director of Public Prosecutions claiming damages for malicious prosecution. The Director applied to the master to strike out the statement of claim under RSC Ord 18, r 19, and under the inherent jurisdiction of the court on the grounds that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action against the Director, that it was vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court, and that the facts and matters relied on occurred more than six years before the issue of the writ and the claim (if any) was barred by the Limitation Act 1939.

^f Held – The statement of claim should be struck out for the following reasons—

(i) although it did not necessarily follow that because a prosecution had been instigated by the Director of Public Prosecutions there must have been reasonable and probable cause for it, on the facts disclosed it would be impossible for the judge at the trial to rule that there was any want of reasonable or probable cause for the prosecution of the plaintiff (see p 938 a b and d, p 941 a to d and p 942 a b, post);

^g (ii) it was open to the court to strike out a statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action where the facts alleged fell outside the limitation period, although in certain circumstances a plaintiff might be held to have a reasonable cause of action, for example where it could be shown that there might be an escape from the Statute of Limitations; where, however, it was clear that the defendant ^h was going to rely on the statute and there was nothing before the court to suggest that the plaintiff could escape from it, the claim would be struck out (see p 938 e f and h j, p 939 g to p 940 a, p 941 e to g and p 942 b c, post); Dismore v Milton [1938] 3 All ER 762 not followed.

Appeal

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Frederick William Riches, from an order of Phillips J made on 5th October 1972 affirming a decision of Master Lubbock dated 9th May 1972 that the plaintiff's statement of claim in his action against the Director of Public Prosecutions be struck out under RSC Ord 18, r 19, and under the inherent jurisdiction of the court and that the action be dismissed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Davies LJ. d

DAVIES LJ. This is an appeal from an order of Phillips J made on 5th October 1972 whereby he dismissed an appeal from Master Lubbock who had on 9th May struck out the plaintiff's statement of claim and dismissed his action as showing no cause of action and being frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court. f

The story, with regard to which one cannot help having some sympathy with the plaintiff, starts a long time ago. In November 1963 criminal proceedings were commenced at the instigation of the Director of Public Prosecutions, who is the defendant in this case, against Mr Riches, the present plaintiff, and a number of other people with regard to lime subsidies under the Agriculture Act 1947. The allegation was that the Ministry were induced to provide moneys for lime subsidies in much greater amounts than they ought to have been and that the lime supplied was not in accordance with the declarations made by the accused persons. The plaintiff himself, with two others, was the subject of three specific counts in the indictment, counts 17 to 19 inclusive, which charged him, with these two other men, with fraudulently inducing the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to execute a valuable security. In addition to that he was, in what sometimes has been called a rolled-up count of conspiracy, charged together with others with conspiracy to defraud the Ministry by obtaining excessive contributions of the lime subsidy. g

As I say, those proceedings were commenced by informations on 7th November 1963. On 12th February 1964 the accused were committed for trial; and the case was heard at the Bury St Edmunds Assizes. It took an enormously long time before the late Elwes J, and a verdict of guilty was returned by the jury on 16th July 1964. Sentences were pronounced on 17th July. The plaintiff himself was fined and ordered to pay a large amount of costs. Eventually the case came before the Court of Criminal Appeal, as it then was, presided over by Paull J, on 7th April 1965, when at any rate so far as the plaintiff was concerned (and we are not concerned with anybody else) his convictions were quashed, and the fine, of course, was remitted, though he h a was not granted any order for costs. That case, as I say—most unfortunate as it was for the plaintiff; he has resented the whole thing; he says that he is an honest man and has never done anything wrong in his life—finished on 7th April 1965. As recently as 6th March 1972 he issued this writ. The claim, though perhaps not very professionally put forward, and one would not expect it to be because he is not a lawyer, was in effect for damages for malicious prosecution. I think I need not read the statement of claim, but it will be necessary to refer very briefly to two of the paragraphs in it.

b Shortly after the issue of the writ and the service of the statement of claim, which is dated 30th March 1972, the defendant, through the Treasury Solicitor, took out a summons to dismiss the action, in these terms:

c ‘... on the grounds that: 1. It discloses no reasonable cause of action against the Defendant; 2. It is vexatious and an abuse of the process of the Court; 3. The facts and matters relied on occurred more than six years before the issue of this Writ and the claim (if any, which is denied) is barred by the Limitation Act 1939.’

d The matter, as I have said, came before Master Lubbock on 9th May, and he made the order asked for. On 9th June the plaintiff gave notice of appeal, and the matter came before Phillips J on 5th October. He upheld the master by an order which is the order under appeal; and on 16th October and on 21st October the plaintiff gave two notices of appeal against the decision of the learned judge.

e I think that really three grounds are put forward on behalf of the defendant in support of the order that was made by the master and the judge. It is said, first of all, that it is an essential ingredient, on a claim for malicious prosecution, that express malice should be pleaded, and it said that malice was not properly pleaded in this case. It is said, secondly, that, on the facts disclosed in the evidence before the court, it is perfectly plain that it would be impossible for a judge hearing this action to come to the conclusion that there was any want of reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution, which, of course, if so, would be fatal to the plaintiff's case. It is said, f thirdly, that as all the matters out of which this claim arises happened more than six years before the issue of the writ, the plaintiff is barred by the Limitation Act 1939.

To deal with the first point first, the only reference to malice in the statement of claim appears in paras 3 and 7. Paragraph 3 is in these terms:

g ‘That the Prosecution had in fact no evidence of criminal action whatsoever against the principal defendant, the Lime Merchant, Mr Griffiths, but pursued the action against that defendant with equal irresponsible malice.’

It is to be observed that that is only dealing with the case against Mr Griffiths, the first of the men charged; but one does find the word ‘malice’ there. Then, in para 7:

h ‘That the only reason why this plaintiff was chosen for prosecution, (there being at no time any evidence against him), was political malice, the determination of his political opponents to destroy him, and that this obvious and clearly apparent malice was plainly demonstrated in other directions.’

j It is very difficult, I think, to construe that as an allegation of malice against the then Director of Public Prosecutions; but, for myself, this being a litigant in person, were the only relevant point the absence of a proper plea of malice on the part of the defendant, I do not think that I would feel justified in putting an end to this action. But the other two matters are quite different.

Want of reasonable and probable cause. Here, from the facts that I have already adumbrated and from the evidence that we see in the papers, these prosecutions were naturally, it being a Director's case, launched on the advice of counsel. We have the fact that the evidence put forward before the justices was sufficient to cause them to order this plaintiff, together with other accused, to be committed for trial. We have the fact that the jury came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was guilty as charged. It does seem to me that in those circumstances it would be utterly impossible for a judge to be able to rule—and of course it is a matter for the judge at the trial—that there was any want of reasonable and probable cause in the present case.

I would like in that behalf to refer to some words of Russell LJ in an unreported case, Wenlock v Shimwell, heard in this court on 27th April 1966, where he dealt in that case with the question of reasonable and probable cause:

'I may perhaps add this, that I cannot see how an allegation of prosecution without reasonable and probable cause and with malice really can stand any chance of success when you find that the view that the Director of Public Prosecutions presumably had of the evidence seems to have been shared by the committing magistrate, by the judge who allowed the matter to go to the jury and by the 12 jurymen.'

I think that those words apply with great force in the present case, and I do not propose to say any more on that matter.

I do, however, want to say a word or two about the third matter, the question of limitation. The plaintiff suggests that it was said before the master and the judge that the defendant and his advisers were not pursuing the point of limitation in this case. But I have already read, in the course of this judgment, the summons to dismiss the action which the defendant took out. It is perfectly plain from that that, if he was not putting that point forward positively in the courts below, nevertheless he was reserving it and had it in mind and it was in the forefront of his summons.

Some authorities there are which suggest that, at any rate on an application based on the ground that a statement of claim discloses no cause of action, it is not open to the defendant to rely on the fact, if fact it be, that the matters in question arose more than six years (or whatever the appropriate limitation period might be in the individual case) before the action was commenced. We were very properly referred by counsel for the defendant in that regard to *Dismore v Milton*¹. It is perfectly true that Greer LJ² and Slessor LJ³ in this court did use words to that effect. But that was a case which was confined to an allegation that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action: it was not one of the cases where, either alone or together with that allegation, it was said that the action was frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court. In his judgment, Greer LJ, as one of the reasons for the decision at which he had arrived, said this²:

'It is because a plaintiff may be able to show that he is entitled to bring his action, notwithstanding the expiration of the statutory period, by reason of one of the exceptions contained in the Limitation Act . . . When the cause of action arose, he may have been an infant, or non compos mentis.'

That is perfectly true; but in the present instance it is not suggested that the plaintiff enjoys any of the escape clauses from the provisions of the Limitation Act 1939, and I am bound to say, for myself, that I think that the dicta in *Dismore v Milton*¹, even though they are confined to a case where it is said that there is no cause of action, are somewhat too wide.

There are in this court two more recent cases in which observations on this matter have been made. First of all, there was, in *Hanratty v Lord Butler of Saffron Walden*⁴, a an obiter dictum of Lord Denning MR with regard to this matter. That was a case in which the parents of a convicted murderer brought an action, out of time, against the then Home Secretary for alleged negligence with regard to the fate that had befallen their son. Lord Denning MR said this:

b 'If Lord Butler had wished to raise the Statute of Limitations he could certainly have done so. The action is long out of time. But we were told that Lord Butler does not wish to raise the statute. We must, therefore, approach the case on the assumption—and I hasten to say that it is only an assumption—that there was negligence on his part. On that assumption, the question is whether such an action lies against the Home Secretary'.

That is the first authority.

c The other dictum, or perhaps more than dictum, was in an earlier case in this court before Russell LJ and myself: *Wenlock v Shimwell*¹, to which I have already referred in another context, heard on 27th April 1966. On this point I am recorded as having said:

d 'As I have said, the writ in this action was issued on 21st September 1964 and when one seeks to see the date of the alleged injurious falsehoods the simplest way to see what the plaintiff is setting up is to see what he says in certain further and better particulars of his amended statement of claim which he delivered on 3rd January of this year. I am not going to read them, but it is the fact that in every single instance he alleges that the injurious falsehoods were made "prior to September 1958". If these injurious falsehoods (if made) were made prior to September 1958 then they were statute-barred by 21st September 1964. I think, therefore, e that there is no justification for allowing that allegation to stand.'

Then Russell LJ said this:

f 'So far as injurious falsehood is concerned, it was not in the minds of this court when it gave leave to amend that amendment should extend beyond malicious prosecution, and it is perhaps a salutary lesson that any tribunal authorising an amendment ought to authorise the precise amendment asked for and not use general terms. Strictly I think it is proper to describe the injurious falsehood as an amendment made without leave to the writ. But whatever the situation, it is quite plain that the claim in respect of injurious falsehood was already statute-barred at the date of the writ and there is no justification for it remaining on g the record.'

In the light of those more recent authorities, I think, as I say, that perhaps the observations of this court in *Dismore v Milton*² went too far. I do not want to state definitely that, in a case where it is merely alleged that the statement of claim discloses no cause of action, the limitation objection should or could prevail. In principle, h I cannot see why not. If there is any room for an escape from the statute, well and good; it can be shown. But in the absence of that, it is difficult to see why a defendant should be called on to pay large sums of money and a plaintiff be permitted to waste large sums of his own or somebody else's money in an attempt to pursue a cause of action which has already been barred by the statute of limitations and must fail.

i For those reasons, though, as I have said, I am not so impressed by the point about the absence of an appropriate plea of malice, on the other two grounds, namely that I cannot see here that there is any possible room for a holding of want of reasonable and probable cause, and on the other ground that this whole case of the plaintiff's was at any rate, if not earlier, barred in 1971—and probably it was barred a good deal earlier—I think that the learned judge, Phillips J, in the court below was completely right in the conclusion at which he arrived; and I would dismiss the appeal. a

STEPHENSON LJ. I agree. Two courts have upheld the contentions of the respondent to this appeal set out in the summons to dismiss this action under RSC Ord 18, r 19, and under the court's inherent jurisdiction— b

‘on the grounds that: 1. It discloses no reasonable cause of action against the Defendant; 2. It is vexatious and an abuse of the process of the Court; 3. The facts and matters relied on occurred more than six years before the issue of this Writ and the claim (if any, which is denied) is barred by the Limitation Act 1939.’ c

Like Davies LJ, I think that this is not a case in which this court ought to look too nicely at the pleaded allegations in the statement of claim, and for my part I am prepared to assume that the statement of claim does allege, though very indirectly and imperfectly, want of reasonable and probable cause and malice against the Director of Public Prosecutions himself. In this court very little, if any, time has been taken up by the plaintiff in making such a submission. He proceeded from a general allegation against the crookedness and corruption, as I understood him, of magistrates, judges, counsel and all concerned with the administration of the law in the prosecution of himself to a consideration of the respects in which the conduct of leading counsel for the Crown during the 19 days of the committal proceedings fell short both of competence and of honesty. d

It is well established, of course, that the Director of Public Prosecutions, or any other prosecutor, is not ordinarily responsible for any malice that there may be on the part of prosecuting counsel. The independent duty of prosecuting counsel and the fact that he is not an instrument of the person who initiates the prosecution are amply supported by the authority of *Abbott v Refuge Assurance Co Ltd*¹: see the observations of Ormerod LJ², and indeed of this court in *Wenlock v Shimwell*³, where Davies LJ said very much the same thing. e

So the only way really in which the plaintiff can put his case against the defendant, as I see it, is that the defendant had some material which he either disclosed to counsel, who himself put it out of his mind or suppressed it, or himself suppressed from the knowledge of counsel material which showed that there was no evidence of fraud against the plaintiff whatever. That, of course, is a very difficult contention; and, as is shown in the passage which Davies LJ has quoted from the judgment of Russell LJ in *Wenlock v Shimwell*³, there is particular difficulty in a case where not only the committing magistrates but counsel and a judge and jury have all found that there was at least a prima facie case of fraud leading ultimately, until the matter was put right by the Court of Criminal Appeal, to a proved case of fraud. And the matter does not become any easier where a defendant has the advantage of being represented by experienced counsel and neither he nor counsel for any of his co-defendants, as far as we know, ever submitted to the jury that there was no case to answer. f

We have also been referred to the observation of Pickford LJ in *Bradshaw v Waterlow & Sons Ltd*⁴ where he said: g

‘... it is difficult to see how under those circumstances there can be said to be h a an absence of reasonable and probable cause when the Attorney-General had granted his fiat and the facts were not shown to be unfairly put before him.'

I do not wish to be taken as saying that there may never be a case where a prosecution has been initiated and pursued by the Director of Public Prosecutions in which it would be impossible for an acquitted defendant to succeed in an action for malicious prosecution, or as saying that the existence of the Attorney-General's fiat where
b required conclusively negates the existence of malice and conclusively proves that there was reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution. There may be cases where there has been, by even a responsible authority, the suppression of evidence which has led to a false view being taken by those who carried on a prosecution and by those who ultimately convicted. But that case is, as it seems to me, many miles from this one. There is nothing in the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal
c in this particular case which lends any support to the view that there was no case for the plaintiff to answer; and I cannot find in anything that he has said to us or in any document that has been put before us anything to suggest that there was in existence material showing that there was no basis in evidence for a prosecution of him on the conspiracy charge or on any of the three substantive charges which he had to meet at the Suffolk Assizes. In those circumstances, as it seems to me, he has failed to show
d that the defendant put the facts unfairly before prosecuting counsel, that there was anything like a lack of reasonable or probable cause, or malice, on the defendant's part or that there is any possibility of such material being produced.

On the other point, I am willing to assume that a cause of action which is statute-barred as clearly as the plaintiff's cause of action, nonetheless may be a reasonable cause of action within RSC Ord 18, r 19 (1) (a). I say that on the authority of *Dismore v Milton*¹, to which Davies LJ has referred. But I agree with his comments on that case. It seems to me that that case is in no way a decision that the court cannot strike out a claim which is statute-barred on the ground that it is an abuse of the process of the court, where it is clear from the terms of the summons that the statute is going to be relied on and where, as here, counsel has told the court that he has express instructions to rely on the statute. Even in such a case there may be a possibility of f a defendant bringing himself within one of the exceptions which avoid the statute and make it inapplicable. Again, however, this is not such a case. There is no material put before the court which could possibly suggest that the statute will not be a complete answer to the plaintiff's claim. I think that it would be absurd for the court, faced with an application such as this to strike out, under its inherent jurisdiction or under the rules, a claim as an abuse of the process of the court, to shut its eyes to the g fact that there is going to be raised an apparently unanswerable plea of the Limitation Act 1939. That was the view of this court in *Wenlock v Shimwell*², to which Davies LJ has referred, and was clearly the view of Lord Denning MR in *Hanratty's case*³ in the passage which Davies LJ has also cited. Why should such a claim not be an abuse of the process of the court? Why should not the court exercise its inherent jurisdiction to stay or to dismiss an action which must fail?

h In my judgment, justice requires that no further time or money should be wasted by either party on litigation which can only end with the failure of the plaintiff's claim. I therefore agree that, both in justice and in mercy, we ought to put an end to it own by dismissing this appeal.

j LAWTON LJ. I too agree that this appeal should be dismissed. For my own part, I would not have been prepared to say that the statement of claim discloses no cause of action. The language was inept; but the essence of what has to be pleaded in a claim for malicious prosecution can be found amongst the words which were used. I adopt what has been said by Davies and Stephenson LJJ about this case being hopeless because of the failure to establish want of reasonable cause for the prosecution.

I would like to add a few words about the problem which arises under the decision of *Dismore v Milton*¹. That case has led, in my judgment, to much waste of time over the years which have gone by since it was decided. The object of RSC Ord 18, r 19, is to ensure that defendants shall not be troubled by claims against them which are bound to fail having regard to the uncontested facts. One of the uncontested sets of facts which arises from time to time is when on the statement of claim it is clear that the cause of action is statute-barred and the defendant tells the court that he proposes to plead the statute and, on the uncontested facts, there is no reason to think that the plaintiff can bring himself within the exceptions set out in the Limitation Act 1939. In those circumstances it is pointless for the case to go on so that the defendant can deliver a defence. The delivery of the defence occupies time and wastes money; and even more useless and time-consuming from the point of view of the proper administration of justice is that there should then have to be a summons for directions, and an order for an issue to be tried, and for that issue to be tried before the inevitable result is attained. It seems to me that when that situation arises the comments of Lord Blackburn in *Metropolitan Bank Ltd v Pooley*² are applicable. He said that a stay or even dismissal of proceedings may 'often be required by the very essence of justice to be done'. The White Book³, having called attention to that statement by Lord Blackburn, goes on to say that the object is 'to prevent parties being harassed and put to expense by frivolous, vexatious or hopeless litigation'. It would be contrary to the public interest that justice should be shackled by rules of procedure when the shackles will fall to the ground the moment the uncontested facts appear; and that is just this case.

Appeal dismissed.

Discovery – Production of documents – Parties – Defendant for purposes of discovery only – No reasonable cause of action against party from whom discovery sought – Purpose of order to obtain information so that proceedings may be brought against third parties – Circumstances in which order may be made – Defendant having innocently facilitated commission of wrongful acts – Commissioners of Customs and Excise – Information in possession of commissioners including names of importers of goods – Information obtained under statutory powers – Importation of goods constituting an infringement of plaintiffs' patent – Plaintiffs seeking order for discovery against commissioners to enable plaintiffs to proceed against importers.

Discovery – Production of documents – Privilege – Confidential documents – Documents obtained under statutory powers – Commissioners of Customs and Excise – Information relating to importation of goods – Importation of goods constituting an infringement of plaintiffs' patent – Plaintiffs wishing to obtain information as to names of importers in order to bring proceedings against them – Whether commissioners privileged from disclosing information on grounds of public interest.

The appellants were the owners and licensees of a patent covering a chemical compound known as 'furazolidone'. Information published by the respondents, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, showed that some 30 consignments of furazolidone had been imported into the United Kingdom between 1960 and 1970. None of those importations had been licensed by the appellants. Each of the consignments therefore involved a tortious infringement of the appellants' patent. The appellants tried to discover the identity of the importers in order to bring legal proceedings against them but were unable to do so. When the goods were imported the respondents, in the exercise of their statutory duty, had obtained information relating to the goods including the names of the importers. On importation the goods came under the control of the respondents who directed the goods to be held in transit sheds until, the necessary formalities having been completed and the customs duties paid, they were released to the consignees. The appellants asked the respondents to supply them with the names of the importers of furazolidone but the respondents replied that they had no authority to do so. The appellants then brought an action against the respondents claiming, inter alia, an order for discovery of the names of the importers. Graham J^a granted the order sought but the Court of Appeal^b reversed his decision holding (i) that since the appellants had no cause of action against the respondents they could not obtain an order for discovery against them and (ii) that in any event, since the names of the importers had been given to the respondents in confidence and under a statutory duty, the public interest required that they should not be compelled to disclose them. On appeal, a person against whom no reasonable cause of action could be alleged, or who was in the position of a mere witness in the strict sense, the rule did not apply where (a) without discovery of the information in the possession of the person against whom discovery was sought no action could be begun against the wrongdoer, and (b) the person against whom discovery was sought had himself, albeit through no fault of his own, been involved in the wrongful acts of another so as to facilitate the wrongdoing. In such circumstances, although he might have incurred no personal liability, he was under a duty to assist the person who had been wronged by giving him full information and disclosing the identity of the wrongdoer. In the performance of their statutory duties the respondents had been sufficiently involved in the importation of furazolidone in breach of the appellants' patent as to impose on them, subject to considerations of public policy, a duty to disclose the identity of the importers so that the appellants could commence proceedings against them (see p 947 h to p 948 a c d g h and j, p 951 g to j, p 953 c and e f, p 954 b, p 960 a to f, p 966 b c and d e, p 968 c to e, p 973 b to f and g, p 974 a b and d e and p 975 g h, post); Moodalay v Morton (1785) 1 Bro CC 469, dicta of Lord Romilly MR and Lord Hatherley LC in Upmann v Elkan (1871) LR 12 Eq at 145, 7 Ch App at 133, Orr v Diaper (1876) 4 Ch D 92, and Post v Toledo Cincinnati and St Louis Railroad Co (1887) 11 NE 540 applied; Queen of Portugal v Glyn (1840) 7 Cl & Fin 466 distinguished.

Held – The appeal would be allowed and an order for discovery made for the following reasons—

(ii) Even if the respondents had been right in treating the information relating to the identity of the importers as confidential, there was no statutory provision which prohibited the court from ordering discovery for the purpose of legal proceedings if the public interest in the proper administration of justice required it. In the circumstances the public interest in such confidentiality as might attach to the names and addresses of the importers was outweighed by the interests of justice in disclosure for the purpose of the appellants' intended proceedings (see p 949 a and c and h, p 954 j to p 955 b, p 961 a b and d e, p 962 b c, p 968 h, p 969 a b and g h and p 976 b to d and g, post).

Per Lord Reid, Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Cross of Chelsea. In any case in which there is the least doubt whether a person asked to disclose the name of a third party should do so, that person would be fully justified in saying that he would only make disclosure under an order of the court, the costs of the application to the court being borne by the person making the request (see p 949 g h, p 962 b, p 969 j to p 970 c, post).

Decision of the Court of Appeal [1972] 3 All ER 813 reversed.

Appeal

By a writ issued on 4th February 1969, subsequently amended, and re-issued and re-amended, the appellants, Norwich Pharmacal Co (now known as Morton-Norwich Products Inc), Smith, Kline and French Laboratories Ltd and Norwich Pharmacal Co, brought an action (1969 N 230) against the respondents, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, claiming (i) a declaration that the respondents had infringed and caused, enabled or assisted others to infringe letters patent no 735,136 relating to goods known as 'furazolidone', (ii) a declaration that it was the respondents' statutory duty to forfeit all imported furazolidone in their possession, custody or control which had not been licensed for importation by the appellants, and (iii) an order that the respondents (a) set forth and disclose to the appellants in the case of each consignment of furazolidone imported without the appellants' licence the names and addresses of the consignors and consignees thereof, the quantity of furazolidone therein and the date thereof; (b) give the appellants full and complete discovery of all documents which were, or had been, in their possession relating to the imported consignments of furazolidone. On 19th May 1970 the appellants re-served an amended statement of claim together with particulars of breaches describing how third parties, whose names were unknown to the appellants, had infringed the letters patent of which the appellants were respectively at all material times the registered proprietors and exclusive licensees; para 2 of the amended particulars of breaches gave a list of the acts of the unknown third parties of which the appellants complained and which had occurred between March 1960 and August 1968; the particulars specified the month in which each consignment of furazolidone had been imported, the country from which it had been imported, and the quantity and value of each consignment.

By their defence dated 5th August 1969, as amended, the respondents admitted that goods described as furazolidone had been imported into the United Kingdom by persons other than the appellants and that, by virtue of ss 26, 28 and 29 of the Customs and Excise Act 1952, they had knowledge of the names and addresses of the consignor and importer of each consignment of furazolidone and the date of importation, but denied that they were or had been parties to, or had caused, enabled or assisted, the infringements of the third parties and made no admission that proceedings against the third parties could not be initiated or maintained by the appellants without the discovery sought. On 7th April 1970, in pursuance of an order for discovery on an interlocutory summons by the appellants, the respondents served a list of documents which were, or had been, in their possession or control; the list included (in Part 3 of Sch 1) the special chemical register, customs entries delivered to the respondents by persons other than the appellants relating to the importation of goods declared as furazolidone, and ships' reports, cargo manifests, correspondence and books of account relating to such importations; the respondents objected to the production of the documents listed in Part 3 of Sch 1 on the grounds (a) that they were precluded by law from disclosing them and (b) that their disclosure would be injurious to the public interest because they contained confidential information about the affairs of persons other than the appellants furnished to the respondents by such persons pursuant to ss 26, 28 and 29 of the 1952 Act.

By a writ issued on 5th August 1970, and subsequently re-issued and amended, the appellants brought a second action (1970 N 1809) against the respondents claiming relief similar to that claimed in the first action; the statement of claim served on 5th August 1971 alleged continuing breaches of the letters patent; the particulars of infringement served with the statement of claim specified, in para 2, the consignments of furazolidone which had been imported between November 1968 and February 1970. The respondents' defence was similar in terms to that served in the first action and in their list of documents the respondents objected to discovery of the customs entries etc (listed in Part 3 of Sch 1) relating to the importation of furazolidone on the same grounds as in the first action.

By an order dated 21st January 1971 following summonses for directions Master Smith ordered that both actions be consolidated and that the respondents produce all documents which by the list of documents appeared to be in their possession custody or power except those documents to whose production they objected. By a summons for directions dated 3rd March 1971 the appellants applied for discovery of the documents listed in Part 3 of Sch 1 to each of the respondents' lists of documents and further requested that those documents should be produced for inspection by a master for the purpose of his deciding as to the validity of the claim of privilege for them. The summons was adjourned into court.

On 8th December 1971 Graham J¹ ordered the respondents to set forth and disclose to the appellants in the case of each importation referred to in para 2 of the amended particulars of breach served by the appellants in action 1969 N 230 and in the case of each importation referred to in para 2 of the particulars of infringements served by the appellants in action 1970 N 1809 (a) if the customs entry in respect of such importations was still in the possession of the respondents the name and address of the person appearing from the customs entry to be the importer thereof, and (b) if the customs entry in respect of each importation was no longer in the possession of the respondents the name of any person appearing from the special chemical register to be the importer thereof, and (c) in every case identifying such importation by the quantity thereof and the month in which the customs entry in respect thereof had been delivered to the respondents.

The respondents appealed to the Court of Appeal and, on 25th July 1972, the court² (Lord Denning MR, Buckley and Roskill LJ) allowed the appeal and discharged the order of Graham J. The court refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords but, on 7th November 1972, the appeal committee allowed a petition by the appellants for leave to appeal.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

26th June. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD REID. My Lords, the appellants own patent no 735,136 which covers a chemical compound called furazolidone. The validity of the patent is not in dispute. This substance is widely used and matter published by the respondents shows that some 30 consignments of it were imported into the United Kingdom between 1960 a and 1970. None of these were licensed by the appellants. Each of these consignments therefore involved a tortious infringement of their right. The appellants have tried, but with little success, to discover the identity of the importers.

b When any goods are imported the master of the ship bringing them and the importer have to lodge documents with the customs which disclose the identity of the importer. It is not disputed that the respondents have in their possession documents shewing who imported each of these consignments and the appellants now seek to get from the respondents by way of discovery the names of those who are shewn in their records to have imported furazolidone during the last six years in order that the appellants may be able to take proceedings against such importers. The respondents for a number of reasons say that they are not entitled or are not willing to give this information and they assert that the appellants have no right to obtain discovery.

c On 27th June 1967 the appellants wrote a long letter to the respondents setting out their contentions and seeking information in respect of the persons responsible for the importation of this substance. On 25th July the respondents replied that they had no authority to give such information. The appellants then issued a writ. They alleged infringement by the respondents and sought wider discovery than they now seek. But they now admit that they have no cause of action against the respondents.

d The question therefore now is whether the respondents are in law liable to make discovery of the names of the wrongdoers who imported the patented substance. Graham J¹ held that they were but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal².

e Discovery as a remedy in equity has a very long history. The chief occasion for its being ordered was to assist a party in an existing litigation. But this was extended at an early date to assist a person who contemplated litigation against the person from whom discovery was sought, if for various reasons it was just and necessary that he should have discovery at that stage. Such discovery might disclose the identity of others who might be joined as defendants with the person from whom discovery was sought. Indeed in some cases it would seem that the main object in seeking discovery was to find the identity of possible other defendants. It is not clear f to me whether in all these cases the plaintiff had to undertake in some way to proceed against the person from whom he sought discovery if he found on discovery being ordered that it would suit him better to drop his complaint against that person and concentrate on his cause of action against those whose identity was disclosed by the discovery. But I would think that he was entitled to do this if he chose.

g But it is argued for the respondents that it was an indispensable condition for the ordering of discovery that the person seeking discovery should have a cause of action against the person from whom it was sought. Otherwise it was said the case would come within the 'mere witness' rule.

h I think that there has been a good deal of misunderstanding about this rule. It has been clear at least since the time of Lord Hardwicke that information cannot be obtained by discovery from a person who will in due course be compellable to give that information either by oral testimony as a witness or on a subpoena duces tecum. Whether the reasons justifying that rule are good or bad it is much too late to enquire: the rule is settled. But the foundation of the rule is the assumption that eventually i the testimony will be available either in an action already in progress or in an action which will be brought later. It appears to me to have no application to a case like the present case. Here if the information in the possession of the respondents cannot be made available by discovery now, no action can ever be begun because the appellants do not know who are the wrongdoers who have infringed their patent. So the appellants can never get the information.

To apply the mere witness rule to a case like this would be to divorce it entirely from its proper sphere. Its purpose is not to prevent but to postpone the recovery of the information sought. It may sometimes have been misapplied in the past but I see no reason why we should continue to do so. a

1 [1972] 1 All ER 972, [1972] Ch 566

2 [1972] 3 All ER 813, [1972] 3 WLR 870

But that does not mean, as the appellants contend, that discovery will be ordered against anyone who can give information as to the identity of a wrongdoer. There is absolutely no authority for that. A person injured in a road accident might know that a bystander had taken the number of the car which ran him down and have no other means of tracing the driver. Or a person might know that a particular person is in possession of a libellous letter which he has good reason to believe defames him but the author of which he cannot discover. I am satisfied that it would not be proper in either case to order discovery in order that the person who has suffered damage might be able to find and sue the wrongdoer. Neither authority, principle nor public policy would justify that. b

So discovery to find the identity of a wrongdoer is available against anyone against whom the plaintiff has a cause of action in relation to the same wrong. It is not available against a person who has no other connection with the wrong than that he was a spectator or has some document relating to it in his possession. But the respondents are in an intermediate position. Their conduct was entirely innocent; it was in execution of their statutory duty. But without certain action on their part the infringements could never have been committed. Does this involvement in the matter make a difference? c

On the view which I take of the case I need not set out in detail the powers and duties of the respondents with regard to imported goods. From the moment when they enter the port until the time when the consignee obtains clearance and removes the goods, they are under the control of the customs in the sense that the customs authorities can prevent their movement or specify the places where they are to be put, and in the event of their having any suspicions they have full powers to examine or test the goods. When they are satisfied and the appropriate duty has been paid the consignee or his agent is authorised to remove the goods. No doubt the respondents are never in possession of the goods, but they do have considerable control of them during the period from entry into the port until removal by the consignee. And the goods cannot get into the hands of the consignee until the respondents have taken a number of steps and have released them. d

My noble and learned friends, Lord Cross of Chelsea and Lord Kilbrandon, have dealt with the authorities. They are not very satisfactory, not always easy to reconcile and in the end inconclusive. On the whole I think they favour the appellants, and I am particularly impressed by the views expressed by Lord Romilly MR¹ and Lord Hatherley LC² in Upmann v Elkan. They seem to me to point to a very reasonable principle that if through no fault of his own a person gets mixed up in the tortious acts of others so as to facilitate their wrongdoing he may incur no personal liability but he comes under a duty to assist the person who has been wronged by giving him full information and disclosing the identity of the wrongdoers. I do not think that it matters whether he became so mixed up by voluntary action on his part or because it was his duty to do what he did. It may be that if this causes him expense the person seeking the information ought to reimburse him. But justice requires that he should co-operate in righting the wrong if he unwittingly facilitated its perpetration. e

I am the more inclined to reach this result because it is clear that if the person mixed up in the affair has to any extent incurred any liability to the person wronged, he must make full disclosure even though the person wronged has no intention of proceeding against him. It would I think be quite illogical to make his obligation to disclose the identity of the real offenders depend on whether or not he has himself incurred some minor liability. I would therefore hold that the respondents f a must disclose the information now sought unless there is some consideration of public policy which prevents that.

Apart from public policy the respondents say that they are prevented by law from making this disclosure. I agree with your Lordships that that is not so. If it were they could not even disclose such information in a serious criminal case, but their counsel were, quite rightly, not prepared to press their argument so far as that.

b So we have to weigh the requirements of justice to the appellants against the considerations put forward by the respondents as justifying non-disclosure. They are twofold. First it is said that to make such disclosures would or might impair or hamper the efficient conduct of their important statutory duties. And secondly it is said that such disclosure would or might be prejudicial to those whose identity would be disclosed.

c There is nothing secret or confidential in the information sought or in the documents which came into the hands of the respondents containing that information. Those documents are ordinary commercial documents which pass through many different hands. But it is said that those who do not wish to have their names disclosed might concoct false documents and thereby hamper the work of the customs. That would require at least a conspiracy between the foreign consignor and the importer and it seems to me to be in the highest degree improbable. It appears d that there are already arrangements in operation by the respondents restricting the disclosure of certain matters if the importers do not wish them to be disclosed. It may be that the knowledge that a court might order discovery in certain cases would cause somewhat greater use to be made of these arrangements. But it was not suggested in argument that that is a matter of any vital importance. The only other point was that such disclosure might cause resentment and impair good relations with other traders: but I find it impossible to believe that honest traders would resent failure to protect wrongdoers.

e Protection of traders from having their names disclosed is a more difficult matter. If we could be sure that those whose names are sought are all tortfeasors, they do not deserve any protection. In the present case the possibility that any are not is so remote that I think it can be neglected. The only possible way in which any of these imports could be legitimate and not an infringement would seem to be that someone might have exported some furazolidone from this country and then whoever owned it abroad might have sent it back here. Then there would be no infringement. But again that seems most unlikely.

f But there may be other cases where there is much more doubt. The validity of the patent may be doubtful and there could well be other doubts. If the respondents have any doubts in any future case about the propriety of making disclosures they are well entitled to require the matter to be submitted to the court at the expense of the person seeking the disclosure. The court will then only order discovery if satisfied that there is no substantial chance of injustice being done.

g I would therefore allow this appeal. The respondents were quite right in requiring the matter to be submitted to the court. So they are entitled to their costs down to the date of the judgment of Graham J¹. Thereafter the appellants caused much extra expense by putting their case much too high. In the circumstances I would award no costs in the Court of Appeal² or in this House.

h LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, the question which calls for consideration arises in proceedings which by now have shed many of their original features. Two actions were begun. They were later consolidated. The appellants were respectively the registered proprietors of, and the exclusive licensees in the United Kingdom under, letters patent which covered a specific chemical compound called furazolidone. The claims made by the appellants in each action were as follows. Firstly, there was a claim for a declaration that the respondents (the commissioners) had infringed or had caused enabled or assisted others to infringe the letters patent. Secondly, there was a claim for a declaration that it was the respondents' statutory duty to forfeit all the imported furazolidone in their possession custody or control which was not licensed for importation by the appellants. Thirdly, there was a claim for an order that the respondents should:

'(a) Set forth and disclose to the [appellants] in the case of each consignment of furazolidone imported without the licence of the [appellants] or one or other of them the names and addresses of the consignors and consignees thereof, the quantity of furazolidone therein and the date thereof.

'(b) Give the [appellants] full and complete discovery of all documents which are or have been in their possession custody or control relating to such imported consignments of furazolidone.'

It was pleaded that third parties whose names were unknown to the appellants had infringed the letters patent by importing furazolidone without the leave and licence of the appellants. Particulars were given setting out dates, quantities, values and countries from which imported. The discovery claimed was sought in aid of proceedings which the appellants wished to bring against others but which they could not initiate without at least knowing the names of the importers.

After delivery of defences both parties filed lists of documents. In one part of the respondents' list there were included the following documents: special chemical register; customs entries (comprising forms XS107 and C105 and supporting documents) delivered by persons other than the appellants relating to the importation of furazolidone: and ships' reports, cargo manifests, correspondence and books of account relating to such importations. The respondents objected to produce those documents. The objection was on the following grounds:

'(a) that the [respondents] are precluded by law from disclosing them and

'(b) that their disclosure would be injurious to the public interest, because they contain confidential information about the affairs of persons other than the [appellants] furnished to the [respondents] by such persons pursuant to sections 26, 28 and 29 of the Customs and Excise Act 1952.'

The appellants took out a summons by which they asked that the respondents be ordered to produce the documents for inspection. The summons was adjourned into court and was heard by Graham J¹.

Though the learned judge held that the appellants had no reasonable cause of action against the respondents he held in a most careful and illuminating judgment that the court could make an order requiring them to disclose to the appellants the names and addresses of the importers of furazolidone. The respondents appealed to the Court of Appeal² against this order. The appellants persisted in their contention that they had causes of action against the respondents and by a respondent's notice they contended (a) that the respondents had infringed (or had caused or enabled or assisted others to infringe) the letters patent and (b) that the respondents were in breach of a statutory duty to forfeit all imported furazolidone in their possession custody or control which the appellants had not licensed for importation.

Having lost in the Court of Appeal² the appellants by leave appealed to this House. Though by their printed case the appellants set out that to a limited extent they desired to maintain the contention that they had a cause of action for infringement by the respondents themselves, that contention was abandoned when the appeal a was opened. The case proceeded therefore on the basis (a) that it consisted solely of a claim for limited discovery against the respondents and (b) that no other relief could be or could have been claimed against the respondents. It must be approached on the footing that it was and always had been an action solely for discovery. The claim is now expressly limited so as to relate only to the names and addresses of any persons appearing from the customs entry to be the importers (a) in the case of the last importation referred to in para 2 of the amended particulars of breaches b in the first action and (b) in the case of each importation referred to in para 2 of the particulars of infringements in the second section.

It is important to mention certain matters. (1) The respondents by their pleadings admitted (for the purposes of this case) the validity of the letters patent. But beyond this there was evidence showing that the validity of the patent (the complete specification of which was published nearly 16 years ago) had never been challenged. c Some infringements had been detected and all infringers who had been detected had been sued: the actions had been settled on the basis that there was infringement (2) The respondents publish certain monthly statistics of goods imported into the United Kingdom and the importation of furazolidone has been specifically mentioned. The appellants are in a position to assert that the persons who have imported, who- d ever they are, must have been infringers and therefore wrongdoers. The respondents know the names and addresses of these people. The appellants wish to sue such people and intend to sue them if they can find out who they are. The appellants say that they are unable to find out who the people are unless the respondents tell them.

The appellants wrote (in June and July 1967) to the respondents and asked for the information they sought. The respondents stated that they were advised that e information furnished to them under a requirement of the Customs and Excise Act 1952 should not be disclosed to third parties.

In my view, it would be reasonable, and in a broad sense of the term just, if the desired information could be supplied. The facts are very special. The appellants are fully entitled to protect their interests. Subject always to the emergence of f some possible explanation of a nature not at present known, the importers whose names are known to the respondents are wrongdoers. It will be unfortunate not only from the point of view of the appellants but also of that of the public if the wrongdoers cannot be challenged. In this situation two questions arise: (1) is it within the power of the court to assist the appellants or is the law powerless? (2) if the court has power to make the desired order—would it be against the public interest to make it?

g In the review of very many authorities to which we were referred in painstaking and learned arguments it seemed clear that as a broad and general rule it is true to say that a court will not order discovery against a mere witness. On behalf of the appellants it is not sought to challenge this. A witness is one who may be able to give testimony in either pending or anticipated proceedings. Here there are h no pending proceedings and unless the appellants secure the help of the court there are no anticipated proceedings. If the names are given and if the appellants take proceedings it is unlikely that there would be any need to rely on any evidence from the respondents.

It is not suggested that in ordinary circumstances a court would require someone to impart to another some information which he may happen to have and which i the latter would wish to have for the purpose of bringing some proceedings. At the very least the person possessing the information would have to have become actually involved (or actively concerned) in some transactions or arrangements as a result of which he has acquired the information. In all ordinary circumstances there would then be some proceedings in the course of which the machinery of the court would enable all relevant and admissible evidence to be obtained.

My Lords, the review of numerous authorities undertaken by learned counsel has left me with the impression that unless supplied by *Orr v Diaper*¹ clear-cut authority is meagre in support of the very limited order now sought by the appellants; equally I am left with the impression that it would be very unfortunate if the law could not come to the aid of the appellants. The respondents have had public duties to discharge. They have acted with complete propriety. But in the course of their public duties they have come to know, and have been obliged to come to know, the names of those who can reasonably be assumed to be wrongdoers vis-à-vis the appellants. Assuming that only the necessities of the public service (a matter to which I will later refer) have deterred the respondents from disclosing the names of the appellants, and always assuming that there is no statutory prohibition against such disclosure, is there any reason why the court, in the interests of justice, and in the absence of any real doubt that certain wrongdoers are enjoying a quite fortuitous protection, should not authorise and require the respondents to disclose the names?

So far as authority goes the sheet anchor of the appellants is the decision in 1876 in Orr v Diaper which is reported in the Law Reports¹ and other reports². In the much earlier case, *Moodalay v Morton*³, there was a bill for discovery against the East India Co and against Morton their secretary. The plaintiffs had had a lease for a period of ten years from the East India Co of the permission to supply the inhabitants of Madras with tobacco; the plaintiffs alleged that the company, by their servants in India, had dispossessed the plaintiffs and had granted a lease to others; the plaintiffs intended to sue the East India Co but in order to do so they needed the evidence of persons resident in the East Indies; they therefore prayed for a commission for the examination of witnesses and they required the company and the secretary to discover by whom and under what authority the second lease was granted. The plaintiffs wanted to know whether those who had dispossessed them were or were not servants of the company; if they were not they would be liable in their own persons. A demurrer to the bill was overruled. The fact that no action had been brought was no answer.

*Moodalay v Morton*³ was much discussed in *Angel v Angel*⁴ in 1822. It was considered whether it was not exceptional to grant a commission to examine witnesses before an action was begun. Sir John Leach V-C⁵ said in reference to *Moodalay v Morton*³: 'The plaintiff there required a commission, in order to know against whom the action should be brought.' While in the present case there is now no suggestion that the respondents are to be sued, the justice of the case would just as much warrant help being given to the appellants as to Moodalay.

Numerous cases firmly recognise the rule that a bill of discovery would not lie against a mere witness. *Fenton v Hughes*⁶ was but one of many cases which illustrated the rule. Someone who was not being sued and could not be sued would be regarded as a mere witness. The rule was recognised in *Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of London v Levy*⁷ where the demurrer was allowed because the bill did not allege with sufficient certainty by whom the duties which were claimed were payable. Lord Eldon LC said⁸:

'But it has never yet been, nor can it be, laid down, that you can file a bill, not venturing to state, who are the persons, against whom the action is to be brought; not stating such circumstances as may enable the Court, which must be taken to know the law, and therefore the liabilities of the Defendants, to a judge; but stating circumstances; and averring, that you have a right to an action against the Defendants or some of them. That of necessity admits, that some of the Defendants may be only witnesses; and against them there is no right to file such a bill.'

In the present case the appellants are able to say that they have rights which they intend to pursue and rights which as far as can be known must succeed: they know
b everything except the names and addresses of those whom they desire and intend to sue; they further know that those names and addresses appear on customs entries in the possession of the respondents and of which the respondents have become possessed in pursuance of their duties. Is there any reason why the court should not sanction and direct discovery?

I do not propose to refer to the majority of the cases which were cited for our c consideration because I agree with the conclusion reached both by the learned judge¹ and by the Court of Appeal² that in general the cases support the view that no independent action for discovery lies against a party against whom no reasonable cause of action can be alleged or who is in the position of a mere witness in the strict sense. If this is, in general, the conclusion which is reached after a study of numerous decisions how, then, is the decision in *Orr v Diaper*³ to be viewed? No less d an authority than Mr Bray⁴ regarded it as a special case. From the broad general rule Graham J¹ considered that there could be exceptional cases and that, of such, *Orr v Diaper*³ was an example. We have studied and re-studied that case and it was the subject of very careful analysis in the Court of Appeal and in particular by Buckley LJ⁵ who most helpfully examined the report of the case in the Weekly Reporter⁶. The conclusion which I for my part have reached, in agreement with e the Court of Appeal², is that *Orr v Diaper*³ perhaps need not on its facts have been regarded as an exception to the broad general rule. Yet I think it was so regarded. Nor I think did Mr Bray⁴ regard the decision as heretical but rather as being an exception from a broad general rule which permitted of certain exceptions being made, and an exception which, in the particular case, a court in the interests of justice had been warranted in making. To prevent a denial of justice must at all f times be the aim of a judge and the concluding words of Hall V-C would surely have been regarded as wholly commendable in any court of equity⁷:

'In this case the Plaintiffs do not know, and cannot discover, who the persons are who have invaded their rights, and who may be said to have abstracted their property. Their proceedings have come to a dead lock, and it would be g a denial of justice if means could not be found in this Court to assist the Plaintiffs.'

But whatever may be the true view of *Orr v Diaper*³ I think that it is very significant that it has been quoted as an authority and has not been overruled, with the result that after this lapse of time it may be regarded as furnishing a precedent for a h course that justice would seem to demand.

We were referred to the cases of *Hunt v Maniere*⁸, *Upmann v Elkan*⁹ and *Upmann v Forester*¹⁰. But the position of the respondents is not I think to be equated with that of wharfingers or forwarding agents or shippers. The position of the respondents is rather special. They are not engaged in commercial activities; they differ from those who voluntarily engage in trade for their own profit. In no ordinary sense are the respondents in possession of goods though they are endowed with certain wide powers which they need to enable them to discharge their statutory duties. But they are not mere outsiders or volunteers or, so to speak, mere bystanders. They become obliged to have active concern with, to acquire positive knowledge of, and to exercise certain powers in respect of the affairs of traders and the movement of goods. a

What, then, was the position of the respondents when they were asked by the appellants voluntarily to give the names? Were they entitled or obliged to do so? In this connection the words of Lord Romilly MR in *Upmann v Elkan*¹ were referred to. (It may here be mentioned that neither in that case nor in *Upmann v Forester*² did the proceedings take the form of a bill of discovery.) Lord Romilly MR said this¹: b

'I begin by assuming (which facts are proved here) that the correspondent of a London house sends goods to a London dock company to the order of that London house, and that the goods have on them the spurious trade-mark or brand of a person to which the goods do not belong, and who has not been concerned in sending them thither. The person whose trade-mark is fraudulently imitated ascertains this fact before the goods leave the dock: he applies to the dock company not to allow them to leave the dock with the spurious trade-mark, and he applies to the persons at whose order they stand, and asks them to give him all information respecting them, and to undertake not to sell or distribute the goods until the spurious brand is removed. I assume, then, in addition, that the person so applied to is innocent and ignorant of the fraud. It is his duty at once to give all the information required, and to undertake that the goods shall not be removed or dealt with until the spurious brand has been removed, and to offer to give all facilities to the person injured for that purpose.' c

In my view, the position of the respondents differed from that of the forwarding agents in the case cited. I think that the respondents were at the date of the request to them warranted in declining voluntarily to give the names. It is quite different if the court having considered all aspects of the public interest authorises and requires them to give the names. But the information possessed by the respondents was information which others had been obliged to give them under statutory compulsion and for some particular purposes. I think that the respondents were correct in taking the view that they ought to treat the information possessed by them as confidential. In this respect the provisions of s 3 of the Finance Act 1967 are of importance. The commissioners are given power to disclose some information to some others if the Secretary of State is satisfied that it would be in the national interest, but no power is given to sanction the disclosure of 'the price of the goods or the name of the importer of the goods'. This shows that the names of importers come within an area indicated by the legislature as being one of special sensitivity. (See also s 127 of the Finance Act 1972.) d

The next step is to consider whether the court should make the desired order and whether it would be in the public interest or against the public interest to make the order. If there was some statutory prohibition (such as that contained in s 17 (2) of the Agricultural Marketing Act 1931: see *Rowell v Pratt*³) then that, of course, would be conclusive. In the absence of any such prohibition it seems to me that in the special circumstances of this case, and with some support from authority, the interests of justice warrant the court in making the desired order unless there are some features of the public interest which are of such weight as to outbalance the e

a public interest of advancing the cause of justice. I can well appreciate the importance of the considerations which were advanced and which undoubtedly carry some weight, but having considered them in relation to the very limited order now sought I am firmly of the view that the balance of the public interest warrants the making of the order as now requested. I consider that the fair order as to costs is that the appellants should pay to the respondents their costs at first instance¹ and that there should be no order as to costs in the Court of Appeal² and in this House.

b I would allow the appeal accordingly.

VISCOUNT DILHORNE. My Lords, the appellants hold the patent for a chemical called 'furazolidone' which is used in poultry food. The respondents publish monthly statistics of the goods imported into the United Kingdom. Those statistics revealed that in 32 months between March 1960 and February 1970 furazolidone was imported into this country, but they do not reveal who were the importers. Each importation, the appellants say, constituted an infringement of their patent, though they say that it is conceivable that some of the chemical sold by them was reimported into this country, in which case there would be no infringement. The appellants say that although there must have been infringement in, if not all, at least the majority of these importations, they are unable to take any steps to protect their patent as they do not know and cannot find out, unless successful in these proceedings, the names of the importers, all of which are known to the respondents.

c On 29th June 1967 the appellants' solicitors wrote to the respondents asking for the names, not only of the consignees, but also of the consignors of the imported furazolidone and alternatively alleging that they were under a duty to seize and forfeit the imported furazolidone. The respondents in reply said that they were under no such duty and that in the absence of statutory authority it was impossible for them to disclose the names of the importers.

d On 4th February 1969 the appellants issued a writ against the respondents in which they claimed a declaration that the respondents were infringing or enabling or assisting others to infringe their patent, an injunction to restrain them from doing so and an injunction to compel them to forfeit the imported furazolidone. The writ was later amended to include a claim for discovery by the respondents of the names and addresses of the consignors and consignees and of all documents which were or had been in their possession relating to the imported consignments.

e On 5th August 1970 the appellants issued another writ claiming similar relief in respect of later importations in five months in 1968, 1969 and 1970. The two actions were consolidated and a summons for directions was taken out on 3rd March 1971. It was adjourned into court and came before Graham J¹. After a five day hearing he gave judgment dealing with all the appellants' claims. He rejected the claim that the respondents were themselves infringers of the patent and also the claim that they were under a duty to forfeit the furazolidone.

f By their defence the respondents admitted the validity of the letters patent and at the hearing before Graham J¹. Counsel for the appellants said that if the respondents gave the information asked for it was improbable that the question of infringement would be pressed against them. He agreed that the proceedings could be treated as a pure action for discovery for the production of information as to the identity of the importers.

g And so although the claims in respect of infringement and forfeiture were not abandoned until the hearing in this House, the proceedings have continued to be treated as those for discovery of the names of the importers alone. Graham J¹ held that discovery should be made and made an order in a form agreed between the parties. In the Court of Appeal² his decision was reversed, the court holding that the appellants had no conceivable cause of action against the respondents and that they could not bring an action merely for the purpose of discovering from them the names of the importers. They also held that the information required was received in confidence by the respondents and that the balance of public interest demanded that the respondents should keep the names and addresses of the importers secret.

So there are three questions to be decided. First, on the facts of this case can the respondents, who are not themselves wrongdoers, be ordered to disclose the names of the importers who, the validity of the patent being admitted, are wrongdoers? Secondly, in the exercise of the discretion vested in the court, should they be ordered to do so? and thirdly, are the respondents in any event prohibited from disclosing that information?

Numerous authorities were referred to on the first question. Few of them I found of much assistance. Many of them are very briefly reported and throw little, if any, light on the principles to be applied. The most recent and the most relevant case on which the appellants relied was decided nearly 100 years ago, *Orr v Diaper*¹.

In that case the plaintiffs were sewing cotton and thread manufacturers. The cottons and threads were made up for sale in different coloured papers and specially designed tickets were used to distinguish them from the cottons and threads of other manufacturers. The defendants were shippers and the plaintiffs discovered that they had for some time been shipping to Valparaiso and elsewhere cotton thread packed in the same manner as their own and bearing the same tickets. The plaintiffs sought to find out the names and addresses of the parties from whom they had received the cotton for shipment and wrote saying they quite understood that the defendants were innocent of any intention to act prejudicially to them and that if they gave the names and addresses 'the necessity for further proceedings would cease'. No reply was sent and proceedings were commenced, the statement of claim alleging that the defendants 'well knew the tickets and of the injury' and that they ought to give the information that was sought in aid of proceedings in contemplation by the plaintiffs to restrain the piracy of their tickets and that the proceedings contemplated could not be maintained without the discovery sought.

The defendants demurred. There are many differences in the report of the case in the Law Reports² and in the Weekly Reporter³, both in the report of the arguments advanced on behalf of the defendants, counsel for the plaintiffs not being called on, and in the report of the judgment of Hall V-C.

It appears from the reports of the arguments that the main point taken on demurrer was that discovery was not obtainable from persons who will not be and who are not intended to be parties to an action and that, to be granted, 'the discovery sought must be material, either to the relief prayed by the bill, or to some other suit actually instituted, or capable of being instituted' (Mitford on Pleadings⁴); and no relief was sought against the defendants and no other suit instituted or capable of being instituted against them. In the report in the Weekly Reporter it is said that it was submitted that⁵ 'these defendants are merely witnesses, and you cannot make a mere witness a party to obtain discovery' and then it was recognised that there may be circumstances under which discovery may be sought against persons who otherwise would not be parties to the action. Two examples were given: first, the case of a corporation where a person holding a representative position is made a party who otherwise would only be a witness—that, it was said, was an exception to the rule—and, secondly, where there is statutory authority compelling discovery

*(Dixon v Enoch*¹). In that case Wickens V-C said that the object of the Act was to enable the plaintiff to extract from the defendant the name or names of some other person or persons other than himself who might be sued at law. He then said²:

'The supposition that if the Plaintiff knows the name of one proprietor he can make him tell the names of all the others, but that, not knowing one name, he cannot get information from the printer and publisher, who is the agent of the proprietors, and is put forth to stand between them and the public, is one that does not commend itself to one's common sense, and is not to be accepted without absolute necessity.'

Hall V-C began his judgment with the citation of this passage from Wickens V-C's judgment, saying³: 'That is the view which I take in this case, and nothing but absolute necessity would compel me to allow this demurrer'. He clearly thought that Wickens V-C's observations, in relation to a case where there was a defendant being sued for libel and a statute provided for the disclosure, were applicable to a case when the person from whom discovery was sought was not in fact a defendant from whom relief was sought.

In the report in the Weekly Reporter⁴ it is said that he expressed the opinion that the position of the defendants in shipping the goods 'might subject them to proceedings by way of injunction to restrain them from continuing to ship these goods'. He rejected the contention that they were mere witnesses, saying according to the report in the Law Reports⁵ '... their position, they being the actual shippers, is different from that of mere witnesses' and according to the report in the Weekly Reporter⁶—

'but I think that the position of the defendants is different from that of a mere witness... That view of the case seems to me to bring it within the rule as stated in Mitford.'

He ended his judgment by saying according to the Law Reports⁵—'it would be a denial of justice if means could not be found in this court to assist the Plaintiffs', and overruled the demurrer.

As I read the reports of his judgment he based his conclusion on two grounds: first, that the defendants were not mere witnesses and, secondly, on the fact that in his opinion they could themselves have been sued. Whether he would have overruled the demurrer if he had been of the opinion that the defendants could not have had proceedings brought against them apart from the claim for discovery is not clear, though it would seem probable from Hall V-C's other observations to which I have referred that he would have done all in his power to assist the plaintiffs.

In *Plummer v May*⁷ Earl Hardwicke LC said that a person could not be made a defendant to a bill—

'who is merely a witness, in order to have a discovery of what he can say to the matter... But as against a party interested, the plaintiff is entitled to have a discovery from him, if he is charged to be concerned in the fraud...'

So the rule that discovery is not obtainable from a mere witness is of very considerable antiquity.

There are some more cases decided before *Orr v Diaper*⁸ to which I must now refer. The first of these is *Moodalay v Morton*¹. There discovery was sought from the East India Co in order to discover by what authority the plaintiffs were dispossessed of a lease for supplying the inhabitants of Madras with tobacco. The plaintiffs wanted to find out if the persons who had dispossessed them were acting as servants of the company. If they were, then the plaintiffs intended to sue the company. Lord Kenyon MR held that the plaintiffs were entitled to the discovery sought. It was sought not to ascertain the identity of anyone but whether the company was responsible for the injury the plaintiffs had suffered. I regard the case as an authority for the proposition that discovery can be granted before an action is instituted, but it was information, not names, that was sought, information to discover whether the company were responsible, not to identify the wrongdoer.

In the *Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of London v Levy*², in which *Moodalay v Morton*¹ was not cited, the defendants had refused to discover whose property were certain goods and without which discovery an action of law could not be proceeded with. Lord Eldon LC, in the course of his judgment, said³:

'That, where the bill avers, that an action is brought, or, where the necessary effect in law of the case stated by the bill appears to be, that the Plaintiff has a right to bring an action, he has a right to a discovery, to aid that action, so alleged to be brought, or which he appears to have a right and an intention to bring, cannot be disputed. But it has never yet been, nor can it be, laid down that you can file a bill, not venturing to state, who are the persons, against whom the action is to be brought . . . but stating circumstances; and averring, that you have a right to an action against the Defendants or some of them. That of necessity admits, that some of the Defendants may be only witnesses; and against them there is no right to file such a bill.'

*Moodalay v Morton*¹ was commented on in *Angel v Angel*⁴, where Sir John Leach V-C said it was an exception to the general rule—

'for it would be absurd to demand that an action should be brought before the commission is granted, where the purpose of the commission is to ascertain against whom the action ought to be brought.'

I do not see that it is possible to reconcile Lord Eldon LC's observations with the decision in *Moodalay v Morton*¹ except on the narrow ground that in *Moodalay v Morton*¹ the name of the proposed defendant was known and the company would be sued if discovery showed it to be responsible. It would indeed be odd if you could get discovery if you named the party you intended to sue if you could discover his responsibility, but that you could not get discovery though you had suffered an injury if you were not able to name the person who might be responsible.

In *Story on Equity Jurisprudence*⁵ it is stated:

' . . . in general, it was necessary in order to maintain a bill of discovery that an action should be already commenced in another court to which it should be auxiliary. There were exceptions to this rule, as where the object of discovery was to ascertain who was the proper party against whom the suit should be brought. But these were of rare occurrence.'

A similar passage appears in the first edition⁶ and in a footnote to it *Moodalay v Morton*¹, *Angel v Angel*⁴ and *Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of London v Levy*² are cited. Story thus does not appear to have thought that the right to discovery a of the proper party against whom the suit should be brought depended on the ability of the plaintiff to give his name.

In *Queen of Portugal v Glyn*¹ the majority in this House, Lord Cottenham LC, Lord Lyndhurst, and Lord Brougham, Lord Wynford dissenting, held that a bill of discovery could not be granted against the Queen of Portugal who was not a party to an action brought against Glyns, the bankers, but who was clearly an interested party in that action as it was brought by her agent, Lord Cottenham LC holding that it was a long established rule that discovery on a bill would only be granted against a party to the action. *Moodalay v Morton*² and *Angel v Angel*³ were not cited and I do not consider that the decision in those cases, *Moodalay v Morton*² being regarded as an exception to the general rule, are to be regarded as inferentially overruled by this decision of this House.

*Hunt v Maniere*⁴ and *Upmann v Elkan*⁵ were neither of them cases on discovery. In *Hunt v Maniere*⁴ the question was whether wharfingers had rightly refused to deliver up wine with a false label to the consignee. I do not think that this case assists.

In *Upmann v Elkan*⁵ though the dispute was about costs there were observations by Lord Romilly MR⁶ at first instance, and by Lord Hatherley LC⁷ on appeal, which are of interest. There a bill had been filed praying an injunction to restrain Elkans, who were forwarding agents and the consignees, from removing boxes of cigars marked falsely with the plaintiff's brand from St Katharine's Docks. With regard to the St Katharine Dock Co who were also joined as defendants, Lord Romilly MR said that there was not the least pretence for making them parties to the suit and⁸ that it was the duty of the consignees, despite their innocence and ignorance of the fraud 'at once to give all the information required' and to undertake that the goods should not be removed from their possession. Before the bill was filed the defendants had disclosed the names of the consignors and ultimate consignees. In the Court of Appeal⁷ it was held, affirming the decision of Lord Romilly MR⁶ that the fact that Elkans were agents and merely carriers was no defence to the suit, and Lord Hatherley LC⁹ said it was the business of Elkans, once the complaint was made, to give all proper information. This case, while it states the duties of consignees of goods where complaint is made that they are spurious, does not decide that discovery could have been ordered against Elkans.

From these decisions it is apparent that little support is given to the decision in *Orr v Diaper*¹⁰. The most helpful case is *Moodalay v Morton*². However, *Orr v Diaper*¹⁰ has not, so far as I am aware, ever been questioned or criticised in any subsequent case or in any textbook and the principle it enunciates has been followed on several occasions in other countries. In the textbooks, in addition to the observations of Story J in his book¹¹ to which I have referred, there are statements to a similar effect in Bray¹², in Sichel and Chance on Discovery¹³, and in Ross¹⁴ and it is not without interest to note that in the third edition of Snell on Equity published in 1874 before the decision in *Orr v Diaper*¹⁰, it is said that there are exceptions to the general rule that to maintain a bill of discovery an action should have been commenced in another court:

'As where the object of discovery is to ascertain who is the proper party against whom a suit should be brought, but these are of rare occurrence.'

In these circumstances it is, in my opinion, far too late to challenge that decision. What exactly did it decide? In my view, that a discovery can be granted against a person who is not a mere witness to discover, the fact of some wrongdoing being established, who was responsible for it. The 'mere witness' rule has lost a great deal of its importance since the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 removed the bar to persons interested giving evidence, but it still has significance. Someone involved in the transaction is not a mere witness. If he could be sued, even though there be no intention of suing him, he is not a mere witness. In *Orr v Diaper*¹ Diapers were involved, so were Elkans in *Upmann v Elkan*² so was the East India Co in *Moodalay v Morton*³ and it matters not that the involvement or participation was innocent and in ignorance of the wrongdoing.

Are the respondents to be regarded as so involved in this case? I think the answer is yes. They were not, it is true, involved of their own volition. They were involved in the performance of their statutory duty. The furazolidone was in customs charge until cleared and the respondents could control its movement until cleared (Customs and Excise Act 1952, s 22 (1)). I do not see how it can be said that they were not involved in the importation of this chemical.

So for these reasons in my opinion the answer to the first question I formulated, can the respondents be ordered to disclose the names of the importers? is in the affirmative. As to the second question, should they be ordered to do so? I think that the answer is also yes, unless in consequence of their special position the answer to the third question is in the negative. Subject to the public interest in protecting the confidentiality of information given to customs, in my opinion it is clearly in the public interest and right for the protection of patent holders, where the validity of the patent is accepted and the infringement of it not disputed, that they should be able to obtain by discovery the names and addresses of the wrongdoers from someone involved but not a party to the wrongdoing.

I now turn to the third question. In their list of documents the respondents asserted that they were precluded by law from disclosing the names of the importers and that that disclosure would be injurious to the public interest. In their notice of appeal to the Court of Appeal⁴ they gave notice that the grounds of appeal were:

'Information about a taxpayer or his affairs furnished to a revenue collecting Department of the Crown pursuant to the requirements of a statute is confidential and, in circumstances in which its disclosure is not authorised by statute, exceptionally strong reasons must exist to permit its disclosure to persons outside that Department . . .'

In their case they contend that discovery should not be ordered because disclosure would be contrary to the public interest on two grounds (1) that the information is given to the respondents and their officers in confidence and under compulsion in order that the respondents may perform their statutory duties. 'The informant' it is said 'is entitled to assume that information for this purpose will not be disclosed to others for a different purpose': and (2) that it is essential that the confidence of importers should be respected in order to ensure that full and candid information continues to be given by them. 'The furnishing of the information' they submit 'would inhibit importers from making full and frank disclosure'. The affidavit of Sir Louis Petch, the chairman of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, sets out these contentions more fully.

The respondents were unable to point to any statutory provision prohibiting them

a from disclosing the names of the importers. I do not accept the proposition that all information given to a government department is to be treated as confidential and protected from disclosure, but I agree that information of a personal character obtained in the exercise of statutory powers, information of such a character that the giver of it would not expect it to be used for any purpose other than that for which it is given, or disclosed to any person not concerned with that purpose, is to be regarded as protected from disclosure, even though there is no statutory prohibition of its disclosure. But not all information given to a government department, whether voluntarily or under compulsion, is of this confidential character and the question is whether the names of the importers of the furazolidone were given in confidence. I do not think that that is established. The names and addresses of the importers had to be given to the master of the ship and made known to all those taking part in securing the transit of the chemicals. Presumably the parcels of furazolidone had on them the names and addresses of the consignees for all to see, though they may, I do not know, have not disclosed that the contents of the parcels were furazolidone. The documents completed for the transit of the chemicals and for customs which show the names of the consignees and the contents of the parcels do not seem to me more confidential than consignment notes completed for British Railways and British Road Services.

d I do not doubt that a great deal of the information obtained by customs is of a highly confidential character which it would be most improper for them to disclose but I do not consider that this information, even if it be of a confidential character, was of a highly confidential nature.

e I do not forget that by s 127 of the Finance Act 1972 it is provided that no obligation as to secrecy or other restriction on the disclosure of information imposed by statute or otherwise is to prevent the communication of information by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise and vice versa, or that the disclosure of information obtained by one from the other is prohibited by s 127 (2), save for the purposes there specified, and I do not forget that by s 3 of the Finance Act 1967 power is given to the commissioners to disclose, on it being notified to them by the Secretary of State that it is in the national interest, that certain information about imported goods should be given, and that, though by order the Secretary of State can add to the description of information which can be disclosed, he is expressly debarred from authorising the disclosure of the price of the goods or the name of the importer.

g I can well understand that customs, taking the view that they are prohibited by law from disclosing information obtained by them, would require a provision expressly authorising disclosure to be included in these Acts. The reason for the prohibition in s 3 of the 1967 Act of the Secretary of State requiring information to be given as to the name of an importer are not apparent from the section. It may have been, I do not know, on account of the 'candour' argument of customs and excise.

h The inclusion of these provisions in these two recent Acts does not appear to me to lead to the conclusion that the assumption that the respondents are prohibited by law from disclosing all information obtained by them is well based. Much of the information they obtain is no doubt of such a character that it is implicit that it is not to be used or disclosed for any purpose other than that for which it is given. The question here is whether the names of importers of furazolidone in infringement of the patent are of that character.

i For the reasons I have given I do not think they are. If any degree of confidentiality is attached to them I think it must be a low degree. I must confess that I am not in the least impressed by the 'candour' argument. I really cannot conceive it to be realistic to suggest that the vast majority of importers who do not infringe patents or do other wrongs will be in the least deterred from giving proper information to customs by the knowledge that pursuant to an order of the court the names of the wrongdoers are disclosed by customs.

Having said this, I want to make it clear that in my opinion the respondents have acted perfectly properly throughout these proceedings. Applications for discovery by persons who are not sued and who have done no wrong were a rare occurrence in the last century and are even rarer in this. The respondents are right to be solicitous for the interests of those who give them information. They were right initially to refuse the appellants' request. Indeed I think that it may well be that in cases which are not absolutely on all fours with this, they would be right in future to refuse disclosure except on the order of the court.

And the question is, should the court now order it? If a degree of confidentiality does attach to the names and addresses of the importers, I think that on the balance of national interest the interests of justice in this case far outweigh any interest there may be in non-disclosure. The appellants now only seek discovery of the names and addresses of the consignees of the imported furazolidone in the last six years and, in my opinion, that discovery should be ordered in the form which has been agreed between the parties.

As to costs, I agree with the order proposed by my noble and learned friend, Lord Reid.

For the reasons I have stated, in my opinion this appeal should be allowed.

LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. My Lords, on the appellants' summons for inspection Graham J¹ held that the respondents had not infringed the patent and that the goods were not liable to forfeiture under s 44 of the Customs and Excise Act 1952 as 'prohibited goods'; but that nevertheless they were bound to disclose the names for which the appellants were asking. His order¹, made on 8th December 1971, which gave effect to this decision was technically an interlocutory order but in reality it disposed of all the issues raised in the consolidated actions. The respondents appealed to the Court of Appeal² which by a judgment given on 25th July 1972 agreed with the judge on the question of infringement and on the construction of s 44; but held that, even apart from the question of privilege, the respondents, not being infringers, were under no obligation to disclose the names of the importers; and that in any case it would have been contrary to the public interest to have ordered them to disclose them. On their appeal to this House the appellants abandoned the contention that the respondents had infringed the patent. They did not, as I understood, abandon their contention that goods imported in infringement of a patent are goods 'imported contrary to a prohibition in force with respect thereto under or by virtue of an enactment' within the meaning of s 44; but—in common I think with all your Lordships—I have no doubt that Graham J¹ and the Court of Appeal² were right in rejecting this contention. The action falls, therefore, to be treated as a pure action for discovery and the questions to be decided are (A) whether in the circumstances the respondents, although not themselves infringers, would be bound—apart from any question of privilege—to make the discovery asked and (B) whether, if so, it would be contrary to the public interest to order them to make it. For the purpose of answering these questions one must make three assumptions in favour of the appellants, first that the patent is valid; secondly, that the patent has been infringed by importers whose names are known to the respondents; and thirdly, that the appellants cannot discover the identity of the infringers unless the respondents disclose it to them.

The most recent English authority to which the appellants could refer us in support of the proposition that the court can entertain an action by A against B in which the only relief asked is that B disclose to A the identity of someone who has to his knowledge infringed A's rights, in order to enable A to bring an action against him, is

Orr v Diaper decided by Hall V-C in 1876 and reported in the Law Reports¹ and, more fully, in the Weekly Reporter². Unfortunately, however, in order to understand the argument and the judgment in that case it is necessary to plunge still further into the past and consider the practice of the Court of Chancery with regard to bills of discovery. I say 'unfortunately' because the lawyer of today can at best have only a superficial understanding of a procedure developed when law and equity were administered in separate courts and the parties to common law actions were not permitted to give evidence. A further source of difficulty is that the chancery reports before the time of Lord Eldon often take the form of brief notes which may have been useful to those for whose benefit they were published but mean very little to the modern reader. I am, therefore, far from confident that what I am about to say is an accurate summary of the position. One starts with the distinction which came to be drawn by equity lawyers between a bill of relief and a bill of discovery. Since the ordinary chancery bill asking for relief in equity always included a request that the defendant be ordered to answer on oath a number of interrogatories framed to elicit admissions which would help the petitioner to prove the case set out earlier in the bill it can be said that every chancery bill was in a sense a bill of discovery. But a bill of discovery properly so called was a bill which simply asked for the disclosure of facts known to the defendant or of documents in his possession to aid the petitioner in prosecuting or defending other proceedings and asked no other equitable relief save, if the petitioner was the defendant to an action at law, an injunction staying that action until the discovery was given. A defendant from whom discovery was sought either by a bill of relief or by a bill of discovery might object to giving discovery on the ground that he had no 'interest' in the proceedings but was 'a mere witness' and ought not to be compelled to give his evidence before the hearing. To this rule exceptions were allowed in the interests of justice but by the end of the 18th century the list of exceptions was closed. Further, what constituted an 'interest' for the purpose of the rule came to be defined. In the case of a bill of relief it was such an interest as that a decree could be made against him or that he would be affected by the decree. As to a bill of discovery it was finally decided by this House in *Queen of Portugal v Glyn*³ that such a bill could not be maintained against a person who was not a party to the record in the action in aid of which the discovery was sought even though he was deeply interested in its success. It is, incidentally, not without interest to observe that whereas in earlier days, in particular at the time of the disputes between Lord Ellesmere LC and Coke CJ, the common lawyers had bitterly resented the granting of injunctions by the Chancellor staying proceedings at law where the defendant could make out a prima facie case of fraud on the part of the plaintiff with which the common law was unable to deal, in *Queen of Portugal v Glyn*³ it was common lawyers—Lord Abinger and Lord Wynford—who thought that an injunction could and should be granted to stay an action by an agent of the Queen on bills of exchange to which, if the allegations in the bill were true, she was not 'in conscience' entitled, whereas it was the equity lawyer, Lord Cottenham LC, who gave the leading speech upholding the demurrer to the bill of discovery on the ground that the Queen was not a party to the record at law and could in theory have been called as a witness by the defendant. But the 'mere witness' rule has in principle nothing to do with the question whether or not a defendant to a bill should be obliged to disclose the identity of someone against whom the plaintiff wishes to claim relief. In such cases there can be no question of calling the defendant to give the evidence at the hearing since without the disclosure of the name proceedings cannot be brought at all. In this field it was settled that if a party was properly made a defendant to a bill of relief the petitioner was entitled to discovery from him of the existence or whereabouts of other persons not parties in order that they might be made parties; but whether one could bring a bill of discovery in order to find out whom to sue in proceedings which you had not yet brought was not entirely clear. On one side reliance could be placed on *Moodalay v Morton*¹ decided in 1785 by Sir Lloyd Kenyon MR. There the plaintiff who said that the East India Co had granted him the right to supply the inhabitants of Madras with tobacco for a term of years and that persons who were servants of the company had dispossessed him and purported to grant a lease of the right to someone else filed a bill of discovery against the company and Morton their secretary asking them to disclose by whom and under what authority the second lease had been made so that he might know how to frame the action at law which he wished to bring in respect of the injury done to him. Obviously it was material for that purpose for him to discover whether those who had dispossessed him were acting by the authority of the company or not. That case differs from the present case in that there the discovery might well have shown that the proper defendant to the proposed action was in fact the person—the East India Co—from whom discovery was sought; but that does not seem a very substantial distinction. Further in *Angel v Angel*² Sir John Leach V-C appears to have regarded *Moodalay v Morton*¹ as an authority showing that a 'would be' plaintiff at law could bring a bill of discovery in equity to discover against whom the action should be brought. On the other side reliance could be placed on some language used by Lord Eldon LC in his judgment in *Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of London v Levy*³, though *Moodalay v Morton*¹ was not referred to in that case and the decision can be justified on the ground that the bill was a 'fishing enquiry' by plaintiffs who were trying to find out whether their rights had in fact been infringed. It is noteworthy that Story⁴ states on the authority of *Moodalay v Morton*¹ and *Angel v Angel*² that a bill of discovery may be brought when the object of the discovery is to ascertain who is the proper party against whom a suit should be brought and that as his note also contains a reference to *Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of London v Levy*³ he presumably did not consider that anything which Lord Eldon LC said in that case cast any doubt on the general principle.

With this by way of introduction one can now turn to *Orr v Diaper*⁵—though it is not irrelevant to bear in mind that since 1851 the parties to civil actions at law had been able to give evidence and that by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873 a single court had been established in place of the separate courts of law and equity in which both law and equity could be administered concurrently with the proviso that in case of conflict the rules of equity should prevail.

*Orr v Diaper*⁵ was argued on demurrer. The facts alleged in the statement of claim which must be taken to have been true were that the plaintiffs were manufacturers of sewing cotton which they packed in a distinctive way and which was sold abroad in—among other countries—Chile; that sewing cotton of an inferior quality packed according to their style and bearing counterfeit tickets had been sold in Chile for the past few years and that in April 1876 they discovered that the defendants who were shippers in Liverpool had been for some years and were still 'shipping' these goods to Valparaiso. On 10th April 1876 the plaintiffs' solicitors asked the defendants to give them the names of the consignors and, on their refusal to do so, started an action on 25th April asking for discovery of the names and addresses of the consignors of the a goods bearing the counterfeit tickets¹—‘in aid of proceedings now in contemplation by the Plaintiffs to restrain the piracy of their tickets’ which could not, as they said, be maintained without the discovery sought. There is no doubt that if these allegations were established—and the demurrer of course proceeded on the footing that they were established—the plaintiffs could have obtained an injunction against Messrs Diaper, in proceedings framed for that purpose, to restrain them from continuing to ship goods which were being ‘passed off’ as the plaintiffs’ goods. This appears from *Upmann v Elkan*². The relevant facts there were that on 14th June 1869 Messrs Elkan who were continental forwarding agents carrying on business in London received a letter from a firm in Hamburg saying that they had shipped to them a case of cigars containing cigars of various brands, requesting them to pay the duty thereon and to forward the contents to various persons resident in England whose names and addresses were given. The case duly arrived and was warehoused with the St Katharine’s Dock Co. The plaintiffs who were cigar manufacturers discovered—somehow or other—that the cigars which were not of their manufacture were packed in boxes bearing an imitation of their brand and on 19th June their solicitors told Messrs Elkan, who said that up to that time they had no reason to suspect that anything was wrong, that the cigars consigned to them bore a forged brand. After, as they said, verifying that this was indeed the fact, Messrs Elkan offered to give the plaintiffs the names of the consignors and actually gave them the names on 8th July. Meanwhile, on 1st July, the plaintiffs filed a bill against Messrs Elkan and the dock company asking for an injunction to restrain Messrs Elkan from removing the cigars from the docks and from infringing their mark and asking for damages. They obtained an ex parte injunction on 2nd July. A motion for interim injunction was made on 8th July which stood over until 15th July on Messrs Elkan giving an undertaking, and on 15th July the injunction was granted—Messrs Elkan expressing their willingness to act as the court should direct by saying that they preferred to have an injunction granted against them to simply continuing their undertaking. When the suit came on the court held that Messrs Elkan were not privy to the infringement of the mark and the dispute became a dispute as to costs—but to resolve it the court had to decide what were the rights and duties of the parties on the footing that Messrs Elkan had no knowledge of the fraud before the plaintiffs’ solicitors told them of it. Lord Romilly MR³ expressed the view that as soon as Messrs Elkan were told of the fraud it was their duty to give the plaintiffs the information as to the identity of the consignors for which they were asking and to undertake that the goods should not be taken from the warehouse until the spurious brand had been removed. He added that persons in the position of Messrs Elkan could not reasonably complain if proceedings were started against them before they gave the information. It was their misfortune that they had dishonest correspondents. In the result on Messrs Elkan undertaking that if any fresh cigars should be sent to them bearing the plaintiffs’ brand they would at once give the plaintiffs notice, he made no order as to costs as between the plaintiffs and Messrs Elkan—leaving each side to pay its own. That decision was affirmed on appeal by Lord Hatherley LC⁴ who agreed with what Lord Romilly MR³ had said as to the duty of Messrs Elkan on hearing of the fraud.

To return now to *Orr v Diaper*⁵—counsel for the defendant pointed out that the action was a pure action for discovery, that no relief was asked against his clients beyond the disclosure of names to enable the plaintiff to bring proceedings against the consignors, and he submitted that the ‘mere witness’ rule applied. When Hall V-C asked whether the plaintiff could not add to his suit a claim for relief in equity against the defendant counsel referred to the rule (laid down by Lord Eldon LC in *Butterworth v Bailey*¹) that a bill of discovery could not be turned by amendment into a bill for relief. Hall V-C—perhaps unfortunately—did not call on counsel for the plaintiff. If he had done so it may be that counsel would have pointed out that the ‘mere witness’ rule could have no application to a case where all that was being asked for was the identity of a wrongdoer whom the plaintiff would be unable to sue unless the defendant gave it to him. As it was the judge overruled the demurrer on the ground that the defendant was not a ‘mere witness’ because on the facts taken to be admitted the plaintiff could have obtained an injunction against him if he had chosen to apply for one. To make the right of a plaintiff to obtain the sort of discovery which was being sought in *Orr v Diaper*² and is being sought in the present case dependent on whether or not the plaintiff could have obtained some relief against the defendant if he had chosen to ask for it is to my mind utterly illogical. Suppose that Diaper after having innocently and unwittingly shipped infringing goods for some consignor for several years had gone out of business shortly before the plaintiff asked him for the consignor’s name. In such a state of facts the plaintiff could not have obtained any relief against him since he was not continuing to ship infringing goods nor was there any danger that he would do so in the future. Yet if Lord Romilly MR and Lord Hatherley LC were right in saying that a man who has become innocently mixed up in fraudulent trading is under a duty to disclose the name of the wrongdoer to the injured party in order to enable him to bring his action that duty must be just the same in a case where because, for example, some infringing goods are still in his possession an injunction could be obtained against him and a case such as I have supposed where it could not. Bray, in his well-known work³, treats *Orr v Diaper*² as a modern example of what he regards as the old principle that a bill of discovery might be filed against a person in order to discover the names of other persons for the purpose of bringing an action against them although no proceedings were to be brought against the defendant to the bill—and makes no reference to the fact that in *Orr v Diaper*² it so happened that such proceedings could have been brought⁴. He suggests⁵ that the language used by Lord Eldon LC in *Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of London v Levy*⁶ ‘requires some little qualification’. The same view of *Orr v Diaper*² was taken in 1887 by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in *Post v Toledo Cincinnati and St Louis Railroad Co*⁷. There an Ohio corporation had recovered judgment in Ohio against another Ohio corporation under whose statutes its stockholders were personally responsible for its debts. The business of the debtor corporation was conducted in Massachusetts and the creditor corporation brought a bill of discovery in the court of that state against the debtor corporation and its officers who were resident in Massachusetts for discovery of the names of its stockholders so that the creditor corporation could take proceedings against them in Ohio. Although the debtor corporation was made a defendant it was not served with the bill since there was no way in which effectual service could be made on it. So in substance the only defendants to the bill were the officers of the corporation against whom no relief was or could be claimed. They demurred to the bill. In support of the demurrer it was argued that Lord Eldon LC’s decision in *Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of London v Levy*⁶ was inconsistent with the badly reported earlier cases such as *Moodalay v Morton*⁸, that Hall V-C could not have meant to overrule a decision of Lord Eldon LC universally accepted for 75 years a and that *Orr v Diaper*¹ should be treated as a special case not to be followed unless the facts were exactly the same. On the other side it was said that if a plaintiff could obtain from a person whom he had properly made defendant to a bill for relief discovery of the names of other parties necessary to be made defendants to the suit, why should he not be able to bring a bill of discovery against persons against whom he could claim no relief in order to obtain the names of defendants to a proposed action which he could not bring unless he knew the names?—*Orr v Diaper*¹, was cited in support of that argument. In overruling the demurrer the court said²:

c 'The present case must be determined by the principles declared in the few cases where the plaintiff does not know the names of the persons against whom he intends to bring a suit, and brings a bill against persons who stand in some relation to them, or to their property, in order to discover who the persons are against whom he may proceed for relief. . . It is settled that a bill of discovery may be maintained to aid the plaintiff in a suit which he intends immediately to bring, as well as in a suit already brought, if the bill discloses a cause of action; and the difficult question is under what circumstances may such a bill be maintained for the purpose of ascertaining the proper parties against whom the suit should be brought.'

d The court then pointed out that the facts in *Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of London v Levy*³ were not such as required Lord Eldon LC to overrule *Moodalay v Morton*⁴ and that in fact no reference is made to that case in his judgment and they quote *Orr v Diaper*¹ for the proposition that under some circumstances discovery may be had for the purpose of ascertaining the persons against whom the plaintiff may bring a suit although he does not allege that he has a cause of action against e or intends to sue the persons who are the defendants in the proceedings for discovery. They then state their conclusion on the facts in the case before them as follows⁵:

f 'It is clear that courts do not compel discovery from persons who sustain no other relation to the contemplated litigation, or to the subject of the suit, than that of witnesses; and it is also clear that a bill for discovery cannot be used to enable a plaintiff to fish for information of any causes of action he may have against other persons than the defendant. . . But when a plaintiff has a cause of action against persons who are defined either by statute, or by their relations to property or a business by the management of which the plaintiff has suffered injury, and the names and residences of these persons are unknown to him, it is not clear that there may not be such a state of facts that a court ought to compel a discovery of the names and residences of these persons from their agents in charge of the property or business; and the decisions recognize that this may sometimes be done. In the present case it is the duty of the corporation to pay the plaintiff's judgment if it have sufficient assets. A part of its assets for that purpose is the liability of its stockholders. The corporation acts only through its directors and other principal officers; and it is necessary that the plaintiff, in order to enforce the liability of the stockholders, and thus obtain satisfaction of its judgment, should bring suit against the corporation and all its stockholders; h and the plaintiff, except by discovery, cannot ascertain who these stockholders are.'

i I find that case of great assistance in the solution of the problem before us in this case. The court which decided it was of high standing; it was decided in the light of the old English chancery authorities which as the case was decided as long ago as 1887 the judges were probably in a better position to understand than we are; and it lays down a reasonable principle by which to judge whether a plaintiff should have this sort of discovery. To make his right depend on whether or not he could obtain some other relief against the defendant is to my mind quite irrational. The court in *Post v Toledo Cincinnati and St Louis Railroad Co*¹ makes it depend on the nature of the relation which subsists or subsisted between the defendant to the action for discovery and the persons the disclosure of whose names is sought. In that case the relation was that of agents in charge of the undertaking of which the persons whose names were sought were in effect the owners. In cases such as *Upmann v Elkan*² and *Orr v Diaper*³ the relation was that of persons engaged by the tortfeasor to deal with the goods in question and who in the course of doing so unwittingly facilitated the commission of the tort. In my judgment no sensible distinction can be drawn in applying the *Post v Toledo*¹ principle between the position of the respondent commissioners and the position of Diaper or Messrs Elkan or the St Katharine's Dock Co. It is true that Messrs Elkan were under no obligation to enter into the business relations with the dishonest consignors which made them unwitting facilitators of a fraud whereas the respondents were under a statutory duty to bring under their control for the purpose of exacting duty these infringing imports of furazolidone. But the fact remains that these goods passed through their hands and—assuming that they cannot claim privilege on the grounds of public interest—I cannot see any reason why they should not be under the same duty to disclose the names as the dock company who owned the transit shed in which the imports were stored under the surveillance of customs officers. The dock company would certainly have been bound to give discovery of the names if the plaintiffs discovered that furazolidone was in a particular transit shed and that the dock company who were in possession of it knew the names of the importers. If so, why not the respondents who had effective control of the goods?

That being my conclusion on this part of the case I do not find it necessary to express any opinion on a point to which a good deal of argument was devoted—namely, whether the appellants could have obtained against the respondents the equivalent of an injunction in the shape of a declaration that they ought not to give clearance to imports of furazolidone without giving the appellants the name of the importers.

This brings me to the claim of privilege. In his affidavit sworn on 28th April 1971 Sir Louis Petch put the claim on two grounds: first, that the respondents were not entitled to disclose the information requested even if they wished to do so and, secondly, that assuming that they had the power to give it the disclosure would be contrary to the public interest. Counsel for the respondents in his able and candid argument wisely did not seek to support the first ground. Of course a statute may provide that information of a certain character shall not be disclosed even for the purpose of legal proceedings. An example of such a prohibition is s 17 (2) of the Agricultural Marketing Act 1931, which was considered in *Rowell v Pratt*⁴. But the respondents are not prohibited by statute from disclosing the names of importers. No doubt the respondents consider very properly that they ought to treat as confidential and not voluntarily to disclose even to another government department information which comes to them as a result of the exercise of the powers given to them by the Customs and Excise Act 1952 for the purpose of enabling them to collect the revenues of customs and excise. Section 3 of the Finance Act 1967, and s 16 (9) of the Agriculture Act 1970, to which Sir Louis refers—and also s 127 of the Finance Act 1972, passed after he had sworn his affidavit—were enacted in order to make it clear that the obligation of secrecy which the respondents very properly consider to be binding a on them as a general rule is not to apply in the cases there specified. But this has nothing to do with disclosure under an order of the court for the purpose of legal proceedings, whether criminal or civil, for outside the field of legal professional privilege the fact that information has been imparted confidentially is not—in the absence of an express statutory prohibition—any bar to the court ordering its disclosure. Then is it contrary to the public interest that this information should be disclosed? This problem falls to be considered under two heads—first, from the point of view of the individuals who have supplied the information; secondly, from the point of view of the efficiency of customs. Now on the admitted facts in this case the great majority of those whose names will be disclosed have infringed the appellants' patent and it does not lie in their mouths to complain that their identity is revealed. It is no doubt conceivable—though most unlikely—that some persons who bought furazolidone from the appellants and exported it for sale abroad have re-imported it. Such people, if they exist, might possibly dislike their identity being disclosed—but in this connection we should bear in mind that the information in question is given to many others besides the respondents. The shippers, the master of the ship and the employees of the owners of the transit sheds or warehouses in which the goods are stored will all know or have means of getting to know the names of the importers. This information accordingly cannot fairly be regarded as highly confidential information in the hands of the respondents. I turn now to the effect of the disclosure on the efficient working of the customs service. Sir Louis says that he is afraid that the good relations and mutual confidence which usually exist between the officers of the customs and traders would be seriously impaired if it became known that any information of a confidential character obtained from traders under statutory powers might have to be disclosed by the commissioners otherwise than under the provisions of a statute enabling them to disclose it. The traders whose good relations with the customs Sir Louis is anxious to maintain are, presumably, honest traders. Any honest trader who was disturbed at the thought that a court could order the disclosure of importers' names in circumstances such as exist here would be a most unreasonable man and I cannot believe that there would be many such. No doubt dishonest traders might be disturbed by the knowledge that such disclosure could be ordered, and Sir Louis gives it as a further ground for the claim of privilege that dishonest traders who now tell the customs the truth with regard to the character of the goods and the identity of the importers may be driven to giving false information. An argument that one should not try to stop one form of wrongdoing out of fear that some of the wrongdoers may take to committing yet further offences in order to be able to maintain their original course of wrongdoing is not very attractive. But in any case I think that Sir Louis's fears on this head are exaggerated. On the question of public interest I agree with Graham J¹ and disagree with the Court of Appeal². I would therefore allow the appeal and I agree that the costs should be dealt with in the manner proposed by my noble and learned friend, Lord Reid.

b In the course of the argument fears were expressed that to order disclosure of names in circumstances such as exist in this case might be the 'thin end of the wedge', that we might be opening the door to 'fishing requests' by would-be plaintiffs who want to collect evidence or to requests for names made to persons who had no relevant connection with the person to be sued or with the events giving rise to the alleged cause of action but just happened to know the name. I think that these fears are groundless. In the first place, there is a clear distinction between simply asking for the name of a person whom you wish to make a defendant and asking for evidence. This case has nothing to do with the collection of evidence. Secondly, although in any case which was on all fours with this case or any subsequent case which may be decided the respondents or any other person who was asked for a name would no doubt give it without putting the applicant to the expense of obtaining an order of the court; in any case in which there was the least doubt whether disclosure should be made the person to whom the request was made would be fully justified in saying that he would only make it under an order of the court. Then the court would have to decide whether in all the circumstances it was right to make an order. In so deciding it would no doubt consider such matters as the strength of the applicant's case against the unknown alleged wrongdoer, the relation subsisting between the alleged wrongdoer and the respondent, whether the information could be obtained from another source, and whether the giving of the information would put the respondent to trouble which could not be compensated by the payment of all expenses by the applicant. The full costs of the respondent of the application and any expense incurred in providing the information would have to be borne by the applicant.

LORD KILBRANDON. My Lords, the facts which are basic to the question of law arising in this appeal lie in a very narrow compass. Between May 1967 and February 1970 there were six individual months' importations into the United Kingdom of furazolidone, a chemical substance of which the first appellants are patentees in the USA, and the second appellants (whom I shall refer to as 'the appellants'), are exclusive licensees in the United Kingdom. While it is possible, it is commercially very improbable, that some of these importations may have included importations or re-importations of the patented article manufactured by or under licence from the appellants. In spite of some unhappy ambiguities in the appellants' pleadings, it is right that the appeal should be decided on the footing that the importers of these parcels of furazolidone are by their use of the substance infringers in the United Kingdom of the appellants' patent right, could be restrained by law from future infringement, and are liable in law for the pecuniary consequences of their past infringements.

The appellants have come to know of these infringements through the publication by the respondents, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, of monthly special chemical returns prepared by them and made available by them to the chemical industry. The name of the importer, otherwise 'infringer', does not appear in the return. I do not think it is necessary to go into the details of the compilation of, and the sources of information for, the respondents' published statistics. Nor do I need to refer, except in the broadest way, to the procedures governing the passage of imported goods through customs. In the present context, that is the disclosure of names of importers, it is enough to say that, on the arrival of a ship (or aircraft) at a customs port, the master has to prepare, sign and deliver to customs a 'report' of his ship and her lading, which report contains a description of each purchase of goods and the name of the consignee thereof, while the importer or his agent must prepare, sign and deliver to customs a form of 'entry' specifying the description, quantity, tariff code number and value of goods consigned to him. No goods can be released out of customs' charge until these forms have been presented, and the appropriate duty paid.

The case has been conducted on the footing that it is impossible for the appellants to find out the names of the infringers of their patent unless the respondents disclose them. The respondents refuse to do so, and the present action, as it is now maintained, is like the old bill of discovery inasmuch as it prays for no relief, but seeks an order for discovery only. This is not by any means the extent of the claim against the respondents which was before the courts below¹. Until the appeal was opened in your Lordships' House, the appellants were claiming a declaration that the respondents had infringed, or caused, enabled or assisted others to infringe their patent, a declaration that it was the respondents' duty to forfeit the imported furazolidone, a and an order that they make a complete discovery of documents relating to the importations.

It will be convenient to consider first whether such an application as this would succeed against a person not in the position of a department of state, that is, treating as a separate and subsequent question whether any special considerations of public policy apply to such bodies as the Commissioners of Customs and Excise. It is easy to envisage a dock authority, probably operating under powers conferred in a local Act within the framework of the Harbours Clauses Act 1847; the authority is empowered to demand sight of a ship's manifest, or otherwise obtain a detailed account of her cargo, broken down into quite narrow categories, in order that the dock charges appropriate to each category of goods can be calculated and imposed. There will be some provision for the detention of goods in the dock area until dues are paid, and the authority will necessarily be aware of the names of the consignees. The dock authority is apprised that the importation of certain goods which passed through the port infringed a patent conceded to be valid—as the respondents concede for the purposes of the present case—and the patentee can get no remedy unless the dock authority disclose the names of the importers. Will discovery lie against the authority at the instance of the patentee? To make the comparison completely valid, and with an eye to some of the precedents to which it will be necessary to refer, it must also be predicated not only that the patentee has no intention of bringing suit against the dock authority for any relief other than discovery, but also that he has no ground in law or equity for doing so. That would, I apprehend, be the situation if the goods were no longer in the control of the authority, and if there were no grounds which would support an application for an injunction against them at the instance of the patentees in respect of future importations.

e Among the large number of cases cited to us, I believe it is not possible to find a precedent for the granting of an application for discovery in the precise circumstances I have figured. Indeed, I think I can greatly shorten what I have to say on this topic, which is of a technical character involving an expert knowledge of English legal history in the nature of things denied to me, by saying that I respectfully agree with the analysis made in the Court of Appeal by Buckley J¹ of the cases of *Upmann v Elkan*² and *Orr v Diaper*³. These seem to be generally regarded as the root cases on the subject, especially perhaps the latter since it post-dates the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, and are widely cited as leading cases in the foreign jurisdictions to which we were copiously referred. In both cases the plaintiff claimed to have a right of action against the defendant arising out of the import or export of goods masquerading as his own; in *Upmann*², too, the defendant had refused, wrongly as Lord Hatherley LC held, to disclose the names of the 20 consignees. In *Orr v Diaper*³, while the plaintiff had no intention of suing the defendant, he alleged in his statement of claim that the defendants 'had been for some time and were still shipping' the offending goods; this statement was made after the defendants had acquired knowledge of the offences. This is no doubt the foundation for Hall V-C's observation that the plaintiffs showed a right to sue the defendants at law, 'which expression, since the change made by the Judicature Acts, must mean this court, in some other proceeding'.

h In *Moodalay v Morton*⁴, as I read it, the plaintiff had an action not only against the person who had infringed his right of property by purporting to give it to another, but also against the East India Co if that person turned out to be their servant or agent. With special reference to that case, I would heartily agree with some remarks made by Sir John Leach V-C in *Angel v Angel*⁵. (Presumably the reference in the quotation is to Mitford on Pleadings.)

'In the several cases to be found in the reporters, the expressions are for the most part indistinct and confused; and Lord Redesdale, adhering to the language of these authorities, has, with their words, adopted in some measure their inaccuracies and obscurities.'

We were offered two reports of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment in Moodalay, one by Brown¹, which was criticised by Sir John Leach V-C in *Angel*², and the other by Dickens³; they are entirely different from one another. Both cannot be authentic, so I suppose it is possible that neither of them is. We were shown at least three versions of the judgment in *Orr v Diaper*⁴; the Court of Appeal⁵ made a point of preferring that in the *Weekly Reporter*⁶ to that in the *Law Reports*⁷. The former is certainly fuller and easier to follow, but for all I know it was deliberately altered by the learned judge on revision. These considerations make one reluctant to rely on the old cases except insofar as they deal with the actual subject-matter arising for decision in them. To erect on them a structure of principles which should guide a modern court in the administration of justice seems to me to be building on quicksands. If, without the positive assistance of the ancient precedents, it seems possible to identify principles prima facie acceptable, the only limitation to their adoption might be to see whether these principles had ever been authoritatively negated.

A case which gives rise to some difficulty is *Queen of Portugal v Glyn*⁸. One Soares sued Glyns to recover the proceeds of certain bills. Glyns filed a bill of discovery against Soares and the Queen, alleging that Soares was a mere agent for the Queen. The Queen demurred; in the demurrer Glyns' averments had to be accepted pro veritate. The House, reversing the decision of Lord Abinger CB⁹, Lord Wynford dissenting, sustained the demurrer, on the ground that since the Queen was not a party to the record in the action at law, she could not be made respondent in the bill of discovery in equity. The case exhibits some curious features. The appeal was heard in 1837; judgment⁸ was given more than three years later, after an unusually controversial debate. This case is ignored by Bray¹⁰, by Story¹¹, and by Snell in his first edition¹², being the only one published before the Judicature Acts. The sole reference to it in Halsbury¹³ is under Agency, not Discovery. Two decisions of the Court of Appeal¹⁴ are there cited in support of the proposition:

'In any action brought by an agent, the defendant is entitled to discovery from the principal as fully as if he were the plaintiff on the record, even though he is a foreign principal'.

The footnote concludes, 'but see *Queen of Portugal v. Glyn*⁸', which certainly appears to decide the contrary. The case was not included in the extensive citation before the Court of Appeal⁵. Since much of the rather acrimonious discussion in this House related to the technical requirements of bills in chancery, the opinion may be ventured that the case, at least since 1873, has not been regarded as authoritative;

a in any event it does not deal with the problem of discovery for the purpose of finding the name of a proposed defendant. This point is made in *Bray*¹ contrasting *Queen of Portugal*² with *Orr v Diaper*³.

Assuming that there are some characteristics attaching to a defendant in such an issue, which will be decisive of the question whether he can be called on to make discovery in order to enable the plaintiff in that issue to maintain a just cause of action against a third party, it seems to me incredible that one of those characteristics b should be the defendant's vulnerability in an action brought against him by the plaintiff. Why should A be bound to disclose to B the information which he must have before he can sue C if, and only if, B could, if he wished, also have sued A, although he has no intention of doing so? There is no rational distinction observable here.

c This may be the place to dispose of the 'mere witness' rule. It is settled, rightly or wrongly, that you cannot get discovery against someone who has no connection with the litigious matters other than that he might be called as a witness either to testify or to produce documents at the trial. We are not here in that territory. The defendant is not a mere witness, or any kind of witness, because the whole basis of the application is that, until the defendant has disclosed what he knows, there can be no litigation in which he could give evidence. Furthermore, if he were to d disclose, either voluntarily or under compulsion, the names of the third parties whom the plaintiff desires to pursue, even then he might well not be a witness in the ensuing litigation. He might have no evidence to give; what he knew would not necessarily be required post litem motam.

The most attractive way to state an acceptable principle, intellectually at least, may be as follows. The dispute between the plaintiff and the defendants is of a peculiar character. The plaintiff is demanding what he conceives to be his right, but that right insofar as it has patrimonial substance is not truly opposed to any interest of the defendants; he is demanding access to a court of law, in order that he may establish that third parties are unlawfully causing him damage. If he is successful, the defendants will not be the losers, except insofar as they may have been put to a little clerical trouble. If it be objected that their disclosures under f pressure may discourage future customers, the answer is that they should be having no business with wrongdoers. Nor is their position easily distinguishable from that of the recipient of a subpoena, which, in total disregard of his probable loss of time and money, forces him to attend the court for the very same purpose as that for which discovery is ordered, namely, to assist a private citizen to justify a claim in law. The policy of the administration of justice demands this service from him.

g But it is not necessary, in such a case as is being figured, to go as far as this. The defendants are not mere bystanders—although even if they be such they could in due time be called on to give oral evidence. The position in which they find themselves has been described in several ways; in a rather different context Lord Romilly MR in *Upmann v Elkan*⁴ said of the importer that he was 'mixed up with the transaction', and of the dock company who were mere warehousemen, that 'in many respects the position of the dock company does not differ from his [the importer's]'. Again, the case of *Post v Toledo Cincinnati and St Louis Railroad Co*⁵ in which the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts reviewed all the earlier English authorities, was concerned to state—

h 'the principles declared in the few cases where the plaintiff does not know the names of the persons against whom he intends to bring suit, and brings a bill against persons who stand in some relation to them, or to their property, in order to discover who are the persons against whom he may proceed for relief.'

These words appear to me to provide an apt, and by no means too wide, classification of those against whom discovery may in such circumstances be obtained, though I think the court, perhaps misled by the fact that they had available only the report in the Law Reports¹, may have been wrong in saying that in *Orr v Diaper*² the plaintiffs neither alleged that they had a cause of action nor intended to sue the defendants. But the state of the reports does not make this clear.

Turning, then, from the imaginary dock authority we have been considering to the respondents, do they stand in some relation to the appellants or to their property which makes the respondents bound to disclose, on an order of the court, the names of the persons who imported goods in prejudice of the appellants' rights, in order to enable them to sue? In my opinion they do. The goods are at the order of the respondents from the time they enter the customs port until they go out of customs charge. The goods are reported to them in detail, are directed by them to a particular transit shed, and are constructively in their possession and control in the sense of being removable only on their authority; the respondents have the goods under their control so that they can exact in respect of them the duties authorised by the legislature. The importation of these goods infringes the appellants' property right, and the functions which they perform must I think place the respondents in a relation with the appellants which entitles the latter to demand from them the names of the infringers.

As I have said, I do not know of any direct authority which will support such an entitlement. But the proposition seems to be not inconsistent with the ratio of the judgments in *Upmann*³, *Post*⁴ and *Hunt v Maniere*⁵. What is more important, if one is searching for principles rather than collating decisions, is that there are broad statements to be found in authoritative sources which are in harmony with the spirit of the decisions, and do not seem to depend on any seemingly extraneous fact, such as the liability of the defendant in discovery to be sued, which, as I have said, had in my view no bearing on the liability to discovery in a suit proposed to be brought against a third party. Bray on Discovery⁶ says (of the old chancery practice, with which the present action is said to be on all fours):

'A party might file a bill of discovery before he commenced his action, where he required discovery in order to ascertain what form of action to bring ... or in order to ascertain the proper person against whom to bring the action ...'

and he cites, inter alia, *Orr v Diaper*², *Angel v Angel*⁷, and *Moodalay v Morton*⁸. Story J, in his Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, says⁹:

'... in general, it was necessary, in order to maintain a bill of discovery, that an action should be already commenced in another court, to which it should be auxiliary. There were exceptions to this rule, as where the object of discovery was to ascertain who was the proper party against whom the suit should be brought.'

After citing, among other cases, *Moodalay v Morton*⁸, the learned editor of this edition goes on to explain the effect on that exception of the Judicature Act 1873, as exemplified by *Orr v Diaper*². The first edition of this work was published in 1836, and Snell, whose first edition is dated 1868, appears to adopt Story freely: his account is very similar.

a In another jurisdiction a similar principle has been applied. In *Colonial Government v Tatham*¹, while the familiar relationship of agency could perhaps have been said to make the defendants liable in discovery, the basis is put much more broadly, first by Bale CJ and Finnemore J. After quoting *Orr v Diaper*² they say³:

b 'Before granting such an application we must be satisfied that the applicant believes that he has a bona fide claim against some person or persons whose names he seeks to discover, and whose name can be supplied by the respondent, and that he has no other appropriate remedy. We are satisfied upon these points.'

Agency does not seem to have been founded on. Beaumont AJ refers to the passages in *Story*⁴ to which I have adverted, and says⁵:

c 'The principle which underlies the jurisdiction which the law gives to Courts of Equity in cases of this nature, is that where discovery is absolutely necessary in order to enable a party to proceed with a bona fide claim, it is the duty of the Court to assist with the administration of justice by granting an order for discovery, unless some well-founded objection exists against the exercise of such jurisdiction.'

d I observe that here the duty is said to lie rather on the court to make an order necessary to the administration of justice than on the respondent to satisfy some right existing in the plaintiff. In *Hart v Stone*⁶ de Villiers CJ had cited Voet as authority for saying that 'the Judges had very large powers of ordering a disclosure of facts where justice would be defeated without such a disclosure'. And in another civil law system, though the example is rather on the margin of relevance, Erskine, in his *Institute*⁷, after pointing out that Scots law had borrowed from Rome the doctrine that the heir is entitled, on succeeding, to deliberate whether his haereditas is to be damnosa or lucrosa (for he will be liable unless he renounce the succession, for his ancestor's debts), says that the heir has⁸—

e 'a privilege to pursue for exhibition ad deliberandum, against all possessors or havers, of writings, whether granted in favour of the ancestor . . . or by him in favour of others . . .'

f here is no suggestion that in so doing he is pretending to exercise any right of relief against the discoverers.

In my opinion, accordingly, the respondents, in consequence of the relationship in which they stand, arising out of their statutory functions, to the appellants and their rights of property, can properly be ordered by the court to disclose to the appellants the names of persons whom the appellants bona fide believe to be infringing these rights, this being their only practicable source of information as to whom they should sue, subject to any special right of exception which the respondents may qualify in respect of their position as a department of state. It has to be conceded that there is no direct precedent for the granting of such an application in the precise circumstances of this case, but such an exercise of the power of the court seems to be well within broad principles authoritatively laid down. That exercise will always be subject to judicial discretion, and it may well be that the reason for the limitation in practice on what may be a wider power to order discovery, to any case in which the defendant has been 'mixed up with the transaction', to use Lord Romilly MR's⁹ words, or 'stands in some relation' to the plaintiff or his property, within the meaning of the decision in *Post*¹⁰, is that that is the way in which judicial discretion ought to be exercised.

I will now turn to an aspect of that public policy which, exceptionally, protects from disclosure, either by discovery or testimony, communications which public policy decrees shall be held confidential. The commonest example arises from the relationship between attorney and client. The aspect relied on by the respondents in the present appeal is that usually but not very happily called 'Crown privilege'.

The respondents base their claim to refuse discovery on two broad grounds. First, they say they are not permitted by law to disclose matters which they have acquired in the course of the exercise of their statutory functions and have no statutory authority to disclose. They found on s 3 of the Finance Act 1967, as authorising limited disclosure, and impliedly by therefore forbidding wider disclosure. But we are here considering the power of the court to make an order. *Rowell v Pratt*¹ provides an instance of a statute which authorises the gathering of information, and also limits disclosure of it so as to prevent the court from exercising such a power. This is not such a case. It was conceded that, for example, the information here called for would in practice be disclosed by the respondents on their own responsibility if that course were shown to be necessary for the prosecution of, or the defence in, criminal proceedings of a grave character, other than customs prosecutions. If that be so, the court must, in my opinion, be entitled to call for the same sort of information in order to make possible the prevention of a civil wrong.

The other objections were, if I may say so, of a rather stereotyped and unconvincing character. It was said that disclosure of names would, as it were, drive future infringements underground, giving rise to falsehoods, frauds, forgeries and circumventions, so that, as experience in the United States of America has shown, the last state of matters would be worse than the first. Even if this plea involved no element of exaggeration, I would not favour refusing to stop one glaring fraud lest another be substituted for it. Lastly came the 'candour' point—that if the persons now under statutory obligation to make disclosure to customs in the course of their business come to appreciate that, in certain circumstances, the names of importers may have to be disclosed to the court, the good relations which now exist between them and the respondents would be endangered, and they might not give the information required by statute with their customary candour. Some such argument is generally accepted as convincing when the confidential relationship between the taxpayer and the Inland Revenue is in question. The information here sought is, however, to be found in documents very different from income tax returns. It exists in bills of lading, ships' manifests, masters' 'reports', and the records of the keepers of transit sheds, quite apart from 'entries' made by importers. This is not a conclusive factor, but it is in my opinion an important factor which the court should take into account in exercising its judgment whether public policy demands that this information be treated, exceptionally, as confidential and immune from disclosure on an order of the court. In my opinion, public policy does not so demand.

I agree with the judgment of Graham J², and would accordingly allow this appeal. I also agree with the order as to costs proposed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

Appeal allowed. Cause remitted to the Chancery Division with a direction to order that the respondents do set forth and disclose to the appellants in the case of the last importation referred to in para 2 of the amended particulars of breaches served by the appellants in action 1969 N 230, and in the case of each importation referred to in para 2 of the particulars of infringements served by the appellants in action 1970 N 1809, the name and address of any person appearing from the customs entry in respect of such importation to be an importer.

GOULDING J

6th, 7th JUNE 1973

Surtax – Settlement – Revocable settlements – Information – Power of commissioners by notice to require information – Power to require such information as commissioners think necessary for specified purposes – Burden on taxpayer of proving that commissioners do not think information necessary – Premature requirement of information – Notice requiring information which could not be necessary for specified purposes in light of other information given by taxpayer in response to same notice – Validity of notice – Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, s 453.

In the course of a protracted correspondence the Revenue learnt that the plaintiff company claimed itself to be a trustee of a declaration of trust stated to have been made by one Marita Seigal. On 8th January 1971 the inspector of taxes required the plaintiff company to send him a copy of that instrument. Further correspondence followed and on 15th August 1972 the Inland Revenue Commissioners served on the plaintiff company a notice, pursuant to s 453^a of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, requiring the plaintiff company to furnish to them on or before 27th September 1972 the following particulars: 'i. The full terms of the Marita Seigal Declaration of Trust of which the company is trustee, including a copy of the said Declaration if and so far as it was made in writing. ii. The address (or last known address) of Marita Seigal. iii. The name and address (or last known address) of every person who has provided any assets (including any interest under any other trust) to be held on the trusts of the said Declaration, giving in each case details of the assets so provided. iv. So far as not disclosed under iii. above, details of all acquisitions and disposals of assets (including any interest under any other trust) by the company as trustee of the said Declaration. v. A copy of all Board minutes of the company relating to the company's appointment as, or to anything done by the company as, trustee of the said Declaration.' By a letter dated 12th September 1972, the plaintiff company gave the commissioners the particulars required under paras i, ii and iii of the notice, but declined to give the further particulars specified in paras iv and v of the notice on the ground that they were not necessary for the purposes of any of the provisions of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, Part XVI, Chapter III (ss 445-456). The plaintiff company thereupon issued a writ claiming a declaration that it was under no obligation to furnish the particulars demanded by paras iv and v of the notice. At the trial of the action, it was contended for the plaintiff company (a) that the particulars required under paras iv and v of the notice were at best premature since the answers to paras i, ii and iii of the notice might well have shown that Chapter III of Part XVI of the 1970 Act could not possibly apply and (b) that on any view of the facts and of the scope of that Chapter the particulars required under paras iv and v were far too wide, oppressive and fishing.

Held – The plaintiff company was not entitled to the declaration sought for the following reasons—

(i) The power conferred by s 453 of the 1970 Act was intended by Parliament to

be effectively exercised for practical objects. Since on the evidence it was clear that there could be unjustifiable delay in the collection of tax if the court required the commissioners to proceed gradatim, the commissioners were justified in giving a comprehensive notice in a single document (see p 982 f and g, post). a

(ii) By providing that the commissioners might require such particulars 'as they think necessary' Parliament had conferred on them a very wide discretion, with the result that a taxpayer could not refuse the particulars demanded by the commissioners pursuant to s 453 unless he could establish on a balance of probabilities that the commissioners did not in fact think that such particulars were necessary for the purposes of Chapter III; the word 'think' in the context of s 453 meant forming an opinion in the exercise of a proper legal discretion. The plaintiff company had failed to establish that the commissioners had exceeded their powers in forming the opinion that the particulars required under paras iv and v of the notice were necessary for the purposes of Chapter III of Part XVI of the 1970 Act. Furthermore, although the particulars required appeared very wide, it was not possible to restrict them without omitting anything that on a reasonable view might be necessary for a full examination of the plaintiff company's position in relation to all the provisions of Chapter III of Part XVI of the Act. Consequently the presumption that statutory duties had been duly and properly performed prevailed despite the language of the notice coupled with the commissioners' unwillingness to adduce affirmative evidence of their opinion (see p 979 h, p 980 a b and p 983 a to c, post); Clinch v Inland Revenue Comrs [1973] 1 All ER 977 applied. b

By a writ issued on 12th October 1972, the plaintiff company, Wilover Nominees Ltd, brought an action against the defendants, the Inland Revenue Commissioners, seeking a declaration that the plaintiff company was under no obligation to furnish to the commissioners particulars specified in paras iv and v of a notice¹ served on the plaintiff company by the commissioners in the exercise of their powers under s 453 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, on the ground, inter alia, that they were unnecessary for the purposes of Chapter III (ss 445-456) of Part XVI of that Act. By their defence, the commissioners denied that the particulars specified in paras iv and v were unnecessary for the purposes of Chapter III of Part XVI of the 1970 Act and counterclaimed 'A declaration that the Plaintiff has failed to comply h a with so much of the . . . notice as required the Plaintiff to furnish to the [commissioners] the particulars specified in paragraphs (iv) and (v) . . . of the . . . notice' and a penalty of £50. The facts are set out in the judgment.

b GOULDING J. For more than 50 years past taxpayers in the United Kingdom have been accustomed to enter into settlements, dispositions, trusts, covenants, agreements and arrangements with a view to minimising their liability to taxation. Such transactions are in general perfectly lawful. They are also in general artificial in the sense that they would not have been entered into except with the hope of reducing liability to taxation. In order to check the diminution of public revenues
c by reason of the execution of such settlements, dispositions, trusts, covenants, agreements and arrangements, Parliament has repeatedly enacted special provisions to counteract their effect. Some of the provisions in force as regards income tax, including surtax, are now contained in Chapter III of Part XVI of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 (ss 445-456). That Chapter contains provisions which are elaborate and complex. There is often room for legitimate argument whether d particular provisions of the Chapter catch a particular transaction or not. It is only possible to form a proper view on such a question in the light of full information. Accordingly, the Chapter contains a provision enabling the Inland Revenue Commissioners to demand information of the taxpayer or potential taxpayer. That is s 453 of the Act, which is in these terms:

e 'The Board or, for the purpose of charging tax at the standard rate, an inspector may by notice in writing require any person, being a party to a settlement, to furnish them within such time as they may direct (not being less than twenty-eight days) with such particulars as they think necessary for the purposes of any of the provisions of this Chapter.'

I should add that in that section the word 'settlement' by statutory definition includes any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement.

f The phrase in s 453 'as they think necessary' does not require the commissioners to meet and form a personal opinion on each particular case. By virtue of s 4A of the Inland Revenue Regulation Act 1890, as amended¹, the functions conferred on the commissioners may be delegated to their officers. In the present case the commissioners say that they acted through Mr R F Bailey, an assistant secretary to the commissioners, and accordingly it is his thinking which is material in relation to g s 453 of the 1970 Act.

I say at once that in my judgment Parliament clearly intended by s 453 to leave a very wide discretion to the commissioners. If Parliament had wished otherwise it would have been easy to say that the particulars which may be demanded are those that are necessary for the purposes of Chapter III or those that may reasonably be required for the purposes of Chapter III. But, on the contrary, Parliament has h said that the commissioners may exact such particulars as they think necessary for the statutory purposes.

It is, of course, possible that when the commissioners say that they think certain particulars are necessary, they are not telling the truth. That might happen in various possible ways. The commissioners might act in bad faith and say that they thought certain particulars were necessary for the purposes of Chapter III when i they truly and consciously thought they were unnecessary. Or they might be honest but careless and express their view as to what is necessary without having given their minds to the matter at all. Or again, either from bad faith or from muddled thinking, the commissioners might say they thought certain particulars necessary for the purposes of Chapter III when they really wanted them for other purposes

x Section 4A was inserted in the 1890 Act by the Finance Act 1969

because they had taken irrelevant and collateral matters into account when forming their opinion. a

The examples that I have given may not be exhaustive, but the taxpayer cannot, in my judgment, refuse particulars demanded by the commissioners in purported pursuance of s 453 unless he can show that the commissioners do not think such particulars necessary for the purposes of the Chapter, the word 'think' being treated as requiring the commissioners to form an opinion in the exercise of a proper legal discretion. Parliament, in my view, deliberately left it to the commissioners and not to the court to judge what disclosure is requisite in each case. b

It seems clear that in such a matter as this the burden of proof as to the reality of the commissioners' thinking is cast on the taxpayer, and secondly that the taxpayer can discharge such a burden either by direct evidence or by proper inference from the circumstances, including the terms of the commissioners' notice itself: see the observations of Lord Greene MR in *Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn*¹ and those of Pearce LJ in *Fawcett Properties Ltd v Buckinghamshire County Council*². Moreover, it is enacted by s 24 (4) of the Inland Revenue Regulation Act 1890, as amended, that: c

'Any notice or other document purporting to be issued in exercise of any function conferred on the Commissioners shall, until the contrary is proved, be deemed to be so issued.' d

I shall not examine further the burden of proof to be discharged by the taxpayer, for it has recently been fully discussed by Ackner J in *Clinch v Inland Revenue Comrs*³. That decision related to s 481 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, which bears a close analogy to s 453. I would only add two observations of my own to Ackner J's reported judgment. First, it seems to me that in the nature of the case it must generally be more difficult for the court to set aside a public officer's assertion that he thinks certain information necessary for the performance of a statutory duty than to interfere with a condition attached to a licence given in the discretion of a public authority, as in the two decisions I have cited of *Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn*⁴ and *Fawcett Properties Ltd v Buckinghamshire County Council*⁵. The former matter, that is the opinion as to what information is necessary, is generally less susceptible of objective criticism than the latter. It seems to me more akin to the question of the Minister's opinion recently discussed by Buckley LJ in *Secretary of State for Employment v Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen (No 2)*⁶. e

Secondly, I would refer to one of Ackner J's remarks in his reported judgment⁷. Having discussed the proper scope of s 481, Ackner J continued⁸: f

'Accordingly, if the particulars sought went substantially beyond that which was required for this purpose, so that they could be properly described as unduly oppressive or burdensome, I have no doubt that a court would be entitled to intervene, and declare that notice invalid. One of the vital functions of the courts is to protect the individual from any abuse of power by the executive, a function which nowadays grows more and more important as governmental interference increases.' g a I agree with every word of that; but in my view it is an equally vital function of the court, as indeed is shown by Ackner J's own decision in the case that I have cited, to ensure that the officers of the Revenue are able to exercise the full powers (though nothing more than the full powers) with which Parliament has armed them for the performance of their difficult and often thankless duty under the law.

b I need not recite the facts in the present case at length, for no viva voce evidence was given and the agreed documents speak for themselves. In the course of protracted correspondence regarding the affairs of the plaintiff company, the Revenue learned that it claimed to be the trustee of a declaration of trust stated to have been made by one Marita Seigal. The inspector of taxes first asked, I think, for a copy of that instrument on 8th January 1971.

c After further correspondence, a notice was served on the plaintiff company on 15th August 1972. That is the notice which is challenged in the present proceedings. It is addressed to the secretary to the plaintiff company. It bears the cross-heading 'Notice under section 453 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970'. It continues as follows:

d 'The Commissioners of Inland Revenue in exercise of their powers under section 453 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 hereby require [the plaintiff company] (hereinafter called "the company") to furnish to them on or before Wednesday, 27 September 1972 at the address given above the following particulars:—i. The full terms of the Marita Seigal Declaration of Trust of which the company is trustee, including a copy of the said Declaration if and so far as it was made in writing. ii. The address (or last known address) of Marita Seigal. iii. The name and address (or last known address) of every e person who has provided any assets (including any interest under any other trust) to be held on the trusts of the said Declaration, giving in each case details of the assets so provided. iv. So far as not disclosed under iii. above, details of all acquisitions and disposals of assets (including any interest under any other trust) by the company as trustee of the said Declaration. v. A copy of all Board f minutes of the company relating to the company's appointment as, or to anything done by the company as, trustee of the said Declaration.'

The notice was signed by Mr Bailey, to whose position I have already referred.

On 12th September 1972 the solicitors acting for the plaintiff company answered the notice. After referring to that document, they continued:

g 'We enclose a copy of the Declaration of Trust referred to, from which you will learn also Marita Seigal's address. No other person has, we are instructed, provided any assets to be held on the trusts of the Declaration of Trust and the assets so provided by Marita Seigal consist of the property settled by the Declaration of Trust. We are further instructed that no sums have been paid by the Trustees to Marita Seigal in any year of assessment, so that s. 451 of the Act you rely on has no application. From your perusal of the Declaration of Trust h you will see that its terms are not such as to attract the operation of s. 445, 446, 447 or 448 of the Act. We understand that Mrs. Seigal did not claim any sum settled by her as a deduction in computing her total income. Accordingly s. 450 has no application. It follows that there can be no question of the application of Chapter III of Part XVI of the Act to this Declaration of Trust. In the circumstances we are advising [the plaintiff company] to decline to give any further information under paragraphs iv and v of your letter, and look forward to j hearing from you at your earliest convenience that those paragraphs need not be answered.'

Mr Bailey, for the commissioners, replied on 27th September, and after acknowledging the solicitors' letter of 12th September, said:

'The Commissioners cannot accept that the advice referred to in your final paragraph is justified and must ask you to inform [the plaintiff company] that answers to paragraphs (iv) and (v) of the notice of 15th August are still required. The Declaration of Trust enclosed with your letter is on its face merely part of a larger arrangement which may itself be a "settlement" within the definition in section 454 (3), to which one or more of the provisions of Part XVI, Chapter III of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 applies.'

To that the solicitors rejoined on 12th October 1972:

'We agree that the Declaration of Trust we have sent you was "on its face merely part of a larger arrangement" as you state in one of your letters of 27th September. We are however instructed that Mrs. Seigal was the settlor in respect of the Settlement referred to in paragraph (A) of the Declaration of Trust [I interpose to say that that was a settlement intended to be executed on the same date as the Declaration of Trust], and was the only person who provided any assets to be held on the trusts of that Settlement, and of the wider "arrangement" constituted by the Settlement and Declaration of Trust taken together. We are therefore convinced that there can be no question of the application of Chapter III of Part XVI of [the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970] to the Declaration of Trust, and have advised [the plaintiff company] that questions iv and v raised in your letter of 15th August cannot be supposed to be necessary for any of the purposes mentioned in Section 453. Further, the questions are oppressive.'

The present action followed, in which the plaintiff company claims a declaration that it is under no obligation to furnish the particulars demanded by paras iv and v of the statutory notice.

Counsel for the plaintiff company makes two principal submissions. First he says that questions iv and v in the notice were at best premature, since the answers to questions i, ii and iii might well have shown that Chapter III of Part XVI of the 1970 Act could not possibly be applicable. I reject that argument. Section 453 contains a power conferred by Parliament and intended to be effectively exercised for practical objects. The correspondence which preceded the service of the notice showed in my judgment that the plaintiff company or its advisers were either obstructive or grossly dilatory. It would impose unjustifiable delay in the collection of tax if the court required the commissioners in such circumstances to proceed gradatim. In my judgment they were well justified in giving a comprehensive notice in a single document on 15th August 1972.

Secondly, counsel for the plaintiff company says, that, on any view of the facts and of the scope of Chapter III, questions iv and v are far too wide; they are fishing, oppressive and, in his own words, quite preposterous. It is here that I hesitate. The two questions certainly look very wide, and it is difficult to see with any confidence that in totality they are necessary for the purposes of Chapter III. On the other hand, the commissioners are concerned to investigate not only the settlement effected by the declaration of trust but any wider arrangement of which it may be part. I cannot accept counsel's argument in opening, somewhat qualified in reply, that inspection of the written declaration of trust is of itself conclusive that Chapter III is inapplicable.

I know from experience at the Bar and from reading reported cases how protean in form and cimmerian in obscurity tax saving arrangements can be; and I have asked myself in vain how I could restrict questions iv and v to confine their great extension without omitting anything that on a reasonable view might be necessary for a full examination of the position in relation to all the provisions of Chapter III.

The matter to my mind stands thus: if Mr Bailey had given evidence and had told me that from his experience in the public service he thought that questions

iv and v were at the date of the notice necessary for the purposes of Chapter III, I should have been very ready to accept his assurance. And I cannot help asking myself why that assurance is not forthcoming.

Again, if I had to apply a criminal standard of proof, I certainly could not say I felt sure that the commissioners had exceeded their statutory powers. But that is not, in my judgment, the right test. I have to decide the case on the civil standard of the balance of probabilities. In the one scale are my misgivings arising from the language of the notice itself, reinforced by the commissioners' unwillingness to adduce affirmative evidence of their opinion. In the other scale is the clearly established presumption that statutory duties are duly and properly performed. In my judgment the presumption is weightier than my misgivings, and I therefore dismiss the action.

It is not to be inferred from my decision that the questionnaire employed in the present case can properly be administered to the parties to every settlement, disposition, trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement or to the parties to any particular class of such transactions. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have, in my view, to consider what is necessary in the circumstances of each particular case for the purposes of Chapter III of Part XVI of the 1970 Act and to frame their notice accordingly.

Declaration sought by plaintiff company refused. Declaration that the plaintiff company had failed to comply with the notice. Plaintiff company to pay penalty of £5 for failing to give particulars under paras iv and v of the notice.

1. In undefended proceedings for divorce in which it is alleged that the respondent had committed adultery a statement in writing signed by the respondent admitting the adultery can be put in at the hearing, the respondent's signature being identified by the petitioner: see the Civil Evidence Act 1968, s 9 (1) and (2)¹. Where this is done it should normally be unnecessary either to call as a witness, or to put in affidavit evidence from, an enquiry agent or other person who merely took the statement from the respondent.

2. An admission of adultery by the respondent is not evidence against a co-respondent, but a statement by the latter admitting adultery is admissible as evidence against him if its authenticity is established. This applies also to a respondent other than the respondent spouse.

3. Where for some special reason the evidence of an enquiry agent is necessary in an undefended cause it should normally be given on affidavit. Leave to give such evidence on affidavit may be sought from the judge at the hearing without any prior application to the registrar for such leave.

The guarantors issued a policy of insurance, described as a ‘guarantee’, to a company (‘the merchant’) in respect of contracts which the merchant was minded to make with a buyer in the United Arab Republic. Those contracts included a contract for the sale of flour to be exported from the United Kingdom for which the price was payable in US dollars. One of the risks covered by the policy was prevention of or delay in the transfer of payment from the buyer’s country in circumstances outside the control of both the merchant and the buyer. The guarantors undertook to pay 90 per cent of ‘the loss’, which was defined in cl 9 of the policy as being the gross invoice value of the goods the subject of the contract of sale, delivered and accepted by the buyer. Under the terms of the endorsement of the policy, where the currency of payment was other than in sterling, the amount of the loss was to be calculated in sterling by converting the foreign currency into sterling at the buying rate of exchange in the London foreign exchange market on the date when the goods were exported under the contract of sale. By cl 17 of the policy: ‘Any sums recovered by the Merchant or the Guarantors in respect of a loss to which this Guarantee applies, after the date at which the loss is ascertained, whether from the buyer or any other source shall . . . (ii) . . . be divided between the Guarantors and the Merchant in the proportions of 90 and 10 . . .’ While the policy was in force, exchange control restrictions were imposed by the United Arab Republic which delayed the transfer of payment due by the buyer to the merchant for the goods which had been exported under the contract of sale. The payment due was US $1,155,181.26. On 17th March 1966 the merchant made a claim under the policy in respect of the delay in payment. On 31st August the guarantors made a payment of £372,071 6s 10d, i.e. 90 per cent of £413,412 12s 10d, which was the sterling equivalent of $1,155,181.26 converted at the current rate of exchange which was approximately $2.80 to the £ and which had remained unchanged between the date of export and the date of ascertainment of the amount of the loss. Subsequently the currency restrictions of the United Arab Republic ceased to be operative and payments were thereafter received by the merchant. Before the final payment had been received the rate of exchange had been altered to approximately $2.40 to the £. In consequence the total sum received by the merchant as payment, when converted into sterling, ^e
^g
^h ⁱ

a amounted to £443,032 8s 1d. The merchant contended that its liability to the guarantors in respect of the sum recovered was limited to £372,071 6s 10d, i.e. the amount in sterling which the guarantors had actually paid in respect of the loss, and that any excess of sterling above that figure received by the merchant in consequence of the new rates of exchange belonged to the merchant. Cooke J accepted that contention, holding that the correct approach was to consider first what was the general law of insurance in relation to the principle of subrogation and then to construe the policy in the light of that principle; he held that, on the general law of subrogation, the guarantors would not be entitled to recover out of the proceeds of sale more than they had actually paid to the merchant under the policy and that there was nothing in the express terms of the policy which led to a different result. The guarantors appealed.

c Held – The appeal would be allowed for the following reasons—

(i) The correct approach to the question was to consider the policy of insurance by reference to its terms and only if there still emerged some real doubt or ambiguity in the construction of the policy was it right to invoke the general principles of subrogation as a guide or controlling authority (see p 989 b, p 991 d to f and p 993 a, post).

d (ii) The sterling proceeds of the dollar payments were properly to be regarded as sums which had been ‘recovered by the Merchant . . . in respect of a loss to which this Guarantee applies’, within cl 17 of the policy, for those proceeds could not have been recovered in respect of anything different from that in respect of which the dollars had been recovered, i.e. the loss to which the policy applied. There was no reason for treating a part of the sterling proceeds as not having been ‘recovered’, or as not having been ‘recovered . . . in respect of a loss to which this Guarantee applies’ merely because the sterling proceeds of the recovered dollars, as a result of the subsequent change in the rate of exchange, exceeded the ‘amount of the loss’ as computed under cl 9 by reference to a provision which had no application to cl 17. It followed therefore that there was no doubt or ambiguity in the terms of the policy; under those terms the guarantors were entitled to be paid by the merchant 90 per cent of the total sterling proceeds, i.e. £398,729 3s 3d (see p 989 j to p 990 d, p 991 c g and h and p 992 a to c and e h to p 993 a, post).

Appeal

By an originating summons dated 26th March 1971 the plaintiffs, L Lucas Ltd and Lamet Trading Ltd, sought the determination of the court on the question whether the first plaintiff was obliged to pay the sum of £26,651.57 claimed by the defendants, Export Credits Guarantee Department, which at the relevant dates was part of the Board of Trade, as a sum recovered in respect of a loss paid by the defendants under a policy of insurance dated 15th April 1964. On 23rd June 1972 Cooke J determined the question in the plaintiffs' favour and the defendants appealed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Megaw LJ. c

4th April. MEGAW LJ read the first judgment at the request of Davies LJ. This is an appeal by Export Credits Guarantee Department against a judgment of Cooke J delivered on 23rd June 1972, in which he decided in favour of L Lucas Ltd and Lamet Trading Ltd, who were the plaintiffs in an originating summons issued on 26th March 1971. e

The Export Credits Guarantee Department ('ECGD') was at the relevant dates a part of the Board of Trade. Its function is to assist exporters from the United Kingdom by providing, for an appropriate premium, insurance against certain types of financial risk arising in export contracts, whether from the insolvency of a foreign buyer or from certain other causes such as the introduction by foreign countries of exchange control restrictions. f

By a policy dated 15th April 1964, with an endorsement and schedule dated 27th November 1964 (the policy being described in its opening words as a 'Guarantee'), the Board of Trade through ECGD covered defined risks of the plaintiffs, L Lucas Ltd and Lamet Trading Ltd, in respect of contracts for the sale of goods which they were minded to make with buyers in the United Arab Republic. Those contracts consisted of (or included, it matters not which) a contract for the sale of flour, to be exported from the United Kingdom, for which the price was payable in United States dollars. Apparently it was the first plaintiff, L Lucas Ltd, which was concerned with the relevant contract. Lamet Trading Ltd were presumably joined as plaintiffs solely for the technical reason that the policy was issued to them jointly with Lucas; but Lamet were not parties to the sale contract which gives rise to the relevant loss. There were various extensions of time and other amendments to the policy which are not relevant for present purposes. g

By the policy ECGD is described as 'the guarantors'. The exporters, Lucas and Lamet, are described as 'the merchant'. The buyers in the United Arab Republic are called 'the buyer'. I shall use those terms. h

Under cl 1 (ii) of the policy one of the risks covered (the relevant risk for present purposes) was prevention of or delay in the transfer of payment from the buyer's country in circumstances outside the control of both the merchant and the buyer. The amount of loss, by cl 7 of the policy, fell to be ascertained and paid four months after the due date of payment by the buyer. By cl 8 the percentage of any loss which the guarantors undertook to pay, as regards a loss caused by the risk which is here i a relevant, was 90 per cent. Clause 9 defined 'the amount of loss' as being the gross invoice value of the goods, the subject of the contract of sale, delivered to and accepted by the buyers. This was subject to certain potential deductions which are not relevant in the present case. Under the terms of the endorsement of the policy, where the currency of payment was other than sterling, the amount of loss was to be calculated in sterling by converting the foreign currency into sterling at the buying rate of exchange in the London foreign exchange market on the date when the goods were

b exported under the contract of sale. The schedule accompanying the endorsement declared that the currency payment in this contract of sale was to be United States dollars. I shall come back later to other provisions of the policy, relevant to recoveries after a loss has been paid.

The relevant facts and figures are all agreed between the parties in the agreed statement of facts. Hence it is not necessary to go into much detail with regard to them.
c The issue is an issue of principle, with no controversy on fact or detail.

While the policy was in force, exchange control restrictions were imposed by the United Arab Republic which delayed the transfer of payment due by the buyer to the merchant (Lucas) for goods which the merchant had exported under the contract of sale. The payment due was US $1,155,181.26. As has already been mentioned, the policy contemplated that payments under the sale contract would be in United
d States dollars. Six drafts, to that total, had been received by the merchant, but they were not paid on maturity because of the restrictions which had by then been imposed.

On 17th March 1966 the merchant 'made a claim under the said policy . . . in respect of the unpaid drafts'. The words in quotation marks are taken from para 7 of the agreed statement of facts. On 31st August 1966 the guarantors made to the merchant
e a payment of £372,071 6s 10d. That figure is 90 per cent of £413,412 12s 10d. £413,412 12s 10d is $1,155,181.26, converted, as is required by the endorsement for the purposes of calculating the amount of loss under cl 9, at the rate of exchange on the date of export. The rate was approximately $2.80 to the £. It had remained unchanged between the date of export and the date of ascertainment of the amount of the loss.

The currency restrictions of the United Arab Republic ceased to be operative at f some date after the guarantors had made their payment of £372,071 6s 10d in respect of the loss. Accordingly payments were thereafter received by the merchant's bankers in respect of all the unpaid drafts, in respect of which the claim has been made and accepted. The first three of these payments were received on 12th May 1967. They totalled $661,710. At that date the rate of exchange between dollars and sterling was still approximately $2.80 to the £. Thereafter three further drafts were paid, g on 20th June 1968, 22nd July 1968, and 23rd July 1968. They totalled, in dollars, $493,471.26, so that, with the payment of 12th May 1967, the buyer had now made payment to the merchant of the total amount, in dollars, originally unpaid because of currency restrictions: that is $1,155,181.26. But when these last payments were received the rate of exchange had altered to approximately $2.40 to the £. That h alteration had taken place in November 1967. The total sterling sum received by the merchant in respect of the six drafts was £443,032 8s 1d. The amount of the merchant's loss, as calculated in accordance with cl 9 of the policy coupled with the application of the conversion rate stipulated by the endorsement to the policy, was the sum previously mentioned, £413,412 12s 10d. The amount which the guarantors had paid under the policy—the 90 per cent of the loss, as provided by cl 8—was i £372,071 6s 10d. What, on the true construction of the policy, were the rights of the guarantors and the merchant respectively as to this extra sterling amount which resulted from the devaluation of sterling in the period before the last three drafts were paid? That is the issue in this case.

Clauses 15, 16 and 17 of the policy constitute a section headed 'Prevention and Notice of Loss and Recoveries'. Clause 16 has a sidenote 'Action after Payment of Claim'. The clause places on the merchant, when he has been paid by the guarantors, the obligation to do what he can to effect recoveries. The clause also gives the guarantors certain rights which they may, if they wish, exercise after they have made payment. They could, amongst other things, have required the merchant to assign his rights to receive moneys under the contract and to assign unpaid drafts. The guarantors did not in fact make any such requirement.

Clause 17, so far as is relevant, reads:

'Any sums recovered by the Merchant or the Guarantors in respect of a loss to which this Guarantee applies, after the date at which the loss is ascertained, whether from the buyer or any other source shall:— ... (ii) ... be divided between the Guarantors and the Merchant in the proportions of 90 and 10; The Merchant shall pay all sums recovered to the Guarantors forthwith upon their being received by him or any person on his behalf, the Merchant hereby acknowledging and declaring that until such payment is made to the Guarantors, he receives and holds such sums in trust for the Guarantors.'

The merchant's contention is that its liability to the guarantors is £372,071 6s 10d, being the amount in sterling which the guarantors actually paid in respect of the loss. The guarantors, they say, have no valid claim to any more. Any excess of sterling above that figure, derived from the conversion of the proceeds of some of the drafts from the dollars in which they were received by the merchant, into sterling at the new rates of exchange, belongs to the merchant. Once the guarantors have received in sterling the full amount of their sterling payment to the merchant ('the amount of loss' as defined in cl 9), they are not entitled to any more. The guarantors, on the other hand, say that, on the terms of the policy, the whole of the amount received, as mentioned above, totalling in sterling £443,032 8s 1d, falls be divided between the guarantors and the merchant in the proportions of 90 to 10.

It has been suggested in argument that considerations as to the fairness or unfairness of the financial consequences of the respective contentions may be of some relevance. I see no substance in any such suggestion. It is unnecessary therefore to set out those financial consequences in detail. It is enough to say that the amount at stake, according to which of the two contentions is right, is £26,657 16s 5d. That is the difference between the figure of £398,729 3s 3d which the guarantors say they should receive and keep, and the figure of £372,071 6s 10d which the merchant says is the guarantors' entitlement out of the sterling proceeds of the drafts. There are, in fact, minor adjustments to the figures which are now agreed between the parties, including an adjustment resulting from an agreed division of interest received in respect of delay in the payment of the drafts. These are set out in the agreed statement of facts and they in no way affect the question of principle.

Cooke J accepted the merchant's contention. The guarantors say he was wrong so to do, both in respect to his approach to the decision of a question of construction of the policy and also, whether or not his approach was right, in respect of the decision itself.

The learned judge agreed with the merchant's submission that the correct approach was, in the first instance, to consider what the general law of insurance is in relation to the principle of subrogation, disregarding for the moment any question of the particular terms of the particular policy of insurance: and then to construe this policy in the light of that principle. He arrived at the conclusion, based largely on the judgment of Diplock J in *Yorkshire Insurance Co Ltd v Nisbet Shipping Co Ltd*¹ that, subject to the effect of any express provisions of this particular policy, the guarantors would not, on the general law of subrogation, be entitled to receive back, out of the sterling proceeds of the six drafts, more pounds sterling than the insurers, the guarantors, had actually paid to the merchant under the terms

a of the policy. He then took into consideration the relevant express terms of the policy, and in particular cl 17, and decided that there was nothing in those terms which led to a different result.

With all respect to the learned judge, I think that that approach was wrong. It is not disputed that in a contract of insurance the parties may introduce express terms which are at variance from, or in conflict with, the ordinary principles of subrogation, whatever they may be. Hence it seems to be that the correct approach is to consider this contract—the policy of insurance, for that is its nature—
b by reference to its terms. If, but only if, there should emerge some real doubt or ambiguity in the construction of the policy, would it be right to invoke the general principles of subrogation as a guide or a controlling authority.

Accordingly, I propose to do as counsel for the guarantors invited us to do: that is, to consider first whether or not this policy on its own express terms provides for the allocation of the moneys here in question and, if so, in what way.

It is, I believe, a long-established principle of English law—whether it is a good principle in modern conditions may be a matter for argument—that a pound is always a pound: so that whatever the exchange rates between the pound and any or all other currencies, and whatever may happen between one date and another to the internal purchasing power of the pound, in the eye of the law a pound today
d is the same as it was yesterday or a year ago or ten years ago. This long-established doctrine is expressed in many decided cases. I quote from Lord Denning's speech in *Re United Railways of Havana and Regla Warehouses Ltd*¹:

'Our courts here must still treat sterling as if it were of the same value as before: for it is the basis on which all our monetary transactions are founded.'

e If it were otherwise, I could see strong ground for the argument that the guarantors were not fully indemnified by receiving in 1968 the same number of pounds as they had paid out in 1966. But as the law stands they must be regarded as having been fully indemnified.

It is also a firmly established principle of English law (though, again, it has been subjected to much criticism of recent years) that if a debt in a foreign currency is
f sued for in an English court the judgment must be in the terms of sterling and the rate of exchange (subject, of course, to express contractual provision to the contrary) is the rate of exchange between sterling and the foreign currency prevailing at the date when the debt became due: see, again, *Re United Railways of Havana and Regla Warehouses Ltd*².

g The policy contains no express provisions for the conversion into sterling of recoveries which may be made in dollars. The provisions of the endorsement which apply to the conversion of a dollar sum for the purposes of ascertaining the amount of the loss have no application, express or implied, to recoveries. I think, nevertheless, that the 'sums' referred to in cl 17 are, strictly, the pounds sterling which are the proceeds of conversion of the dollars in the drafts. If legal proceedings had
h been required to enforce a payment by the merchant to the guarantors, the judgment would have been in terms of sterling, with the conversion rate at the date when the payment was due: that is, immediately on the dollars having been received in this country—$2.40 to the £. But I do not think it makes any difference for the purposes of cl 17 whether one regards the 'sums' as the dollars or the sterling proceeds.

j The crucial question, to my mind, is: are the sterling proceeds of the drafts—the whole of them—properly to be regarded as sums which have been 'recovered by the Merchant in respect of a loss to which this Guarantee applies'; or, on the other hand, are the sums falling within that description to be limited to that part of the

sterling proceeds of the drafts which equals the amount (expressed, of course, in sterling) of the loss as computed under cl 9 of the policy? a

It seems to me that the dollars in the drafts were recovered in respect of the loss to which the policy applied, namely, the delay in the payment of $1,155,181.26. It seems to me that the sterling proceeds of those dollars cannot have been recovered in respect of anything different from that in respect of which the dollars were recovered. Hence the sterling proceeds were recovered in respect of the loss to which the policy applied. Hence they are within cl 17. I see no reason for treating a part of the proceeds of the dollars as not having been 'recovered', or as not having been 'recovered in respect of a loss to which the Guarantee applies', merely because the sterling proceeds of the recovered dollars, as a result of a subsequent change in the rate of exchange, exceed the 'amount of loss' as computed under cl 9 by reference to a provision which has no application to cl 17. b

In my judgment, in the ordinary use of language the dollars paid belatedly on the drafts would certainly be properly described, in their totality, as having been 'recovered in respect of a loss to which this Guarantee applies', and not, in whole or in part, in respect of anything other than such a loss. The whole of the sterling proceeds are equally 'recovered', and are equally recovered in precisely the same 'respect'. c

In my judgment, there is no such doubt or ambiguity in the words of cl 17, in the context of the policy as a whole, as would justify the introduction of a consideration of the difficult and obscure questions as to the principles of subrogation. I would make these comments only, in deference to the arguments which were addressed to us. d

First, I do not find any great assistance in a consideration of the wording of s 79 (1) of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, particularly when one bears in mind that where there is, in marine insurance, an accepted abandonment, the insurer is entitled to keep unto himself any amount which he may realise even though it may far exceed the amount which he has paid to the assured. I do not find it a satisfactory explanation of the difference which is said to exist between such a case and a s 79 (1) case that in the former the insurer takes over as a 'recovery' a physical object of which he becomes owner, whereas in the latter he takes over legal rights which are not the rights of ownership of a chattel. (Incidentally cl 16 (c) of this policy does, indeed, appear to contemplate that the guarantors have the option of having transferred to them the rights of ownership of chattels.) e

Secondly, while I must not be taken as suggesting that the decision in *Yorkshire Insurance Co Ltd v Nisbet Shipping Co Ltd*¹ is wrong, I should respectfully wish to reserve consideration of certain aspects. Thus, for example, counsel for the merchant, while relying on the decision, indicated that he felt certain difficulties in supporting the view stated in the judgment as to implied terms. f

Further, there is, I believe, a difficulty—it may turn out to be no more than a verbal difficulty—in the reliance which is there placed on the judgment of Brett LJ in *Castellain v Preston*². Diplock J referred in the Yorkshire Insurance Co case³ to Brett LJ's judgment as 'his classic judgment'. The learned judge, reflecting, if I may say so, accurately that which had been expressed by Brett LJ more than once with emphasis in that classic judgment, said⁴: g a the insurer, and the insurer, as is the decision in *Yorkshire Insurance Co*¹, is not entitled to receive the excess from the assured, what happens to the excess? Is the explanation, as counsel for the merchant suggested, that some special meaning must be given to the words 'actual loss'? Or is the explanation that in *Castellain v Preston*² Brett LJ was dealing with a case in which there was, on the facts, no question of the insurer receiving or retaining an excess? So that Brett LJ's emphatic remarks about the insured not being entitled to receive more than a full indemnity are perhaps to be read as though they were qualified by some such words as 'unless and until the insurer has been fully indemnified'? But that explanation is reached only by reading into that judgment what I may, perhaps loosely but not I hope irreverently, describe as an implied term. I do not think we are required to face those problems in this appeal.

'... the assured shall not be entitled to retain, as against the insurer, a greater sum than what is ultimately shown to be his actual loss.'

(The emphasis is mine.) Now if the assured is not entitled to retain an excess against h

c I would allow the appeal, holding that the guarantors were entitled to be paid by the merchant 90 per cent of the total sterling proceeds of the six dollar drafts, calculated in sterling as at the dates when the proceeds of the drafts first became available to the merchant or his banker.

d SIR GORDON WILLMER. In my judgment the decision of this case must depend on the true construction of the specific terms of this particular contract. It is called a 'Guarantee', and I will continue to use this word, although I agree with the learned judge that it amounts in substance to a contract of insurance. Much of the argument before the learned judge and before this court was devoted to the question what the result would have been if the contract had not contained special terms, so that the ordinary rules relating to subrogation had to be applied. In my judgment this is a dangerous and misleading approach to the problem which has to be solved, and I fear that the learned judge's judgment was very much coloured by his adoption of this approach. As I see it, the parties here have by their contract made precise provision for what is to happen in the event of sums being recovered after payment of a loss by the defendants, and in my judgment it is nihil ad rem to discuss how such recoveries might have been dealt with in the absence of such special provision. I do not, therefore, find it necessary to express any opinion on the question adumbrated before us, namely whether or not *Yorkshire Insurance Co Ltd v Nisbet Shipping Co Ltd*¹ was rightly decided.

The relevant clauses in the guarantee have been fully set out in the judgment of the learned judge, and I do not find it necessary to quote them again. The particular words which have to be construed are those contained in cl 17, that is: g 'Any sums recovered . . . in respect of a loss to which this Guarantee applies.' In my judgment the word 'loss' must be clearly distinguished from the 'amount of loss' as that phrase is defined elsewhere in the contract. In the particular circumstances of this case the 'loss' against which the defendants guaranteed the plaintiffs was a loss resulting from 'The prevention of or delay in the transfer of payment from the buyer's country to the United Kingdom', as provided by cl 1. Since the purchase price of the goods sold was quoted in United States dollars, this loss was a loss of dollars. h But the 'amount of loss', in respect of which the defendants had to pay 90 per cent, was an artificial sum, to be ascertained four months after the due date of payment by the buyer (cl 7), consisting of the gross invoice value of the goods, that is the dollar price, less certain deductions (cl 9), which by the endorsement subsequently attached to the policy had to be converted into sterling at the rate of exchange prevailing on the date when the goods were exported. i The agreed figure for the 'loss' was $1,155,181.26, and the 'amount of loss' calculated as above was agreed to be £413,412 12s 0d, 90 per cent of which, namely £372,071 6s 10d, was duly paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs.

In due course, when the exchange restrictions were lifted, the buyers in fact paid the full purchase price, that is $1,155,181.26, thereby wiping out the whole of the loss in respect of which the defendants had paid. According to the ordinary meaning of words this was a sum recovered in respect of the loss to which the guarantee applied. But owing to the depreciation in the value of sterling, which had meanwhile taken place, the amount recovered, when converted into sterling, came to £443,032 8s 1d. How is this sum to be dealt with as between the plaintiffs and the defendants? The plaintiffs say that when they have accounted for 90 per cent of the agreed 'amount of loss'—that is the £372,071 6s 10d which the defendants had paid—the defendants are entitled to no more, since they will then be fully reimbursed for what they had to pay. This is the conclusion at which the learned judge arrived. a b
